MEMORANDUM OF OPINION AND ORDER

POINTER, District Judge.

This case raises the question of who, by what procedure, can give the "approval of the Attorney General" to the issuance of an order directing a witness in an administrative hearing to give evidence that, but for 18 U.S.C.A. § 6001 et seq., would be protected by the Fifth Amendment.

This action was brought by the FTC under 15 U.S.C.A. § 49 for an order compelling four recalcitrant witnesses to obey an order issued under 18 U.S.C.A. § 6004. In the initial sparring, the Commission took the position that this proceeding was but a summary procedure, dispensing with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The court, however, ruled that it was to be an adversary proceeding, United States v. Powell, 379 U.S. 48, 58, 85 S.Ct. 248, 13 L.Ed.2d 112 [23] (1964), and further held that the Federal Rules do apply, with the petition and show cause order being treated as a complaint. See United States v. Pritchard, 438 F.2d 969 (5th Cir. 1971), citing Federal Rule 81(a). At the hearing on the show cause order, the court determined that few factual matters were in dispute, and requested the parties to conduct informal discovery to determine if the potential factual disputes could be resolved.

The statute in question, 18 U.S.C.A. § 6004, allows an agency to issue such an order "with the approval of the Attorney General." Here the FTC relies upon a letter of approval signed by Walker B. Comegys, the Acting Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. It points to the following delegation orders issued by the Attorney General under the authority of 28 U.S.C. § 510:

> "The Assistant Attorney General [in charge of the Anti-trust Division is] authorized to exercise the power and authority vested in the Attorney General by § 6004 of title 18, United States Code, to approve the issuance by an agency of the United States of an order compelling testimony or the production of information by a witness in a proceeding the agency * * *; provided, however, that approval shall be granted only with the concurrence of the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division. 28 CFR § 0.175(c), 35 F.R. 19397, Dec. 23, 1970.
> The Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division and the Assistant Attorney [General in charge of the Antitrust Division] are authorized to redelegate the authority delegated by [§ 0.175] to their respective Deputy Assistant Attorney Generals to be exercised solely during the absence of such Assistant Attorney Generals from the City of Washington. 28 CFR § 0.178(a), 35 F.R. 19397, Dec. 23, 1970.

> In the event of a vacancy in the office of head of [the Antitrust Division], the ranking deputy (or his equivalent) in such unit who is available shall perform the functions and duties of and act as such head, unless the Attorney General shall direct otherwise. 28 CFR § 0.132(d), 34 F.R. 20388, Dec. 31, 1969.

It is admitted that Mr. Comegys was the Deputy Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division and that on the resignation of the Assistant Attorney General for the division he had become its Acting Assistant Attorney General.

What is in controversy is whether anyone other than the Attorney General himself can give the approval specified in 18 U.S.C.A. § 6004. Stated another way, are the delegation orders in 28 CFR § 0.175(c), 0.178(a) permissible under that statute? The answer to these questions involves a comparison of the language of § 6004—"approval of the Attorney General"—with that contained in another section of the same act, § 6003—"approval of the Attorney General, the Deputy Attorney General, or any designated Assistant Attorney General."

Three explanations can be given for the difference in language. First, the difference may have been inadvertent, indicating no conscious differentiation by Congress in the two sections. Second, Congress may have intended that only the Attorney General personally could give approval under § 6004, while other high level members of his office could have authority to give approval under § 6003. Third, Congress may have intended that only specified high level members of his office could have authority to give approval under § 6003, while leaving the Attorney General with respect to § 6004 with a broader power of delegation under existing 28 U.S.C. § 510.

The legislative history sheds little light on the intent of Congress. How[24]ever, House Report No. 91-1549 in its section analysis of § 6004 states:

> It is assumed that the Attorney General will take such * * * steps as are necessary to insure that his office is familiar with the immunity-granting procedures of each agency, in order that issuance of such orders might be expedited and no orders will be issued without authorization. (Emphasis added.)

This suggests that persons other than the Attorney General himself were expected to play a function in the approval process. And, indeed, if issuance of such orders was to be expedited, it is doubtful that Congress intended that only the Attorney General personally could give approvals under § 6004.

[1] I conclude that the third explanation should be adopted—that Congress, by failing to specify in § 6004 (as it had in § 6003) additional persons in the Attorney General's office who could grant approvals, intended to give the Attorney General the broader range of authority to delegate existing under 28 U.S.C. § 510. It is of significance that the predecessor of this legislation, 18 U.S.C. § 2514, had contained the words "approval of the Attorney General" and that, in practice later endorsed by the courts, this had permitted delegation under 28 U.S.C. § 510. December 1968 Grand Jury v. United States, 420 F. 2d 1201 (7th Cir. 1970); United States v. DiMauro, 441 F. 2d 428 (8th Cir. 1971). On the other hand, use of additional words such as found in § 6003 has been held to indicate a limitation upon the power to delegate. See United States v. Robinson, 468 F. 2d 189 (5th Cir. # 71-1058, Jan. 12, 1972); cf. United States v. Pisacano, 459 F. 2d 259 (2nd Cir. 1972). That Congress has not forgotten about the general power of delegation existing under 28 U.S.C. § 510, see the explicit language in the Civil Rights Act of 1968, 18 U.S.C.A. § 245(a)(1).

Support for this conclusion can be found by noting another difference in §§ 6003 and 6004. In § 6003, the key value judgment (i.e., necessary to the public interest) is to be made solely by personnel of the Department of Justice. In § 6004, that judgment is essentially the responsibility of another agency of government, with the Department of Justice playing a secondary role. It would be somewhat incongruous if only the Attorney General personally could perform the "secondary" role under § 6004, while permitting his subordinates to perform the functions under § 6003 for which the Department of Justice must bear the sole responsibility to the public.

[2] The defendants next argue that Comegys, the Acting AAG, had not been delegated authority under § 6004. This is but a matter of interpretation of the published delegation orders. I find nothing in Order 445-70, as published in 35 F.R. 19397, December 23, 1970, to indicate that the Attorney General intended thereby to revoke for such purposes the provisions of 28 CFR § 0.132(d) which direct—not merely empower—a ranking deputy such as Comegys to perform the functions of the Assistant Attorney General upon a vacancy in that office. In the absence of clear language to the contrary, I conclude that 28 CFR § 0.132(d) remains in effect for purposes of the approval process covered in Order 445-70—particularly since the logical extension of the defendants' contention would result in an hiatus of dire consequences should, for example, there be a vacancy in the office of the Attorney General himself. It should further be noted that 28 CFR § 0.178(a) reflects the willingness of the Attorney General to have a ranking Deputy perform the functions of the AAG during his temporary absence.

The defendants finally argue that there was—or may have been (for which formal discovery is needed)—a failure to obtain the concurrence of the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Criminal Division, as required by the last clause of 28 CFR § 0.175(b). Several reasons are urged by defendants, [25] each aimed at a purported failure in the Attorney General's office to follow its own procedures.

[3] They point out that the FTC's request for approval was transmitted to the attention of the Criminal Division of the Attorney General's office (rather than to the Antitrust Division, to which only an informational copy was sent). They also note that the purported concurrence of the AAG, Criminal Division, was given prospectively, and apparently before request from the AAG, Antitrust Division. The court concludes that these matters are immaterial—to establish an internal "clearing house", it was quite appropriate to designate the Criminal Division; and that "concurrence" under 28 CFR § 0.175(b) can be given in the following form, albeit prospective and anticipatory:

> I defer to your judgment as to the advisability of approving the request for authority to issue an order to compel the testimony of this person [named above] pursuant to 18 U.S.C. 6004, and, if you decide the approval of the request is warranted, will concur in your approval pursuant to 28 C.F.R. 0.175.

The memoranda of concurrence, in the form above indicated, were given to Comegys by an internal communication showing it to be from Henry E. Petersen, Assistant Attorney General, Criminal Division. Unsigned, it does bear the initials "HEP" opposite his name. Defendants assert that their informal discussions with personnel of the Attorney General's office undertaken at the Court's instruction following the show cause hearing casts doubt on whether Petersen (or his ranking deputy) initialed the memoranda or otherwise gave the purported concurrence any personal attention. According to the defendants they have been unable to elicit this information by informal means, and they therefore seek formal discovery. The FTC, represented in this case by personnel of the Department of Justice,* argues that the personal concurrence of Petersen or his deputy was not required, or was an irregularity without significance—at least by implication giving some support to the defendants' view of the facts. The affidavits submitted are conspicuous in failing to indicate the extent, if any, of participation by Petersen or his deputy in the purported concurrence. There appears to be some substance to the defendant's assertion—and not a mere conjecture as to an irregularity. Cf. United States v. Rucker, 435 F. 2d 950 (8th Cir. 1971).

*By order of March 28, 1973, the court amended the statement that the Commission was "represented in this case by personnel of the Department of Justice" to read "represented in this case be personnel of both the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission."

I conclude that the failure of Petersen or his deputy to have personally concurred in the Comegys' approval would—if established—be contrary to the directive of the Attorney General as published in Order 445–70. While, under 28 U.S.C. § 510, he could have delegated such authority to lower ranked personnel, he chose not to do so, as is obvious from a reading of 28 CFR § 0.178(a), which relates not merely to the other divisions of the Department, but also to the Criminal Division.

But before a decision in this case be further prolonged for discovery or trial on a potential factual dispute, it is appropriate to decide as to the materiality of that dispute—here, whether the defendants could take advantage of the procedural irregularity if so proved. See Venn v. United States, 400 F. 2d 207 (5th Cir. 1968), footnote 12 at page 208; cf. United States v. Pritchard, 438 F. 2d 969 (5th Cir. 1971).

[4] Regulations once adopted are binding upon the adopting governmental agency. Accardi v. Shaughnessy, 347 U.S. 260, 74 S.Ct. 499, 98 L.Ed. 681 (1954); Service v. Dulles, 354 U.S. 363, 77 S.Ct. 1152, 1 L.Ed.2d 1403 (1957). But for actions taken contrary to regulations to be invalidated for that reason, some prejudice must be shown or apparent. See, for example, Pacific Molasses Co. v. FTC, 356 F.2d 386 (5th Cir. 1966).

In the present case it is neither shown nor apparent that defendants have suffered any prejudice by reason of the as[26]sumed failure of Petersen or his deputy to have personally participated in the concurrence given for the Criminal Division. The regulations indicate that principal responsibility for approval was being given by the Attorney General to the AAG in charge of the division having cognizance over the subject matter (i.e., here the Antitrust Division). The assignment therein to the Criminal Division of a "concurrence" role is in part explained by a letter of January 29, 1971, from the Deputy Attorney General as follows:

> The Criminal Division has been designated by the Attorney General to act as a central "clearing house" and a records repository. Accordingly, requests for authorization to issue immunity orders should be directed to the Immunity Unit of the Criminal Division, which in turn, will direct agency requests to the proper Division having cognizance of the Act under which the agency proceeding is being conducted.

Moreover, in the concurrence letter prepared for Petersen, the limited extent of the role played by the Criminal Division (as seen by itself) is indicated: "We have searched our files for information with respect to the following person for whom immunity clearance has been requested: [naming the person]."

Department of Justice personnel, arguing for the FTC,* urge—and, I conclude, convincingly—as follows:

> The purpose and function of the Criminal Division in concurring in the approval and authorization by the Antitrust Division of the issuance of the instant immunity orders is a housekeeping function to facilitate the orderly and coordinated operation of the Department of Justice under 18 U.S.C. § 6001 et seq. That function is intended merely to provide, as a matter of intradepartmental comity, an opportunity for the Criminal Division to determine whether a grant of immunity might embarrass an on-going investigation or a current or prospective criminal matter with the Criminal Division. The concurrence is, therefore, merely a statement that the Criminal Division has no objection to the proposed immunization, but assumes no responsibility of overview.

[5] Assuming arguendo that proof could be discovered showing the lack of personal attention by Petersen or his deputy, I nevertheless conclude that this would be a deviation from a regulation designed for the benefit of the government, of a "housekeeping" nature, and from which the defendants would not have suffered prejudice. See Centex Const'n Co. v. United States, 162 Ct.Cl. 211, 221 (1963); Starzec v. United States, 145 Ct.Cl. 25, 31 (1959).

There being no material issues of fact requiring discovery or resolution by trial, the FTC is entitled to an appropriate order compelling the testimony of the defendants.

Therefore, upon the findings and conclusions and for the reasons indicated, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that Norman J. Foucha, Bobby G. Smith, Robert L. Campbell and Jean Smith be, and they hereby are, directed to appear before a duly appointed administrative law judge of the Federal Trade Commission at a time and place to be designated on behalf of the Federal Trade Commission, and then and there to testify in accordance with the subpoenas ad testificandum issued by the Commission on March 8, 1972.

It is further ordered that the costs of this proceeding be taxed against the defendants named in the foregoing paragraph.

JOHN SPECTOR v. F.T.C., ET AL.‡

Civ. A. No. 72–490–GT. F.T.C. File 99–141

(United States District Court, Southern District of California, March 19, 1973)

In action seeking declaratory relief that the FTC Act was not applicable to plaintiff and that application of Act would violate plaintiff's constitutional right to freedom of speech and press and would violate his right of equal protection of the laws and due process, court held that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction because plaintiff failed to exhaust his administrative remedies.

---

*By order of March 28, 1973, the court amended the phrase "Department of Justice personnel, arguing for the Federal Trade Commission," to read "Commission and Department of Justice Personnel, arguing for the Federal Trade Commission."

Before THOMPSON, Jr., District Judge.

ORDER

In this action the plaintiff seeks declaratory relief requesting this Court to declare that the "Federal Trade Commission Act does not apply to plaintiff and that the application of said Act to plaintiff would be in violation of his constitutional rights of freedom of speech and press and would violate his right of equal protection of the laws and due process of law," and in the alternative, that "in the event the Court holds that said Act does apply," plaintiff seeks a declaration "that plaintiff is not in violation of such Act" and "that plaintiff may use the advertisement attached to the Complaint as exhibit 'A' within inter-state [sic] commerce."

The defendant moved this Court to dismiss the action in its entirety, or in the alternative, for summary judgment in its favor pursuant to Rule 56 of F.R.Civ.P.

The matter having been submitted for decision by the Court on the written memoranda of the respective parties hereto, having waived oral argument, and the Court having been fully advised in the matter,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED THAT:

1. The motion of the defendant to dismiss the action for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted is granted for the reasons stated in the defendant's memoranda of contentions of law and fact, namely that this Court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter as there exists no actual controversy as required by the Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, and the Federal Trade Commission has not challenged the legality of the plaintiff's advertising under Sections 5 or 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 45 and 52. Further, the plaintiff has not exhausted his administrative remedies before attempting to resort to judicial review thereof; Public Service Commission of Utah v. Wycoff Co., Inc., 344 U.S. 237 (1952), and Whitney National Bank v. New Orleans Bank and Trust Co., 379 U.S. 411, 420–21 (1965); accordingly,

2. This action is dismissed in its entirety, with prejudice.

F.T.C. v. PEPSICO, INC.*

No. 803, Docket 73-1381. F.T.C. Docket 8903

(United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, April 3, 1973)

1. FIRST TEST TO BE APPLIED BY APPELLATE COURT IN DETERMINING WHETHER TO PRELIMINARILY ENJOIN CONSUMMATION OF MERGER, WAS WHETHER OR NOT F.T.C. HAD ESTABLISHED REASONABLE PROBABILITY THAT ACQUIRING CORPORATION WAS IN VIOLATION OF CLAYTON ACT.

   [24] In determining whether to preliminarily enjoin consummation of merger, first test to be applied by Court of Appeals was whether or not Federal Trade Commission had established reasonable probability that acquiring corporation was in violation of antiacquisition provision of Clayton Act.

2. IN VIEW OF CONCENTRATION OF SOFT DRINK INDUSTRY, THERE WAS REASONABLE PROBABILITY OF VIOLATION OF THE CLAYTON ACT; AND ACCORDINGLY, FIRST TEST FOR ISSUANCE OF PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION AGAINST CONSUMMATION WAS MET.

   In view of concentration of soft drink industry, where four companies controlled 70.6% of market, and difficulty of entry because of necessity of bottling facilities and huge advertising outlays, there was reasonable probability of violation of antiinjunction provision of Clayton Act if merger were consummated between acquiring company which was principally engaged in soft drink business and stood second in national market, and acquired company, which was principally engaged in manufacture and distribution of beer but which owned subsidiary which controlled .3% of soft drink market; accordingly, first test for issuance of preliminary injunction against consummation was met.

3. IN HIGHLY CONCENTRATED MARKET, EVEN SLIGHT AGGREGATIONS ARE VIEWED WITH SUSPICION.

   Even slight aggregations are viewed with suspicion in highly concentrated market.

4. QUESTION OF WHETHER DIVESTITURE SUBSEQUENT TO VIOLATIVE MERGER SHOULD BE TOTAL OR PARTIAL DEPENDS ON FACTS IN EACH CASE.

   Question of whether divestiture subsequent to merger in violation of antiacquisition provision of Clayton Act should be total or partial depends on facts in each case.

5. EQUITIES MUST BE BALANCED WHEN SUPPLICANT SEEKS INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.

   When supplicant seeks injunctive relief, equities must be balanced.

6. INTENTIONS OF ACQUIRING COMPANY MAY BE CONSIDERED IN DETERMINING WHETHER CONSUMMATION OF MERGER SHOULD BE ENJOINED.

   Intentions of acquiring company are not to be considered in determining whether antiacquisition provision of Clayton Act has been violated, but may be considered in determining whether consummation of merger should be preliminarily enjoined.

*Reported in 477 F 2d 24 (1973). For case before the Commission, see 83 F.T.C. 1298.

7. WHERE ACQUIRING CORPORATION AGREED TO HOLD SEPARATE SOFT DRINK OPERATIONS OF ACQUIRED CORPORATION, IT WAS INAPPROPRIATE TO PRELIMINARY ENJOIN MERGER.

Where acquiring corporation which was principally engaged in soft drink business agreed to hold separate soft [25] drink operations of acquired corporation, which corporation was principally engaged in manufacture and distribution of beer but which owned soft drink subsidiary, it was inappropriate to preliminarily enjoin merger; provided, however, that proposed escape clause giving acquiring corporation unilateral option of terminating merger agreement on 30 days' notice be eliminated, and that management of acquiring corporation agree not to divest acquired corporation of its beer business or assets or any part thereof pending resolution of expedited action before Federal Trade Commission.

Court held where acquiring corporation agreed to hold separate soft drink operations of acquired corporation, it was inappropriate to preliminarily enjoin merger. Injunction denied.

Before HAYS, MULLIGAN and OAKES, Circuit Judges.

MULLIGAN, Circuit Judge:

[25] This is an original action by the Federal Trade Commission (Commission) for a preliminary injunction and other relief pursuant to the All Writs Act (28 U.S.C. § 1651(a)). The Supreme Court has held in FTC v. Dean Foods Co., 384 U.S. 597, 86 S.Ct. 1738, 16 L.Ed.2d 802 (1966), that the Courts of Appeals have jurisdiction to issue preliminary injunctions to prevent the consummation of mergers upon a showing that effective remedial orders would otherwise be virtually impossible, thus rendering a final divestiture decree after a Commission determination, futile. The stated purpose of the petition here is to preserve the status quo pendente lite of Rheingold Corporation (Rheingold) in aid of this Court's jurisdiction under Section 11(c) of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 21(c)) and Section 5(c) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45(c)), to review final orders of the Federal Trade Commission. The Commission urges that the acquisition by PepsiCo, Inc. (PepsiCo) of 83% of the stock of Rheingold will eventually be determined to violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. The Commission further takes the position that its ability to enter an effective order will "probably" by gravely impaired unless Rheingold's separate existence is maintained and the independence of its present management preserved.

I

PepsiCo is primarily engaged in the manufacture and distribution of beverage concentrates and syrups and the production and distribution of soft drinks (soft drink business). PepsiCo is a diversified company and is engaged in other services and sales not here pertinent. The soft drink business of PepsiCo essentially consists of manufacturing soft drink concentrates, bottled either by PepsiCo or its franchised independent bottlers. Its products are merchandised under the trade names Pepsi-Cola, Diet Pepsi-Cola, Patio, Teem and Mountain Dew. In 1971, PepsiCo had net sales of $1.3 billion and a net income after taxes of about $63 million. In that year it was the second largest seller of soft drink concentrates nationwide, occupying 16.3% of the market. The Coca Cola Company heads the soft drink industry with an estimated 42% share of the market in 1971.

Rheingold is primarily engaged in the manufacture and distribution of beer which accounts for about 70% of its sales. It also manufactures and distributes soft drink concentrates and syrup [26] and produces and merchandises soft drinks. Its soft drink business constitutes about 30% of its sales but accounts for 75% of its profits. Rheingold is a franchised independent bottler for PepsiCo in southern California, Puerto Rico, Mexico, and Florida. In 1971 Rheingold had net sales of about $230 million, making a net profit after taxes of about $4 million. Rheingold acquired the Grapette Company, a soft drink concentrate manufacturer, in August, 1970, changing its name to Flavette. Flavette then purchased two small soft drink companies, Dr. Wells and Mason & Mason. Flavette, excluding Mason & Mason's root beer, also utilized independent franchised bottlers and serves a geographic area containing some 50 million people. Since 1970 Flavette has franchised some 81 independent bottlers.

The soft drink concentrate business is presently highly concentrated and growing, with total sales increasing from $353 million in 1967 to $450 million in 1971. Coca Cola and PepsiCo combined to control some 58.3% of the business. The top four companies in 1971, account for 70.6% of the industry. The Federal Trade Commission takes the position that the soft drink business is not easily entered. Soft drinks are made from concentrates which are typically sold and distributed by franchised bottlers who are responsible for the promotion of the business in the franchised territory and who normally own the facilities for bottling and canning the concentrate. New entrants face the barrier of competing against well-established brands which are prolifically advertised. It is estimated that an annual expenditure of $50 million for advertising expenses over a 5 to 8 year period is necessary to establish a new product on a nationwide scale. The Commission also argues that obtaining adequate bottling and canning facilities plus the acquisition of technical know-how present barriers for prospective entrants into the business.

PepsiCo first published its offer to purchase 1,600,000 shares of common stock of Rheingold on October 25, 1972. This offer was later amended to purchase all shares in excess of 1,600,000 if they were tendered before the close of business on November 16, 1972. On November 15, the Federal Trade Commission commenced complaint proceedings, urging that the acquisition violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18)[1] as well as Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45).[2] The Commission did not seek at this point to enjoin the tender offer PepsiCo and the Commission then entered into the negotiation of a hold-separate agreement. The Commission agreed in the interim not to file any action requiring PepsiCo to hold Rheingold assets separate until December 4, 1972 and PepsiCo agreed not to assume or exercise actual control over Rheingold if its tender offer proved successful. The offer was successful and PepsiCo now owns 83% of the shares of Rheingold which it acquired for a cash investment of some $57 million. On December 1, 1972, the Commission withdrew its complaint for the purpose of entering into a consent order. PepsiCo made an offer on January 15, 1973 subsequently modified on January 30, 1973, but the proposal was rejected by a 3–2 vote of the Commission. The matter was returned to the adjudicatory process on [27] February 7, 1973 and PepsiCo notified the Commission on March 2, 1973 that it was terminating the hold-separate agreement of November 16, 1972.

No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly.

Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful.

volved without the benefit of any agency determination or a record which would provide the detailed economic and corporate data normally available in comparable litigation. It is established, however, that the first test which we must apply is whether or not the Commission has established a "reasonable probability" that the respondent is in violation of the statute. FTC v. OKC Corp., 1970 CCH Trade Cas. ¶ 73,288 (5th Cir., July 8, 1970); see United States v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 320 F.2d 509, 523–524 (3d Cir. 1963); United States v. IT&T, 306 F. [2, 3] In our view, the Federal Trade Commission has sustained its burden with respect to this aspect of the case. This is basically a horizontal merger[3] since PepsiCo in acquiring Rheingold has purchased a subsidiary (Flavette) competing with PepsiCo in the soft drink business. Flavette's share of the national soft drink non-cola market is about 1% and about .3% if cola drinks are included.[4] Anti-trust concern here is prompted by the undoubted fact that PepsiCo stands Number 2 in the national soft drink market where four companies control 70.6% of the business. The Supreme Court in a series of cases United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441, 461–462, 84 S.Ct. 1738, 12 L.Ed. 2d 953 (1964); United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 377 U.S. 271, 279, 84 S.Ct. 1283, 12 L.Ed. 2d 314 (1964); United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 365 n. 42, 83 S.Ct. 1715, 10 L.Ed. 2d 915 (1963), and our own Court recently in Stanley Works v. FTC, 469 F. 2d 498, 507–508 (1972), have held that even slight aggregations are viewed with suspicion in a highly concentrated market.[5] In Stanley Works, four leading companies domi-

[3] Since Rheingold is also a franchised bottler of PepsiCo there are vertical dimensions here as well. PepsiCo states that pursuant to a 1968 consent order negotiated with the Commission, Docket No. 8606, PepsiCo is permitted to purchase its own franchised bottlers even though they are engaged in the concentrate business. In view of our disposition on this matter, the point is not material.

[4] At this stage of the proceedings there is no indication of any particular geographic market (section of the counrty) in which PepsiCo and Rheingold through Flavette are actually competing. Moreover, the "line of commerce" or product market may eventually be narrowed in litigation. The complaint of the FTC in its definitional paragraph defines soft drinks and concentrates to include all non-alcoholic carbonated beverages. Whether cola drinks are sufficiently non-interchangeable in terms of price, quality and use so as to constitute a separate relevant product market, is a question which has not been determined or even briefed, yet both parties make reference to a non-cola market. On the basis of the complaint, we can only assume that the geographic market is nationwide, that the product market is all carbonated soft drinks and that Flavette's share is .3%.

[5] We are not unaware that the Merger Guidelines of the United States Department of Justice define a highly concentrated market as one in which the shares of the four largest firms amount to approximately 75% or more. However, this action has been nated only 50% of the market. The acquisition by a company, which controlled 1% of the market, of a competitor with [28] a market share of 22 to 24% was found to be in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act and not de minimis.

There are two other factors which weigh the balance here in the Commission's favor. The number of bottlers has steadily declined from 5,400 in 1948 to 2,300 in 1971 as the result of combinations. Moreover between 1958 and 1972 PepsiCo has acquired ten bottlers which were previously its independent franchisees.

We have examined the opinons of the Supreme Court since the 1950 amendment to Section 7 of the Clayton Act and recall as a practical consideration Mr. Justice Stewart's comment in his dissenting opinion in United States v. Von's Grocery Co., 384 U.S. 270, 301, 86 S.Ct. 1478, 1495, 16 L.Ed.2d 555 (1966): "The sole consistency that I can find [in the Supreme Court cases] is that in litigation under § 7, the Government always wins." We appreciate that the Commission here need not establish any actual anti-competitive effects but only an incipiency. The reasonable probability of establishing probable as distinguished from actual competitive injury, is in our view predictable here in light of the concentration of the industry and the difficulty of new entry which requires bottling facilities and huge advertising outlays.[6]

III

The Commission seeks a preliminary injunction which will effectively prevent PepsiCo from exercising and assuming control over Rheingold until the issuance of a final order in the administrative proceeding. The exercise of this control, in the view of the Commission, is incompatible with the preservation of Rheingold as an entity having the capabilities and resources for becoming an important competitor through Flavette in the production and sale of soft drink concentrates. The agency urges that PepsiCo will be primarily interested in the sale of its own cola concentrates and to the extent that it is interested in selling non-cola drinks it will be faced with a conflict between pushing its own PATIO line and the Flavette brands. Moreover, the Commission is concerned that PepsiCo will dispose of the beer business of Rheingold and that this would deprive Flavette of the benefit of initiated by the Federal Trade Commission, not the Department of Justice. It is further noted that the top four companies which controlled 66.3% of the business in 1965 controlled 70.6% of the industry in 1971.

[6] The particular significance of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act as a basis for relief here is not apparent either from an examination of the complaint or the brief of the Commission before us. It may eventually articulate its views. See FTC v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 92 S.Ct. 898, 31 L.Ed.2d 170 (1972). In the meantime we assume that the violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act also constitutes a violation of Section 5. Stanley Works v. FTC, supra, 469 F.2d at 499 n. 2.

Rheingold's total resources in its efforts to establish itself as a "toehold" competitor in the soft drink concentrate industry. While granting that Flavette's business is a small part of Rheingold's overall operation, the Commission believes that its competitive potential rests upon Rheingold's full resources and therefore a divestiture limited to disposing of the offending lines of commerce alone could not provide effective relief. Admitting that PepsiCo will be harmed at this stage of the proceeding if it is required to refrain from exercising control of Rheingold, the Commission has advised that it will set up an expedited time schedule ensuring that all administrative proceedings, including the Commission's final decision, will be concluded by September 10, 1973. It therefore urges this Court to enjoin PepsiCo from taking any steps to assume or exercise control of Rheingold, from taking any other action which will change or influence the present directors or management of Rheingold, diminish its operations, change its corporate structure or dispose of any of its assets.

[4] Under FTC v. Dean Foods Co., supra, the Supreme Court has held that an injunction can issue only if the Commission can show that "an effective remedial order, once the merger was im[29]plemented, would otherwise be virtually impossible, thus rendering the enforcement of any final decree of divestiture futile." 384 U.S. at 605, 86 S.Ct. at 1743 (emphasis added).[7] While the Commission has persuaded us that there is a reasonable probability that the merger here will violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act, we are totally unpersuaded that a remedial divestiture order will ultimately be "virtually impossible" of achievement. The Commission is proceeding on the premise that divestiture of the entire Rheingold company will be the only effective remedy. On the contrary we see no reason why such drastic relief at least at this stage, should be presumed appropriate. Assuming that the Commission is successful in its adjudicatory proceeding, whether the divestiture should be total or partial must depend upon the facts in each case.[8] It is clear here that the only offending assets are the subsidiary businesses of Flavette and Mason & Mason which represent a minor though profitable segment of Rheingold's business.

[7] The Commission's brief seems to argue that all it must establish is that an ultimate effective order will probably be effectively impaired unless Rheingold's separate existence and incumbent management is preserved. The Supreme Court has placed a much greater burden on the Commission. It must establish no probability here but "virtual impossibility." In view of the extraordinary nature of the remedy proposed, the burden is justifiably imposed.

[8] While complete divestiture is "simple, relatively easy to administer, and sure" (United States v. E. I du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 331, 81 S.Ct. 1243, 1252, 6 L.Ed.2d 318 (1961)), it is not necessarily the most appropriate means for restoring competition. A primary concern is whether the offending line of commerce, if disassociated from the merged entities, can survive as a viable, independent entity. See, e. g., OKC Corp. v. FTC, 455 F.2d 1159 (10th Cir. 1972) (partial divestiture inappropriate since the offending line of commerce could not survive independently). See also Comment, Divesti-

The Commission's major if not sole argument that total divestiture is necessary, is that Flavette will need the total resources of Rheingold plus the expressed determination of its incumbent management to break into the soft drink industry. The record before us gives scant support, if any, to the proposition that the present Rheingold management has that capacity. Rheingold's share in the beer market is declining. It lost money in 1972 on its beer operation and projects a loss of between $2 million and $7 million in 1973. No final budget plan has been developed in fact for the 1973 brewery operation. We have examined affidavits before us which indicate that Rheingold's cash position is precarious. Rheingold's earnings per share have declined from $1.84 in 1970 to $1.25 in 1971 and are estimated at $.45 per share in 1972. In December, 1972, Rheingold announced the omission of its regular quarterly cash dividend. Rheingold has emphasized its beer business and Flavette is not prospering. Flavette has incurred losses of more than a half million dollars from the time of its acquisition by Rheingold in the fall of 1970 to December 31, 1972. Its share in the total soft drink concentrate market has declined from 5% in 1968 to .3% in 1971.

The Commission in oral argument suggested that the present management of Rheingold was contemplating the acquisition of another regional beer manufacturer, Piels, as a possible means of increasing its business. It is somewhat anomalous that the Commission should cite an obvious horizontal merger, which it admittedly has not studied, as a basis for preserving Rheingold. The Commission also cites as persuasive the statement of Rheingold's Chairman on the [30] Flavette acquisition that combination of selling beer and soft drinks "provides Rheingold with a good deal of clout in the supermarkets." The antitrust significance of this sort of "clout" also seems to have escaped the agency which is charged with the enforcement of Section 3 as well as section 7 of the Clayton Act.

[5] We must balance the equities when a supplicant seeks injunctive relief [9] and we find that PepsiCo has invested $57 million in acquiring an 83% interest in a company, including substantially all of the stock of a management which the Commission insists remain at the helm. PepsiCo is opposed to a Piels acquisition as imprudent and detrimental to the interests of PepsiCo as well as the minority stockholders of Rheingold. We of course cannot predict whose business judgment is sounder but the Commission is in no better position. It did not seek to enjoin the acquisition of the shares by PepsiCo and in view of the fait accompli of 83% control and the staggering investment made, ture of Illegally Held Assets: Observations on its Scope, Objective, and Limitations, 64 Mich.L.Rev. 1574, 1587–1588 (1966). Many other factors, however, are relevant and must be considered. United States v. Reid Roller Bit Co., 274 F. Supp. 573, 584–592 (W.D.Okl. 1967) (partial divestiture appropriate).

[9] United States v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., supra, 320 F.2d at 525; United States v. Atlantic Richfield Co., supra, 297 F. Supp. at 1073–74.

we are not persuaded that we should deprive PepsiCo of its corporate managerial responsibilities particularly when incumbent management has divested itself of its stock interests.

[6] While it is elementary that PepsiCo's intentions in acquiring Rheingold are not to be considered in determining whether a Section 7 Clayton Act violation occurred, it is helpful to examine them now in light of the extraordinary relief which is sought. PepsiCo very probably has no interest in the beer business and in fact urges that its acquisition was motivated by Rheingold's diversion of the income from the soft drink bottling business to salvage its beer business, to the detriment of its PepsiCo franchises in Puerto Rico, Mexico City and California. PepsiCo argues that Rheingold was not properly expanding and exploiting certain territorial markets which could be profitable to PepsiCo. PepsiCo further urges that it will make capital investments and operational changes which will maximize the earnings potential not only of Rheingold but Flavette. PepsiCo states flatly that third parties have already indicated an interest in purchasing Flavette. We therefore do not find that Flavette's viability as a competitor in the soft dring business will be at all assured by the perpetuation of Rheingold as it is presently constituted and managed. Nor are we persuaded that the separation of Flavette if it is eventually ordered, will be virtually impossible of achievement.

While we are fully aware of the fact that there may well be a difference between promise and performance, any doubt in our mind is dissipated by PepsiCo's willingness to enter into a hold-separate agreement to preserve and protect the Rheingold concentrate and domestic soft drink bottling assets so that the Commission and this Court, in the event that a violation of Section 7 shall be found, will be able to order effective divestiture relief. To this end PepsiCo has advised that the Flavette subsidiaries and the Mason & Mason root beer concentrate operations will be operated as a separate identifiable business entity, that the presently utilized trademarks and trade names will be preserved and protected by that entity and will be continued to be used by it to identify the products involved. In the event of a divestiture order, the business entity will have assets, facilities and equipment and a sales and distribution system equal to that which it had before the acquisition of PepsiCo. Even if divestiture of the franchised bottling operation in the United States is ordered, PepsiCo has agreed that assets, facilities and equipment, sales and distribution systems will be equal to or better than before the PepsiCo acquisition. Moreover, PepsiCo has announced its agreement to [31] continue to sell Flavette through Rheingold bottlers and to guarantee that Flavette sales will increase at least the industry rate during the pendency of the complaint. Realistically in view of the necessity of Rheingold to deal with labor problems, the banking industry and the business community during this crucial period, it would appear to us to be totally inequitable to prevent PepsiCo from now guiding and operating this company when long range decisions vitally affecting its stockholders must be made. At the same time we see no great hardship in requiring PepsiCo to continue the Rheingold beer operation and to maintain its assets until such time as the expedited administrative proceedings are terminated.

[7] In the light of all the circumstances, we conclude that no preliminary injunction should issue here on the condition that the proposed hold-separate agreement be promptly entered into by the parties. We add two further conditions:

First, that the proposed escape clause giving PepsiCo the unilateral option of terminating the agreement on 30 days' prior written notice to the Commission be eliminated.

Second, that the new management agree not to divest Rheingold of its beer business or assets or any part thereof pending the resolution of the expedited action promised by the FTC for its administrative proceedings. The Commission and PepsiCo are directed to enter into such an agreement and the temporary restraining order of this Court will be thereupon dissolved.

Jurisdiction is retained for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to this proceeding to apply to this Court for such orders and directions as may be necessary for the construction or carrying out of this order, for the modification of any provisions thereof, and for the enforcement of and compliance therewith and punishment for violations thereof.

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION

This matter having come on for hearing before this Court and the Court having considered petitioner's verified application for a temporary injunction and other relief filed pursuant to Section 13(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53(a), the attachments thereto, and other papers filed by the parties, this Court finds as follows:

1. Jurisdiction to grant this Temporary Injunction is conferred by Section 13(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53 (a). Respondents Robert E. Sheldon, Beverlee Sheldon, also known as Beverlee Choate, and Terry Lee Armas, III, are within the territorial jurisdiction of this Court since they maintain their office and principal place of business at 8151 Broadway, Suite 110, San Antonio, Texas.

2. Respondents disseminate, and cause to be disseminated, advertisements in commerce and through the United States mails. Section 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 52.

3. Such advertisements are disseminated for the purpose of inducing and are likely to induce, directly or indirectly, the purchase of respondents' cosmetic process.

4. Respondents' cosmetic process is either a drug or a cosmetic or both, as defined in Sections 15 (b) and (c) of the Federal Trade Commisison Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 55(b) and (c).

5. Petitioner, the Federal Trade Commission, an agency of the United States Government, has reason to believe that certain advertisements distributed either directly or indirectly by respondents in interstate commerce (Exhibits 1, 2, 3, 5, 6 and 7 to Petitioner's application) contain numerous false and misleading statements.

6. Petitioner also has reason to believe that contrary to representations made in respondents' advertising:

a. Respondents' cosmetic process is a procedure involving chemical surgery in the removal of the outer layers of skin.

b. Respondents' cosmetic process involves abrasive chemicals which induce second degree burns to peel the outer layers of skin and which in fact can cause excruciating pain in some cases.

c. Only minor manifestations of aging such as very fine wrinkles in carefully selected patients can be removed by face peeling under optimum medical conditions. Even when conducted by professional medical cosmetic surgeons under closely-controlled clinical conditions and with optimum results, the more youthful appearance will rarely last more than 18 months, at the end of which time the patient will again appear his or her actual chronological age.

d. Those receiving cosmetic face peels cannot reasonably expect that their appearance will be altered by more than a year or two from their actual chronological age, even when optimum results are obtained by professional medical cosmetic surgeons.

e. The cosmetic and respondents' cosmetic process are not safe but involve the inducement of the second degree burns of the skin, a process known as chemo-surgery, which is inherently dangerous unless performed by professional medical cosmetic surgeons under closely-controlled clinical conditions. When not properly administered by such professionals, the cosmetic can cause severe pain, uncontrolled and excessive burning of the skin, infection, disease and scarring.

f. Respondents' cosmetic process involving facial rejuvenation through face peels is not widely accepted by the medical profession. Rather, many professional medical cosmetic surgeons will not conduct face peels because of the possible adverse side effects, and normally the great majority of patients who request face peels from professional medical cosmetic surgeons are refused due to allergies, skin sensitivity and other factors.

g. Respondents are not trained professionals. Beverlee Sheldon is not a registered nurse nor is Robert Sheldon a chemist or licensed pharmacist.

7. Petitioner has issued an administrative complaint under Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, charging respondents with violations of Sections 5 and 12 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 45, 52. Pending the completion of administrative proceedings and until the complaint is dismissed by the Commission or set aside by a court of appeals upon review of administrative proceedings, or the order of the Commission to cease and desist made thereon has become final within the meaning of Section 5 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, the Commission in the interim has no effective way of protecting the public from the continued dissemination by respondents, directly or indirectly, of advertisements that the Commission has reason to believe are false and misleading, except by the issuance of this temporary injunction.

Accordingly, a proper showing having been made by Petitioner, it is now by this Court hereby Ordered, That respondents Robert E. Sheldon, Beverlee Sheldon, also known as Beverlee Choate, and Terry Lee Armas, III, individuals doing business as Rejuvenation Center Ltd., and respondents' agents, representatives and employees, be and the same are hereby temporarily enjoined pending the completion of petitioner's administrative proceedings and until the administrative complaint therein is dismissed by the Commission or set aside by a court of appeals upon review of the administrative proceeding, or the order of the Commission to cease and desist made thereon has become final within the meaning of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, as follows:

A. Respondents are enjoined from representing directly or by implication:

1. That respondents' cosmetic process involving skin peeling or any other similar process does not involve chemical surgery.
2. That respondents' cosmetic process involving skin peeling is painless and involves no use of caustics.
3. That respondents' cosmetic process will permanently remove signs of aging.
4. That respondents' cosmetic process will cause their clients to appear any specific number of years younger than their actual chronological age.
5. That respondents' cosmetic process is a safe procedure free from possible serious side effects or complications.
6. That respondents' cosmetic process is widely accepted by the medical profession as performed by respondents.
7. That respondents are professionals in the field of medicine, or that any of them is a registered nurse, chemist or pharmacist.
8. That prospective clients should not seek medical advice or have skin sensitivity or allergy tests conducted prior to subjection to respondents' cosmetic process.

B. Respondents are enjoined from disseminating or causing to be disseminated the advertisements which are attached to and incorporated in petitioner's Application as Exhibits 1, 2, 3, 5, 6 and 7, or any other advertisements of like import.

C. Respondents are enjoined from advertising, offering for sale, selling or in any manner applying or dispensing their cosmetic process or any other like process unless they make clear and conspicuous disclosures in all advertising and in all oral sales presentations:

1. That respondents' cosmetic process resembles a chemosurgical process in which the outer layers of skin are burned chemically and are later peeled away, and that because of the chemical nature of respondents' cosmetic process there is a probability of discomfort and pain, and risks of infection, disease and permanent scarring.

2. That should the above-described adverse side effects result, respondents are not professionals equipped or trained to provide the necessary medical aid and attention to their clients.

4.* That many professional medical cosmetic surgeons refuse to perform skin peeling procedures on the majority of those requesting the treatment due to the possibility of complications which may arise, and further that even those professional medical cosmetic surgeons who will perform such procedures will do so only under clinical conditions and only after a consultation and review of relevant medical history.

5. That respondents are not licensed to practice medicine or to prescribe or dispense drugs or cosmetics which by law may be prescribed or dispensed only by a doctor or pharmacist.

6. That prospective clients should consult with a physician concerning skin sensitivity or possible allergic reactions prior to subjection to respondents' cosmetic process.

It is further ordered, That respondents:

1. Distribute a copy of this order to each of their agents, representatives, and employees, and obtain written acknowledgement of receipt from such persons.

2. Provide each present and prospective client with a separate disclosure sheet containing the information required in subparagraph C of this order, and prior to applying the cosmetic process require such prospective client after receipt of this disclosure sheet to consult with a duly licensed physician of the client's choice, who is not associated financially with respondents, regarding the nature of the process which resembles a chemo-surgical process, and the possibilities of discomfort, pain, infection, disease, and scarring, and obtain from such prospective clients and retain a certification signed by said licensed physician, who was consulted as required herein, such certification specifying that said physician has examined the prospective client for general mental and physical health and has tested the prospective client for skin sensitivity, possible allergic reaction, and blood characteristics, and on the basis of such examination and tests has explained to the prospective client that the process resembles a chemosurgical process, and has advised the prospective client of the probabilities of discomfort and pain, and risks of infection, skin disease and scarring.

3. Set forth the disclosures required in subparagraph C of this order separately and conspicuously from the balance of each advertisement or presentation used in connection with the advertising, offering for sale, sale, or distribution of respondents' cosmetic process, and shall devote no less than 15% of each advertisement or presentation to such disclosures; provided, however, that in advertisements which consist of less than 10 column inches in newspapers or periodicals, and in radio or television advertisements with a running time of one minute or less, respondents may substitute the following statement, in lieu of the above requirements:

Warning: This application involves chemical surgery whereby chemicals are applied to various parts of the body and skin is peeled away. Discomfort, pain, and medical problems may occur. Continuing care is necessary. Consult your own physician.

No less than 15% of such advertisements shall be devoted to this disclosure, such disclosure shall be set forth clearly and conspicuously from the balance of each of such advertisements, and if such disclosure is in a newspaper or periodical, it shall be in at least eleven point type.

4. Promptly notify the Federal Trade Commission of the discontinuation of their present business or employment and of their affiliation with a new business or employment in Texas or in any other state or territory. Such notices shall include respondents' current business or employment in which they are engaged as well as a description of their duties and responsibilities.

5. Furnish to the Federal Trade Commission a complete list of the names and addresses of respondents' present and past customers, together with the date or dates on which such customers were subjected to respondents' cosmetic process.

This temporary injunction is issued without bond on the part of the petitioner.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

This cause came before the Court for trial without a jury on Petitioner's verified "Petition for an Order Requiring Respondent to Appear and Produce Documentary Evidence in an Investigation Being Conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, and for Declaratory Relief," and on Respondent's Counterclaim for Declaratory Relief and Motion to Dismiss for Failure to Join Indispensable Parties. For the reasons developed below, the Court has determined that the declaratory relief sought by Petitioner should be denied, the declaratory relief sought by Respondent granted in part and Respondent's Motion to Dismiss denied.

I. BACKGROUND

Acting pursuant to the authority granted by section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 49, and to its resolution dated January 18, 1972, the Federal Trade Commission, Petitioner herein, has been conducting an investigation of the acts and practices of certain consumer reporting agencies, including Respondent Retail Credit Company, to determine whether there is a violation of the provisions of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681 et seq., and section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. §45.

In connection with the investigation, Petitioner, on April 1, 1972, issued a subpoena duces tecum to Respondent Manager, Retail Credit Company, Miami Branch Office, returnable in Washington, D.C., or by mail. The Retail Cred[349]it Company is a consumer reporting agency in the business of securing and storing information about consumers and selling such information to business concerns to assist them in making business decisions. The information is used in determining the consumer's fitness for life, health, fire and casualty insurance, or the job applicant's employability, and includes the consumer's credit worthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living. Consumer reporting agencies communicate this information to their business customers by means of consumer reports.

Specifications 7 and 9 of the subpoena issued to Respondent sought the production of its consumer reports. Generally, specification 7 sought the complete files of all consumers who have contacted the Miami Branch Office of Retail Credit Company for disclosure of the information in their files since January 1, 1972, and specification 9 sought the complete files of all individuals investigated by four named credit investiagtors during specified periods of time ranging from six days to one month.

By letter dated May 8, 1972, to the Assistant Director for Consumer Credit and Special Programs, Bureau of Consumer Protection, Federal Trade Commission, the Retail Credit Company, by its counsel, furnished some of the information and documents sought by the subpoena, but refused to comply with specifications 7 and 9, which called for its consumer reports. As stated in the letter, the primary reasons for which Respondent refused to comply with these specifications were that it believed such compliance would violate section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681b, and would violate the rights of privacy of the consumers whose reports would be revealed.[1]

In the face of this denial, the Federal Trade Commission filed in this Court its petition seeking both an order requiring Respondent to comply with specifications 7 and 9 of the subpoena duces tecum, and a declaratory judgment that consumer reporting agencies are entitled to furnish consumer reports to the Commission irrespective of the requirements of section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act. Respondent then filed a counterclaim seeking a declaratory judgment that the Commission may not receive consumer reports from Respondent other than pursuant to the terms of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and that any consumers whose reports were sought by the Commission were indispensable parties to this litigation. It further moved to dismiss the action on the grounds that there had been a failure to join as indispensable parties the consumers whose reports were being sought.

[1] Section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act provides:

"A consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report under the following circumstances and no other:

"(1) In response to the order of a court having jurisdiction to issue such an order.

"(2) In accordance with the written instructions of the consumer to whom it relates.

"(3) To a person which it has reasons to believe—

(A) intends to use the informaton in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer on whom the information is to be furnished and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer; or

(B) intends to use the information for employment purposes; or

(C) intends to use the information in connection with the underwriting of insurance involving the consumer; or

(D) intends to use the information in connection with a determination of the consumer's eligibility for a license or other benefit granted by a governmental instrumentality required by law to consider an applicant's financial responsibility or status; or

(E) otherwise has a legitimate business need for the information in connection with a business transaction involving the consumer."

Following the filing of the petition and counterclaim herein, the Commission secured consumer reports prepared by [350] the Retail Credit Company from two insurance company users of Respondent's consumer reports, solely on the basis of the Commission's administrative subpoena duces tecum. As a result, Respondent moved for and was granted leave to amend its counterclaim to seek additional declaratory relief that the Commission may not obtain consumer reports prepared by Respondent from any person unless pursuant to the requirements of section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

II. ISSUES

The following issues are before the Court for decision. First, whether section 621(a) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681s(a), authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to obtain consumer reports from consumer reporting agencies without the written permission of the consumer or a court order as required by section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act? Second, whether section 621(a) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681s(a), authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to obtain consumer reports from sources other than consumer reporting agencies? Third, whether Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act require that this action be dismissed for Petitioner's failure to join the affected consumers as indispensable parties?

III. DISCUSSION

A. The terms of the Fair Credit Reporting Act Prevent the Federal Trade Commission from Obtaining a Consumer Report from Respondent Other Than Pursuant to an Order of a Court Having Jurisdiction to Issue Such an Order, or Pursuant to the Written Instructions of the Consumer Whose File It Seeks.

[1] The parties agree that specifications 7 and 9 of Petitioner's subpoena duces tecum call for Respondent's "consumer reports."[2] Section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act delineates the circumstances under which a consumer reporting agency is authorized to furnish such reports. Only two of the circumstances so delineated are relevant to the instant proceeding. The relevant portions of Section 604 provide:

[2] Section 603(d) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. 1681a(d) defines a "consumer report" in relevant part as follows: "The term 'consumer report' means any written, oral, or other communication of any information by a consumer reporting agency bearing on a consumer's credit worthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living which is used or expected to be used or collected in whole or in part for the purpose of serving as a factor in establishing the consumer's eligibility for (1) credit or insurance to be used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, or (2) employment purposes, or (3) other purposes authorized under section 604."

> A consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report under the following circumstances and no other:

Respondent contends that this section, particularly when taken in conjunction with section 608 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1681f, prohibits it from furnishing a consumer report in response to the administrative subpoena of any Government agency, including Petitioner. Section 608 of the Act provides:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section 604, a consumer reporting agency may furnish identifying information respecting any consumer, limited to his name, address, former address, places of employment, or former places of employment, to a government agency.

The Commission argues that it has the power to subpoena consumer reports [351] under the Act, in the absence of a court order or written consent from the consumer, by virtue of section 621(a), 15 U.S.C. § 1681s(a), which provides in pertinent part:

> The Federal Trade Commission shall have such procedural, investigative, and enforcement powers, including the power * * * to require * * * the production of documents, and the appearance of witnesses as though the applicable terms and conditions of the Federal Trade Commission Act were part of this title.

The relevant portion of the Federal Trade Commission Act is section 9, 15 U.S.C. § 49, which provides in pertinent part:

> For the purposes of this Act, the commission * * * shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against; and the commission shall have power to require by subpoena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such documentary evidence relating to any matter under investigation.

The Commission contends, and produced witnesses at trial to show, that without quick access to consumer reports, which are the primary source of information as to whether consumer reporting agencies are complying with the statute, it will not be able as a practical matter to vigorously and expeditiously enforce the Act.

There can be little doubt that the Fair Credit Reporting Act is inconsistent as regards the Commission's authority to obtain consumer reports. On the one hand, the Federal Trade Commission is charged with the duty of enforcing the Act, a duty which necessitates the efficient procurement of consumer reports from consumer reporting agencies which are the subjects of Commission investigations. In discharging its duty, the commission is generally authorized to require the production of documents. On the other hand, the Act prohibits a consumer reporting agency from furnishing consumer reports other than in compliance with the requirements set forth in section 604.

Moreover, the policy considerations underlying these provisions of the Act are in conflict as to the goals to be achieved. Inspection of consumer reports by the Federal Trade Commission would be directed primarily at protecting consumers from the failure of consumer reporting agencies to comply with the Act.[3] However, section 604 was undoubtedly directed, in part at least, at preventing investigations by governmental agencies which might seek to use the information obtained from consumer reports to prosecute the consumer.[4]

The Commission urges the Court to adopt a construction of the Fair Credit Reporting Act that would not require the Commission to follow the provisions of section 604, which it contends must be viewed in the context of the whole Act and its object and policy.[5] It argues that to require the Commission to get a court order or written permission of consumers in order to obtain reports from consumer reporting agencies would effectively stop enforcement of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and that there is a presumption against construing a statute so as to render it ineffective.[6]

[352] There can be little doubt that government agencies in general are held to the provisions of section 604. This is evidenced by section 608 of the Act, quoted above, which allows a consumer reporting agency to furnish a governmental agency with identifying information concerning a consumer. But the type and amount of information which may thus be furnished is specifically limited, and the fact that such information may be furnished to government agencies notwithstanding section 604 makes it clear that section 604 was intended to apply to government agencies as well as others seeking consumer reports.

Moreover, the legislative history of the Fair Credit Reporting Act indicates that Congress clearly intended that no government agency should receive a consumer report other than pursuant to the provisions of section 604.[7] The Senate Committee Report on S. 823 as passed by the Senate on November 6, 1969, reflects an intent and concern that consumers be secure against unlimited governmental acquisition of personal information about them.[8] The Report explained the interrelationship of section 604 and section 608 as follows:[9]

[3] The importance of such inspection is heightened by the fact that the consumers themselves cannot get copies of their own reports.

> Section 608.—Disclosure to Governmental Agencies—
> The disclosure of information to governmental agencies is limited to identifying type information * * * unless the governmental agency has obtained a court order or is a bona fide creditor, insurer, employer, or licensor.

It should be noted that no special exception is made for the Federal Trade Commission.

Despite the arguments of the Commission, the Court does not believe that it can or should create an exception to the requirements of section 604 of the Act. Nor does it believe that requiring the Commission and consumer reporting agencies to comply with the requirements of section 604 will have the drastic effects forecast by the Commission. The goals of protecting consumers by (1) enforcing compliance with the Act while (2) preventing unwarranted intrusions into their personal files can both be reached if the Court maintains flexibility in fashioning its order requiring production of the reports. Thus, the Commission may be held to the requirements of section 604 without effectively precluding it from obtaining the reports it seeks. Under these circumstances, the proper mode of statutory construction is that the specific provisions of section 604 will not be overridden by inferences from the more general congressional declarations concerning the Commission's powers and duties of enforcement.[10]

The Court will not adopt the construction urged upon it and create what would amount to special provision for the benefit of the Commission. The [353] Commission will be held to the requirements of section 604 of the Act.

B. The Federal Trade Commission Is Not Authorized to Obtain Consumer Reports from Persons Other Than Consumer Reporting Agencies, Except in Response to a Court Order or Pursuant to the Written Instructions of the Consumer Whose File It Seeks.

[2] The Commission argues that it may obtain consumer reports from users of the reports, such as insurance companies, without a court order or written permission from the consumers involved, because section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act applies only to consumer reporting agencies and not to users of the reports. The problem with this approach is that it would allow the Commission, or any other governmental agency, to obtain through indirection material which it may not obtain from consumer reporting agencies unless the requirements of section 604 are met. The right of the consumer to limit governmental access to personal data in consumer reports to those occasions when the Government agency qualifies under section 604 would thus be frustrated. Clearly it was not the intent of Congress to provide this back door approach to obtaining the desired information. The Court finds, therefore, that section 604 of the Act precludes the Commission from obtaining consumer reports from users or persons other than consumer reporting agencies unless it complies with the requirements of section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

C. Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act Do Not Require the Federal Trade Commission to Join the Affected Consumers in Any Action to Obtain a Court Order Pursuant to Section 604(1) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

[3] Because the Court has found that the Commission is bound to adhere to the requirements of section 604 of the Act, the Court shall treat its Petition in these proceedings as a request for a court order pursuant to section 604(1) of the Act. Viewing the case in this posture, Respondent contends that the action must be dismissed by the Court for the Commission's failure to join the consumers whose reports are sought, such joinder being required under Rule 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

Rule 19(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires that a person "who is subject to service of process and whose joinder will not deprive the court of jurisdiction over the subject matter" shall be joined as a party if:

> (1) in his absence complete relief cannot be accorded among those already parties, or (2) he claims an interest relating to the subject of the action and is so situated that the disposition of the action in his absence may (i) as a practical matter impair or impede his ability to protect that interest or (ii) leave any of the persons already parties subject to a substantial risk of incurring double, multiple, or otherwise inconsistent obligations by reason of his claimed interest.

Respondent argues that the consumers must be joined under Rule 19 (a) because their absence will both impair their ability to protect their rights of privacy and will expose an existing party (Respondent) to inconsistent obligations.[11]

The Court notes that Rule 19 emphasizes "the pragmatic consideration of the effects of the alternatives of pro[354]ceeding or dismissing" the action in the absence of certain persons before the Court.[12] It has determined that Rule 19(a) does not require joinder of the consumers whose reports are sought in the instant proceeding because "as a practical matter," and in view of the procedures which the court may require in allowing the Commission to obtain the reports, the consumers will be able to protect their interests in their personal privacy without being made parties to the action. Nor can the Court find that any "substantial risk" will be incurred by the Respondent if the consumers are not joined. The possibility that Respondent may become subject to a later suit by consumers for releasing their files pursuant to a court order is remote at best.

The Court further notes that joinder of all the consumers whose files are sought might well paralyze the Commission's enforcement of the law, and therefore frustrate the valid national policy expressed by the Fair Credit Reporting Act. Under these circumstances, it cannot be held that section 604 of the Act requires joinder of all affected consumers.

IV. CONCLUSION

In accordance with the aforegoing, the Court will enter an Order declaring that the Federal Trade Commission may obtain consumer reports from Respondent or any other person in possession of such reports only pursuant to a court order or with the written consent of the consumer. The Commission's Petition shall be treated as a request for a court order pursuant to section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, and that request shall be granted subject to the procedures set forth in the Order. Generally, those procedures shall require the Commission to notify by publication and mail the persons whose consumer reports are sought. Any person so notified shall have the opportunity to object to the production of his file before the Commission, and the Respondent shall not be required to produce the files of those persons indicating their objection. After proper notification, the reports of those consumers who have not objected shall be promptly forwarded to the Commission. In this manner, the interests of the consumers will be protected without necessitating their joinder in this action. The Motion of Respondent to Dismiss for Failure to Join Indispensable Parties will accordingly be denied.

[11] Respondent argues that if it produces the contents of a consumer's file pursuant to a court order issued in an action in which the consumer is not a party, it may well become subject to a later suit by the consumer for invasion of privacy, resulting from an asserted violation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act.

LEILA MOURNING v. FAMILY PUBLICATIONS SERVICE, INC.*

No. 71-829

(Supreme Court of the United States, April 24, 1973)

1. AWARENESS OF CONGRESS THAT SOME CREDITORS WOULD ATTEMPT TO CIRCUMVENT ESTABLISHED CONGRESSIONAL BOUNDARIES IN CREDIT TRANSACTIONS WAS EVIDENCED IN SECTION OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT DELEGATING BROAD AUTHORITY TO FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD TO PROMULGATE NECESSARY REGULATIONS TO RENDER ACT EFFECTIVE.

[1652] Section of Truth in Lending Act delegating to the Federal Reserve Board broad authority to promulgate necessary regulations to render Act effective evinces awareness of Congress that some creditors would attempt to characterize their transactions so as to fall one step outside whatever boundary Congress attempted to establish and desire of Congress to insure that Board has adequate power to deal with such attempts at evasion.

2. BROAD AUTHORITY DELEGATED TO FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD EMPOWERS IT TO DEFINE SUCH CLASSIFICATIONS AS ARE REASONABLY NECESSARY TO INSURE OBJECTIVES OF ACT ARE FULFILLED.

By delegating broad authority to Federal Reserve Board to promulgate regulations necessary to render Truth in Lending Act effective, Board is empowered to define such classifications as are reasonably necessary to insure that objectives of Act are fulfilled no matter what adroit or unscrupulous practices are employed by those extending credit to consumers.

3. VALIDITY OF REGULATION PROMULGATED UNDER EMPOWERING PROVISIONS OF STATUTE WILL BE SUSTAINED SO LONG AS IT IS REASONABLY RELATED TO PURPOSE OF ENABLING LEGISLATION.

Where empowering provision of statute simply states that agency may make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out provisions of Act, validity of regulation promulgated thereunder will be sustained so long as it is reasonably related to purposes of enabling legislation.

*Reported in 411 U.S. 356 (1973), 93 S.Ct. 1652 (1973). Although this case does not directly involve the Federal Trade Commission, it has been included in this publication because of the statutory authority of the F.T.C. to enforce the requirements imposed under the Truth in Lending Act.

4. In Light of Legislative History of Truth in Lending Act, Federal Reserve Board's "Four Installment Rule" Does Not Exceed Statutory Authority.

In light of legislative history of Truth in Lending Act, Federal Reserve [1653] Board in promulgating the four installment rule compelling seller to comply with disclosure requirements of Act to those to whom it extends consumer credit without finance charge if sum owed is payable in more than four installments does not exceed statutory authority and is reasonably related to its objectives of preventing the evasion of reporting requirements of Act by concealing credit charges.

5. Court Should Defer To Informed Experience and Judgment of Agency Where Reasonable Minds Differ as to Which Remedial Measures Should be Chosen.

Where reasonable minds may differ as to which of several remedial measures should be chosen, court should defer to the informed experience and judgment of agency to whom Congress delegated appropriate authority.

6. References in Truth in Lending Act to Transactions in Which a Financial Charge Is in Fact Imposed Do Not Establish Invalidity of Federal Reserve Board's "Four Installment Rule."

None of the sections of Truth in Lending Act which refer specifically to transactions involving finance charges or any other sections of Act indicate congressional attempt to list comprehensively all types of transactions to which Federal Reserve Board regulations might apply, and therefor the references in Act to transactions in which a finance charge is in fact imposed do not establish invalidity of Federal Reserve Board four installment rule requiring disclosure in some cases in which no finance charge exists.

7. Where Deterrent Effect of Rule Implements Act's Objectives, It Is Not Void Because It Requires Disclosures by Creditors Not Charging Credit.

Since deterrent effect of Federal Reserve Board four installment rule implements objectives of Truth in Lending Act, rule is not void because it also requires disclosure by some creditors who do not charge credit and thus need not be deterred.

8. Because a Few Sections of Act Provide for Civil and Criminal Penalties Does Not Mean Every Section of Act Establishing Regulatory Scheme Must be Construed as Penal Provision.

Not every section of an act establishing a broad regulatory scheme must be construed as a penal provision merely because a few sections of the act provide for civil and criminal penalties.

9. To Insure No One Is Convicted Without Previous Clear Disclosure as to Intent of Law Regarding Violation Thereof, Penal Statutes Are Narrowly Construed.

Penal statutes are construed narrowly to insure that no individual is convicted unless a fair warning has been first given to the world in language that the common world will understand of what the law intends to do if a certain line is passed.

10. WHERE DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENT IS VIOLATED BUT NO FINANCE CHARGES ARE INVOLVED, IMPOSITION OF PENALTIES UNDER SECTION OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT ASSESSING PENALTIES EQUAL TO TWICE THE AMOUNT OF IMPOSED FINANCE CHARGES BUT NOT LESS THAN $100 IS NOT FORBIDDEN.

Section of Truth in Lending Act providing that penalty assessed shall be twice the amount of finance charge imposed for not less than $100 does not forbid the imposition of civil penalty in cases in which no finance charges are involved but where a regulation requiring disclosure is violated.

11. WHERE CIVIL PENALTY PRESCRIBED IS MODEST AND PROHIBITIVE CONDUCT CLEARLY SET OUT, COURT NEED NOT CONSTRUE SECTION AS NARROWLY AS A CRIMINAL STATUTE.

Since civil penalty prescribed in Truth in Lending Act is modest and the prohibitive conduct clearly set out in regulation promulgated under Act, court need not construe the section imposing penalty as narrowly as a criminal statute providing graver penalties such as prison terms.

12. CONGRESS CANNOT BE REQUIRED TO TAILOR CIVIL PENALTY PROVISIONS TO DEAL WITH EACH STEP AGENCY FINDS NECESSARY.

Because objective in delegating rulemaking authority to an agency is to relieve Congress of the impossible burden of drafting code explicitly covering every conceivable future problem, Congress cannot be required to tailor civil penalty provisions so as to deal precisely with each step which agency thereafter finds necessary.

13. VIOLATION OF FOUR INSTALLMENT RULE WHERE FINANCE CHARGE WAS NONEXISTENT OR UNDETERMINED PROPERLY CALLS FOR IMPOSITION OF MINIMUM SANCTION UNDER SECTION 130 OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT.

Under section of Truth in Lending Act providing that penalty assessed shall be twice the amount of finance charge but not less than $100, the imposition of the minimum sanction for violation of four installment rule was proper in case in which finance charge was nonexistent or undetermined.

14. FOUR INSTALLMENT RULE DOES NOT VIOLATE FIFTH AMENDMENT.

[1654] Federal Reserve Board four installment rule regulation under Truth in Lending Act applying the disclosure requirements of Act to those extending consumer credit without finance charge if sum owed is payable in more than four installments does not violate Fifth Amendment on the ground that it establishes conclusive presumption of determinative facts.

15. STATUTORY SCHEME OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT IS WITHIN POWER GRANTED TO CONGRESS.

Statutory scheme of Truth in Lending Act is within power granted to Congress under the commerce clause.

16. SPECULATING ABOUT CONGRESSIONAL STATUTES IS NOT A FUNCTION OF THE COURT.

It is not a function of court to speculate as to whether statute is unwise or whether the evil sought to be remedied could have been better regulated in some other manner.

The Supreme Court held that in light of legislative history of Truth in Lending Act, Federal Reserve Board in promulgating four installment rule does not exceed statutory authority and rule is reasonable related to its objectives of preventing the evasion of reporting requirements of Act by Concealing credit charges; and the regulation is not invalid as creating a conclusive presumption in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, with whom MR. JUSTICE STEWART and MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST concurred, filed an opinion dissenting in part.

MR. JUSTICE POWELL filed a dissenting opinion.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1655] We granted the writ in this case to resolve whether the Federal Reserve Board exceeded its authority under § 105 of the Truth-in-Lending Act[1] in promulgating that portion of Regulation Z commonly referred to as the "Four Installment Rule."[2]

Respondent is a Delaware corporation which solicits subscriptions to several well known periodicals. In 1969, one of respondent's door-to-door salesmen called on the petitioner, a 73-year-old widow residing in Florida, and sold her a five-year subscription to four magazines. Petitioner agreed to pay $3.95 immediately and to remit a similar amount monthly for 30 months. The contract form she signed contained a clause stating that the subscriptions could not be cancelled and an acceleration provision similar to that found in many installment undertakings, providing that any default in installment payments would render the entire balance due. The contract did not recite the total purchase price of the subscriptions or the amount which remained unpaid after the initial remittance, and made no reference to service or finance charges. The total debt assumed by the petitioner was $122.45; the balance due after the initial payment was $118.50.

Petitioner made the initial payment, began to receive the magazines for which she had contracted, and then defaulted. Respondent declared the entire balance of $118.50 due and threatened legal action. Petitioner brought this suit in United States District Court, alleging that respondent had failed to comply with the disclosure provisions of the Truth-in-Lending Act. She sought recovery of the statutory penalty and reimbursement for the costs of the litigation, including reasonable attorney's fees.

In support of her claim, petitioner submitted to the District Court a series of "dunning" letters which she had received from respondent. One letter, dated December 16, 1969 stated:

> "After making the terms of our contract clear to you, we went ahead in good faith and had your subscriptions entered for the entire periods you had agreed to take. The contract you signed is: Not subject to cancellation after acceptance or verification.
> Knowing, therefore, the obligations we have incurred in your name, we feel confident that you will continue your magazine subscriptions and make the convenient monthly payments regularly and promptly.[3]

A second letter, received a week later from respondent's agent, declared:

> After an account is three months delinquent it is brought to my attention. I feel that you should realize that you [1656] are receiving our merchandise which we have paid for. Had you dealt directly with the publishers yourself, you would have had to pay them in advance for the magazines.
> Again, let me remind you that we have ordered these magazines in advance and that you have incurred an obligation to repay us. This is a credit account, and as such must be repaid by you on a monthly basis, much the same as if you had purchased any other type of merchandise on a monthly budget plan. [Emphasis supplied; underlined words are emphasized in the original letter].[4]

Respondent admitted sending each of the above letters to petitioner.[5] In addition, respondent submitted one affidavit to the District Court, describing the nature of the contracts which it offered to its clients. The affidavit stated that a customer who ordered magazine subscriptions from respondent was required to pay for all magazines during the first half of the contract term.[6] Thus, according to the affidavit, at all times during the course of contract, a purchaser who has complied with the terms of the contract has paid for more magazines than she has received. Respondent did not, however, submit any affidavit to the court contesting any of the facts stated in its "dunning" letters. On this record, both parties moved for summary judgment, declaring explicitly that no factual question remained undecided.

[5] Petitioner also submitted to the court a letter sent to her legal counsel by respondent's officer manager. The letter stated:

"Whereas, FPS, acts initially [sic] as agent for the various publishers; upon acceptance of her contract, FPS thereafter acts solely as financier and coguaranter [sic] of service with the various publishers; whereas, FPS, has fully invested in Mrs. Mourning's contract and does not receive refunds in part or full from any, or, all publishers; for said FPS, investment, we therefore, must insist on compliance of your client to the terms of said contract until fullfilment [sic] of said terms in the aforementioned contract result [sic] in mutual resolve of liability." App., at 14.

Respondent admitted that this letter had been written on its stationery by its employee, but denied that the employee was authorized to send it. Consequently, we do not consider the facts stated in the letter to have been admitted by respondent.

[6] Affidavit of Stanley R. Swanson, Vice President of Family Publications Service, Inc., Aug. 26, 1970, at 2 (District Court Record, at 198, 199). The affidavit also stated that, while customers of respondent were free to pay the entire price of their magazine subscriptions when their contract with respondent was signed, the price charged would be equal to the aggregate of the payments that would have been made had the customer elected to pay in installments. Respondent now admits that this statement was not true. In some cases, customers who agreed to pay the entire contract price immediately were charged less than the aggregate amount of the installment payments.

Section 121 of the Truth-in-Lending Act requires merchants who regularly extend credit, with attendant finance charges,[7] to disclose certain contract information "to each person to whom consumer credit is extended and upon whom a finance charge is or may be imposed. * * *"[8] Among other relevant facts, the merchant must, where applicable, list the cash price of the merchandise or service sold, the amount of finance and other charges, and the rate of the charges.[9] Failure to disclose renders the seller liable to the consumer for a penalty of twice the amount of the finance charge, but in no event less than $100 or more than $1,000.[10] The creditor may also be assessed for the costs of the litigation, including reasonable attorney's fees,[11] and in certain circum[1657]stances not relevant here, may be the subject of criminal charges.[12]

Section 105 of the Act [13] provides:

> The [Federal Reserve] Board shall prescribe regulations to carry out the purposes of [the Act]. These regulations may contain such classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of [the Act], to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate compliance therewith.

Accordingly, the Board has promulgated Regulation Z, which defines the circumstances in which a seller who regularly extends credit must make the disclosures outlined in § 128.[14] The regulation provides that disclosure is necessary whenever credit is offered to a consumer "for which either a finance charge is or may be imposed or which pursuant to an agreement, is or may be payable in more than four installments." [15]

Relying on the rule governing credit transaction of more than four installments, the District Court granted summary judgment for petitioner. The court found that respondent had extended credit to petitioner,[16] which by agreement was payable in more than four installments, but had failed to comply with the disclosure provisions of the Act.

The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the Board had exceeded its statutory authority in promulgating the regulation upon which the District Court relied. The regulation was found to conflict with § 121 of the Act [17] since it required that disclosure be made in regard to some credit transactions in which a finance charge had not been imposed. As an alternative ground for its decision, the Court of Appeals held that the regulation created a conclusive presumption that credit payments made in more than four installments included a finance charge. Relying on Schlesinger v. State of Wisconsin, 270 U.S. 230, 46 S.Ct. 260, 70 L.Ed. 557 (1926), and Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312, 52 S.Ct. 358, 76 L.Ed. 772 (1932), the court concluded that such an irrebuttable presumption of fact violated the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Passage of the Truth-in-Lending Act in 1968 culminated several years of congressional study and debate as to the propriety and usefulness of imposing mandatory disclosure requirements on those who extend credit to consumers in the American market. By the time of passage, it had become abundantly clear that the use of consumer credit was expanding at an extremely rapid rate. From the end of World War II through 1967, the amount of such credit outstanding had increased from $5.6 billion to $95.9 billion, a rate of growth more than 4½ times as great as that of the economy.[18] Yet, as the congressional hearings revealed, consumers remained remarkably ignorant of the nature of [1658] their credit obligations and of the costs of deferring payment.[19] Because of the divergent, and at times fraudulent, practices by which consumers were informed of the terms of the credit extended to them, many consumers were prevented from shopping for the best terms available and, at times, were prompted to assume liabilities they could not meet.[20] Joseph Barr, then Under Secretary of the Treasury, noted in testifying before a Senate subcommittee that such blind economic activity is inconsistent with the efficient functioning of a free economic system such as ours, whose ability to provide desired material at the lowest cost is dependent on the asserted preferences and informed choices of consumers.[21]

[16] Respondent challenges the finding of the District Court that credit was extended to petitioner. In some cases in which a consumer pays in installments for a magazine subscription, credit may not have been extended to the consumer. However, in view of the admissions by respondent which were before the District Court, respondent's failure to controvert those admissions by affidavit, and the litigation posture which respondent has consistently maintained beginning in the District Court, i.e., that no factual matters remained unresolved, we conclude that summary judgment on this issue was properly granted. The Truth-in-Lending Act was designed to remedy the problems which had developed. The House Committee on Banking and Currency reported in regard to the then proposed legislation:

> [B]y requiring all creditors to disclose credit information in a uniform manner, and by requiring all additional mandatory charges imposed by the creditor as an incident to credit be included in the computation of the applicable percentage rate, the American consumer will be given the information he needs to compare the cost of credit and to make the best informed decision on the us eof credit.[22]

This purpose was stated explicitly in § 102 of the legislation enacted:

> The Congress finds that economic stabilization would be enhanced and the competition among the various financial institutions and other firms engaged in the extension of consumer credit would be strengthened by the informed use of credit. The informed use of credit results from an awareness of the cost thereof by consumers. It is the purpose of this subchapter to assure a meaningful disclosure of credit terms so that the consumer will be able to compare more readily the various credit terms available to him and avoid the uninformed use of credit.[23]

[1,2] The hearings held by Congress reflect the difficulty of the task it sought to accomplish. Whatever legislation was passed had to deal not only with the myriad forms in which credit transactions then occurred, but also with those which would be devised in the future.[24] To accomplish its desired objective, Congress determined to lay the structure of the Act broadly and to entrust its construction to an agency with the necessary experience and resources to monitor its operation. Section 105 delegated to the Federal Reserve Board broad authority to promulgate regulations necessary to render the Act effective. The language employed evinces the awareness of Congress that some creditors would attempt to characterize their transactions so as to fall one step outside whatever boundary Congress attempted to establish. It indicates as well the clear desire of Congress to insure that the Board had adequate power to deal with such attempted evasion. In addition to granting to the Board the authority normally given to administrative agencies to promulgate regulations designed to "carry out the [1659] purposes" of the Act, Congress specifically stated:

> These regulations may contain such classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of transactions, as in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper * * * to prevent circumvention or evasion [of the Act], or to facilitate compliance therewith.[25]

The Board was thereby empowered to define such classifications as were reasonably necessary to insure that the objectives of the Act were fulfilled, no matter what adroit or unscrupulous practices were employed by those extending credit to consumers.

One means of circumventing the objectives of the Truth-in-Lending Act, as passed by Congress, was that of "burying" the cost of credit in the price of goods sold. Thus in many credit transactions in which creditors claimed that no finance charge had been imposed, the creditor merely assumed the cost of extending credit as an expense of doing business, to be recouped as part of the price charged in the transaction.[26] Congress was well aware, from its extensive studies, of the possibility that merchants could use such devices to evade the disclosure requirements of the Act. The Committee hearings are replete with suggestions that such manipulation would render the Act a futile gesture in the case of goods normally sold by installment contract.[27] Opponents of the bill contended that the reporting provisions would actually encourage merchants who had formerly segregated their credit costs not to do so. They predicted that the effect of the Act would thus be to reduce the amount of information available to the consumer, a result directly contrary to that which was intended.[28] Proponents of the legislation claimed that the Act would enhance the consumer's ability to make an informed choice even if finance charges were hidden. In response to a claim that credit costs would be incorporated [1660] in the price of goods, Senator Douglas, who first proposed the Truth-in-Lending Act, stated:

[26] For example, two merchants might buy watches at wholesale for $20 which normally sell at retail for $40. Both might sell immediately to a consumer who agreed to pay $1 per week for 52 weeks. In one case, the merchant might claim that the price of the watch was $40 and that the remaining $12 constituted a charge for extending credit to the consumer. From the consumer's point of view, the credit charge represents the cost which he must pay for the privilege of deferring payment of the debt he has incurred. From the creditor's point of view, much simplified, the charge may represent the return which he might have earned had he been able to invest the proceeds from the sale of the watch from the date of the sale until the date of payment. The second merchant might claim that the price of the watch was $52 and that credit was free. The second merchant, like the first, has forgone the profits which he might have achieved by investing the sale proceeds from the day of the sale on. The second merchant may be said to have "buried" this cost in the price of the item sold. By whatever name, the $12 differential between the total payments and the price at which the merchandise could have been acquired is the cost of differing payment.

> I would like to call to your attention, Senator, for purposes of the record, that this bill does not provide for judgment solely on the basis of the * * * annual interest rate or the total finance charges. It also provides that there shall be a statement of the cash price or delivery price of the property or service to be acquired. Both things are to be stated, price and finance charges, and the judgment of the consumer can be on the basis of both of these factors, not merely on one alone; and if a merchant tries to have a low finance charge and bury it in a high cash price or delivered price, then the purchaser can shop on price just as much as on the finance charges.[29]

It was against this legislative background that the Federal Reserve Board promulgated regulations governing enforcement of the Truth-in-Lending Act. In September, 1968, with the aid of an advisory board composed of representatives of diverse retail, lending and consumer groups, the Board compiled and released a draft of proposed regulations.[30] Comments and criticisms from interested parties were invited. After more than 1,800 responses were received and considered by the Board, the regulations were reviewed and published in the Federal Register.[31]

The Four Installment Rule was included in the original published draft of the regulations and was not amended prior to its final adoption.[32] The Board's objective in promulgating the rule was to prevent the Act from fulfilling the prophecy which its opponents had forecast. As J. L. Robertson, vice chairman of the Board of Governors, stated in an advisory letter issue a year later:

> The Board felt that it was imperative to include transactions involving more than four instalments under the Regulations since without this provision the practice of burying the finance charge in the cash price, a practice which already exists in many cases, would have been encouraged by Truth-in-Lending. Obviously this would have been directly contrary to Congressional intent.[33]

Furthermore, even as to sales in which it was impossible to determine what, if any, portion of the price recompensed the creditor for deferring payment, the regulation at least required that the consumer be provided with some information which would enable him to make an informed economic choice.[34]

II

[3] The standard to be applied in determining whether the Board exceeded the authority delegated to it under the Truth-in-Lending Act is well established under our prior cases. Where the empowering provision of a statute states simply that the agency may "make * * * such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act,"[35] we have held that [1661] the validity of a regulation promulgated thereunder will be sustained so long as it is "reasonably related to the purposes of the enabling legislation." Thorpe v. Housing Authority of City of Durham, 393 U.S. 268, 280–281, 89 S.Ct. 518, 525, 21 L.Ed.2d 474 (1968). See also American Trucking Associations, Inc. v. United States, 344 U.S. 298, 73 S.Ct. 307, 97 L.Ed. 337 (1953).

We have also construed enabling provisions similar to § 105 of the Truth-in-Lending Act, in which Congress has stressed the agency's power to counteract attempts to evade the purposes of a statute. In Gemsco, Inc. v. Walling, 324 U.S. 244, 65 S.Ct. 605, 89 L.Ed. 921 (1945), we were asked to determine whether the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor was empowered under the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938[36] to prohibit companies from allowing or requiring their employees to do industrial homework. The Act required the Administrator to approve orders which were designed to raise the minimum wage to 40 cents an hour. While the Act did not specifically mention industrial homework, § 8(f) stated that the Administrator's orders—> shall contain such terms and conditions as the Administrator finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such orders, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, and to safeguard the minimum wage rates established therein.[37]

After hearings, the Administrator determined that homework furnished "a ready means" of evading his orders, and prohibited certain companies subject thereto from employing this means of production. The Court concluded that the Administrator had not exceeded his authority under the Act, noting that a more restrictive interpretation of the enabling provision would have rendered the Act inoperable. Focusing on the mandate provided by § 8(f), the Court stated:

> When command is so explicit and, moreover, is reinforced by necessity in order to make it operative, nothing short of express limitation or abuse of discretion in finding that the necessity exists should undermine the action taken to execute it. When neither such limitation nor such abuse exists, but the necessity is conceded to be well founded in fact, there would seem to be an end of the matter. 324 U.S., at 255, 65 S.Ct. at 612.

[4] In light of our prior holdings and the legislative history of the Truth-in-Lending Act, we cannot agree with the conclusion of the Court of Appeals that the Board exceeded its statutory authority in promulgating the Four Installment Rule. Congress was clearly aware that merchants could evade the reporting requirements of the Act by concealing credit charges. In delegating rule making authority to the Board, Congress emphasized the Board's authority to prevent such evasion. To hold that Congress did not intend the Board to take action against this type of manipulation would require us to believe that, despite this emphasis, Congress intended the obligations established by the Act to be open to evasion by subterfuges of which it was fully aware. As in Gemsco, the language of the enabling provision precludes us from accepting so narrow an interpretation of the Board's power.

[5] Given that some remedial measure was authorized, the question remaining is whether the measure chosen is reasonably related to its objectives. We see no reason to doubt the Board's conclusion that the rule will deter creditors from engaging in the conduct which the Board sought to eliminate. The burdens imposed on creditors are not severe, when measured against the evils which are avoided. Furthermore, were it possible or financially feasible to [1662] delve into the intricacies of every credit transaction, it is clear that many creditors to whom the rule applies would be found to have charged for deferring payment, while claiming they had not. That some other remedial provision might be preferable is irrelevant. We have consistently held that where reasonable minds may differ as to which of several remedial measures should be chosen, courts should defer to the informed experience and judgment of the agency to whom Congress delegated appropriate authority. Northwestern Elec. Co. v. Federal Power Commission, 321 U.S. 119, 124, 64 S.Ct. 451, 453, 88 L.Ed. 596 (1944); National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 224, 63 S.Ct. 997, 1013, 87 L.Ed. 1344 (1943); American Telephone and Telegraph Co. v. United States, 229 U.S. 232, 236, 57 S.Ct. 170, 172, 81 L.Ed. 142 (1936).

[6] Respondent contends, however, that the Four Installment Rule must be abrogated since it is "inconsistent" with portions of the enabling statute. The purported conflict arises because the statute specifically mentions disclosure only in regard to transactions in which a finance charge is in fact imposed,[38] although the rule requires disclosure in some cases in which no such charge exists. Respondent argues that, in requiring disclosure as to some transactions, Congress intended to preclude the Board from imposing similar requirements as to any other transactions.

To accept respondent's argument would undermine the flexibility sought in vesting broad rule making authority in an administrative agency. In American Trucking Associations, Inc. v. United States, 344 U.S. 298, 73 S.Ct. 307, 97 L.Ed. 337 (1953), we noted that it was not—> a reasonable canon of interpretation that the draftsmen of acts delegating agency powers, as a practical and realistic matter, can or do include specific consideration of every evil sought to be corrected. * * * [N]o great acquaintance with pracitcal affairs is required to know that such prescience, either in fact or in the minds of Congress, does not exist. [Citations omitted.] Its very absence, moreover, is precisely one of the reasons why regulatory agencies such as the Commission are created, for it is the fond hope of their authors that they bring to their work the expert's familiarity with industry conditions which members of the delegating legislatures cannot be expected to posses." 344 U.S., at 309–310, 73 S.Ct. at 314.

Neither the sections of the Truth-in-Lending Act which refer specifically to transactions involving finance charges nor any other sections of the Act indicate that Congress attempted to list comprehensively all types of transactions to which the Board's regulations might apply. To the contrary, § 105's broad grant of rule making authority reflects an intention to rely on those attributes of agency administration recognized in American Trucking. We cannot then infer that references in the Act to transactions involving credit charges were intended to limit the deterrent measures which the Board might choose.

[7] Since the deterrent effect of the challenged rule clearly implements the objectives of the Act, respondent's contention is reduced to a claim that the rule is void because it requires disclosure by some creditors who do not charge for credit and thus need not be deterred. The fact that the regulation may affect such individuals does not impair its otherwise valid purpose. A similar contention was made in Gemsco, and rejected by the Court. Gemsco claimed that the Administrator was not attempting to enforce the requirements of the statute but was attempting to advance "experimental social legislation" which [1663] Congress had not approved. Responding to that argument the Court stated:

> Section 8(f), in directing the Administrator to include "such terms and conditions" as he "finds necessary to carry out the purposes of such orders," did > not forbid him to take the only measures which would be effective, merely because other consequences necessarily would follow. The language neither states expressly nor implies that he is to do only what will achieve the stated ends and nothing more. The statute does not direct the Administrator to make the rate effective by all necessary means except those which may have other social or economic consequences. 324 U.S., at 257, 65 S.Ct. at 613.

There the Court was referring to the regulation of subject matter, not specifically mentioned in the enabling legislation. A similar rule applies when a remedial provision requires some individuals to submit to regulation who do not participate in the conduct the legislation was intended to deter or control. In Village of Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U.S. 365, 388–389, 47 S.Ct. 114, 118. 71 L.Ed. 303 (1926), the Court held that, in defining a class subject to regulation, "the inclusion of a reasonable margin, to insure effective enforcement, will not put upon a law, otherwise valid, the stamp of invalidity." See also North American Company v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 327 U.S. 686, 66 S.Ct. 785, 90 L.Ed. 945 (1946). Nothing less will meet the demands of our complex economic system. Where, as here, the transactions or conduct which Congress seeks to administer occur in myriad and changing forms, a requirement that a line be drawn which insures that not one blameless individual will be subject to the provisions of an act would unreasonably encumber effective administration and permit many clear violators to escape regulation entirely. That this rationale applies to administrative agencies as well as to legislatures is implicit in both Gemsco and American Trucking Association. In neither case was every individual engaged in the regulated activity responsible for the specific consequences the agency sought to eliminate.

Respondent argues that such an interpretation of the Truth-in-Lending Act is inconsistent with our holding in Federal Communications Commission v. American Broadcasting Company, 347 U.S. 284, 74 S.Ct. 593, 98 L.Ed. 699 (1954). In that case, the Court considered whether, in establishing regulations to govern programming, the FCC had properly interpreted a criminal provision prohibiting the broadcasting of lotteries. After noting that a given statute could not be construed one way for purposes of an administrative proceeding and another for criminal prosecution, the Court stated:

> If we should give [the criminal provision] the broad construction urged by the Commission, the same construction would likewise apply in criminal cases. 347 U.S. 296, 74 S.Ct. 600.

Since, in drafting its regulation, the Commission had failed to apply the well established rule that penal provisions must be construed narrowly, the Court held the regulation invalid.

[8, 9] Relying on American Broadcasting, respondent contends that the Truth-in-Lending Act must be construed narrowly since it contains penal provisions,[39] and that a narrow interpretation requires that the Board's rule be nullified. We cannot agree, however, that every section of an act establishing a broad regulatory scheme must be construed as a "penal" provision, as that term is used in American Broadcasting, merely because two sections of the act provide for civil and criminal penalties. Penal statutes are construed narrowly to insure that no individual is convicted unless "a fair warning [has first been] given to the world in language that the common world will understand of what [1664] the law intends to do if a certain line is passed." McBoyle v. United States, 283 U.S. 25, 27, 51 S.Ct. 340, 341, 75 L.Ed. 816 (1931).[40] Where, as here, the language of the challenged rule is explict, that risk is not present. See Kraus & Bros., Inc. v. United States, 327 U.S. 614, 621–622, 66 S.Ct. 705, 707–708, 90 L.Ed. 893 (1946).

[10–13] We are also unable to accept respondent's argument that § 130[41] does not allow imposition of a civil penalty in cases where no finance charge is involved but where a regulation requiring disclosure has been violated. Section 130 provides that the penalty assessed shall be twice the amount of the finance charge imposed, but not less than $100. Since the civil penalty prescribed is modest and the prohibited conduct clearly set out in the regulation, we need not construe this section as narrowly as a criminal statute providing graver penalties, such as prison terms. We have noted above that the objective sought in delegating rule making authority to an agency is to relieve Congress of the impossible burden of drafting a code explicitly covering every conceivable future problem. Congress cannot then be required to tailor civil penalty provisions so as to deal precisely with each step which the agency thereafter finds necessary. In light of the emphasis Congress placed on agency rule making and on private and administrative enforcement of the Act, we cannot conclude that Congress intended those who failed to comply with regulations to be subject to no penalty or to criminal penalties alone. As the District Court concluded, imposition of the minimum sanction is proper in cases such as this, where the finance charge is nonexistent or undetermined.

[41] 15 U.S.C. § 1640. This section refers only to the failure to provide "information required under this part to be disclosed. * * *" (Emphasis supplied.) The italicized language was added to the statute to distinguish disclosure required in regard to sales transactions from that required in regard to advertising. H.R. Rep.No.1040, supra, n. 18, at 19, 30. The penalty provision applies both to the failure to disclose information specifically required by the statute and to the failure to abide by regulations promulgated by the Board to govern such disclosure.

[14] Finally, the Four Installment Rule does not conflict with the Fifth Amendment under our holdings in Schlesinger v. State of Wisconsin, 270 U.S. 230, 46 S.Ct. 260, 70 L.Ed. 557 (1926), and Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U.S. 312, 52 S.Ct. 358, 76 L.Ed. 772 (1932). In Schlesinger and Heiner, we held that certain taxing provisions violated the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments because they conclusively presumed the existence of determinative facts. The challenged rule contains no comparable presumption. The rule was intended as a prophylactic measure; it does not presume that all creditors who are within its ambit assess finance charges,[42] but, rather, imposes a disclosure requirement on all members of a defined class in order to discourage evasion by a substantial portion of that class.

The Truth-in-Lending Act reflects a transition in congressional policy from a philosophy of let-the-buyer-beware to one of let-the-seller-disclose. By erecting a barrier between the seller and the prospective purchaser in the form of hard facts, Congress expressly sought "to * * * avoid the uniformed use of credit." 15 U.S.C. § 1601. Some may claim that it is a relatively easy matter to calculate the total payments to which petitioner was committed by her contract with respondent; but at the [1665] time of sale, such computations are often not encouraged by the solicitor or performed by the purchaser. Congress has determined that such purchasers are in need of protection; the Four Installment Rule serves to insure that the protective disclosure mechanism chosen by Congress will not be circumvented.

[15, 16] That the approach taken may reflect what respondent views as an undue paternalistic concern for the consumer is beside the point. The statutory scheme is within the power granted to Congress under the Commerce Clause. It is not a function of the courts to speculate as to whether the statute is unwise or whether the evils sought to be remedied could better have been regulated in some other manner.

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice DOUGLAS, with whom Mr. Justice STEWART and Mr. Justice REHNQUIST concur, dissenting in part.

I have concluded that this is not a proper case for summary judgment under Rule 56(c), which provides that summary judgment only may be granted if there is "no genuine issue as to any material fact" and "the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." As I interpret the present record in light of our decisions, see, e.g., Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 90 S.Ct. 1598, 26 L.Ed.2d [42] In regard to some transactions to which the Four Installment Rule applies, merchants need not report the amount and rate of finance charges. Federal Reserve Board Advisory Letter of July 24, 1969, by J. L. Robertson; Federal Reserve Board Letter No. 30, July 8, 1969, by Frederick Solomon.

142; White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 83 S.Ct. 696, 9 L.Ed.2d 738; United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 82 S.Ct. 993, 8 L.Ed.2d 176, there remains unresolved a genuine issue of material fact. Although I agree with the majority that Regulation Z is valid and accordingly would reverse the decision of the Court of Appeals, I would remand this case to the District Court for resolution of that material issue.

The disclosure provisions of the Truth-in-Lending Act apply only to an extension of "consumer credit." 15 U.S.C. § 1631. Thus, in order to assert successfully a claim under the Act for the statutory penalty and reimbursement for the costs of the action, see id., § 1640, petitioner inter alia must satisfy her burden of proving that respondent extended consumer credit within the meaning of the Act. Section 103(e) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1602(e), defines "credit" as "the right granted by a creditor to a debtor to defer payment of debt or to incur debt and defer its payment." In her complaint, petitioner merely alleges that respondent "extends Consumer Credit as defined in Regulation Z, 12 C.F.R. 226.2(K) * * *." Respondent denies in its answer that its contract with petitioner involved a "credit transaction." In one paragraph respondent avers: "Under the contract executed by the customer and Defendant, the customer agrees to pay a stated amount per month for half of the life of the contract and Defendant agrees to supply the magazines for the full term of the contract. At all times the customer has prepaid for the magazines to be delivered. Under its arrangement with most of the publishers, Defendant reimburses the publisher periodically during the full term of the subscription." In another paragraph it avers: "At no point during the life of the contract has Defendant paid money to a third person or supplied goods or services to the customer for which reimbursement is expected from the customer in the future."

On the basis solely of these allegations, one would conclude that the contract between the petitioner and the respondent did not constitute a credit transaction. If respondent merely collected $3.95 per month from each customer and sent the receipts periodically to the publisher,[1] less the respondent's commission, respondent never would have made any advances for the customer, and the customer would owe nothing to the respondent for the loan of money [1666] or, in the words of the Act, as a "finance charge." On the other hand, if respondent advanced all or part of the subscription price to the publishers, respondent would be advancing "credit" for the benefit of the customer.[2] The legislative history indicates that "the disclosure requirement would not apply to transactions which are not commonly thought of as credit transactions * * * ."[3] As Professor Corbin has stated: "A transaction may be an instalment contract without being a credit transaction at all. Both parties may agree to perform in instalments without promising to render any performance in advance of full payment of the price of each instalment so rendered."[4] The Act, in defining "credit," refers to the deferred payment of a "debt." A debt, however, is more than a binding contractual obligation to pay a sum of money in the future upon the performance of certain conditions by the other party to the contract. It is an unconditional obligation to pay.[5] Thus, in my view, a proper resolution of the issue whether respondent extended credit to petitioner depends, at least in part, on the contractual relationships between the respondent and the publishers. The contracts between respondent and the publishers are not in the present record.[6]

[1] There are suggestions in the record that respondent is a wholly owned subsidiary of Time, Inc. Respondent, however, sold not only Life, a Time, Inc., publication, but magazines of other publishers.

The pleadings, of course, are not the only papers to be considered by the District Court in determining whether one party or the other is entitled to summary judgment. Under Rule 56(c) the court must consider "pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any * * * ." During the collection period, respondent had sent petitioner a dunning letter reminding her "that we have ordered these magazines in advance and that you have incurred an obligation to repay us. This is a credit

[2] In a free enterprise system, one must presume that there is a "finance charge" for the advance of credit. It would nonetheless be a "finance charge" although it were wholly undisclosed or not separately stated in an account rendered to the customer.

[6] My Brother POWELL asserts that, given the undisputed fact that petitioner agreed to pay in advance, respondent as a matter of law could not have extended credit. Post, at —. We do not, however, know what the financial relationships in this tri-partite arrangement are. For example, it may be that respondent advances the full five-year subscription price to the publisher on the subscriber's behalf when the contract between the subscriber and respondent is executed. If that is so, the subscriber may receive an unconditional right to receive magazines from the publisher over the five-year period, whether or not he meets his contractual obligations with respondent. Under these circumstances, respondent will be acting as a financier, enabling the suberiber to take advantage of the publisher's five-year subscription offer, but yet to defer payment on the subscription price. Any "profit" respondent receives will be largely attributable to its services as a financier. I do not see that such a financial arrangement differs substantially from the case where a subscriber borrows the full subcription price from a bank and pays the publisher directly, obligating himself to repay the bank in equal installments, with interest, over two and one-half years. As my Brother POWELL argues, the subscriber under those circumstances will be advancing credit to the publisher because he has paid for all magazines in advance, but it cannot be doubted that at the same time the bank has advanced credit to the subscriber.

account, and as such must be repaid by you on a monthly basis, much the same as if you had purchased any other type of merchandise on a monthly budget plan." Respondent formally admitted that it had sent this letter to petitioner. Accordingly, it was properly [1667] considered by the District Judge.[7] But, I do not view this "admission" as conclusive or sufficient proof that respondent had extended credit within the meaning of the Act at the time the contract between petitioner and respondent was entered into.[8] First, this is not an admission in terms that credit was extended within the meaning of the Act. Second, since respondent at the time the letter was sent was three months in arrears, it may be that respondent had advanced money on her account only after she failed to meet her contractual obligation. It is settled under our decisions that material lodged by the moving party "must be viewed in the light most favorable to the opposing party." Adickes v. Kress & Co., supra, 398 U.S. at 157, 158–159, 90 S.Ct. at 1608; United States v. Diebold, Inc., supra, 369 U.S. at 655, 82 S.Ct. at 994.

Petitioner is not deprived of the benefit of this principle of interpretation merely because it did not file an affidavit controverting the contents of the letter. Rule 56(e) provides that "[w]hen a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of his pleading, but his response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If he does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against him." The Advisory Committee note on the amendment which added this provision to the Rule, however, stated that "[w]here the evidentiary matter in support of the motion does not establish the absence of a genuine issue, summary judgment must be denied even if no opposing evidentiary matter is presented." We cited this comment with approval in Adickes v. Kress & Co., supra, 398 U.S. at 160, 90 S.Ct. at 1609. The moving party, in this case petitioner,[9] must meet her burden of showing the absence of a genuine issue as to any material fact. Id., at 157, 90 S.Ct. at 1608. I cannot conclude that she met that burden. The District Judge was not possessed of sufficient information to resolve properly the issue whether credit had been extended. Under these circumstances, he should not have granted summary judgment. Cf. White Motor Co. v. United States, supra, 372 U.S. at 263, 83 S.Ct. at 702.

[7] Respondent mailed another letter to petitioner which stated:

"Whereas, FPS, act initialy [sic] as agent for the various publishers; upon acceptance of her contract, FPS thereafter acts solely as financier, and co-guarantor of service with the various publishers; whereas, FPS, has fully invested in Mrs. Mourning's contract and does not receive refund in part or full from any, or, all publishers; for said FPS, investment, we therefore, must insist on compliance of your client to the terms of said contract * * *." Although respondent admitted that the letter appeared on its stationery and was written by an employee, it denied that the employee was authorized to send the letter. Accordingly, since there was an issue of fact whether the letter was authorized and thus a binding admission, the letter could not be considered properly on petitioner's motion for summary judgment. Cf. 3 Barron & Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1231, at 75 (1971 Supp.).

[8] We need not resolve here whether, if the contract was not originally a credit transaction, petitioner's own breach could have converted it retroactively into a credit transaction within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. Justice POWELL, dissenting.

I would affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals on the ground that there was no extension of consumer credit within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act.[1] The majority takes [1668] the position that the credit issue is a question of fact properly resolved against respondent on petitioner's motion for summary judgment below. I cannot agree. In my view, the undisputed facts establish as a matter of law that the transaction between petitioner and respondent did not involve an extension of consumer credit. For the same reason, while I am in agreement with much of Mr. Justice DOUGLAS' dissenting opinion, I see no reason to remand the case for the taking of evidence.

I

Clearly the Act applies only to transactions involving the extension of credit. The congressional declaration of purpose is explicit:

> The Congress finds that economic stabilization would be enhanced and the competition among the various financial institutions and other firms engaged in the extension of consumer credit would be strengthened by the informed use of credit. 15 U.S.C. § 1601.

The phrase "extension of consumer credit" is not defined in the Act. Nor does the Act's definition of "credit" provide any enlightenment.[2] However, a transaction is commonly understood to involve credit when one party receives value in exchange for his unconditional promise to pay the other party for such value in the future. The mere fact that a party obligates himself in a contract to pay for goods or services in installments over a period of time does not render the contract a credit transaction:

[9] Both parties moved for summary judgment. That does not relieve the District Judge of his responsibility to consider each motion separately in light of the theories advanced by each party and to proceed to trial if he concludes that there is a genuine issue of material fact to be resolved. See 6 Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 56.13.

[1] Having this view of the case, I find it unnecessary to address the other two issues, namely: (i) whether the Federal Reserve Board exceeded its authority in adopting Regulation Z, which extends the coverage of the Act to transactions in which no finance charge can be identified; and (ii) whether the civil penalty provision of 15 U.S.C. § 1640(a) may validly be imposed in a case where, by concession of the parties on cross motions for summary judgment, the transaction does not involve a finance charge.

[2] "The term 'credit' means the right granted by a creditor to a debtor to defer payment of debt or to incur debt and defer its payment." 15 U.S.C. § 1602(e). The Act provides no gloss on the terms "debtor" and "debt," and the definition of "creditor" is limiting rather than explanatory. ("The term 'creditor' refers only to creditors who regularly extend, or arrange for the extension of, credit for which the payment of a finance charge is required. * * *" 15 U.S.C. § 1602(f).)

> A transaction may be an installment contract without being a credit transaction at all. Both parties may agree to perform in installments without promising to render any performance in advance of full payment of the price of each installment so rendered. 3A A. Corbin § 687 (1960).

The transaction before the Court may well have been a credit transaction, but it was not respondent that extended the credit. Petitioner obligated herself to pay in advance for the magazines she was to receive. The contract required petitioner to pay equal installments over a 30-month period, but respondent was obligated only to provide magazines over 60 months. In effect petitioner paid every month for two months' worth of magazines. Until the last magazine had been delivered, petitioner would have paid for more magazines than she received. Thus, the contract called for the extension of credit by petitioner to respondent. For this reason it was not an "extension of consumer credit" within the meaning of the Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 1602(h).

The Federal Reserve Board, upon whose authority to interpret the Act the majority so heavily relies in sustaining Regulation Z, has indicated that a necessary element in a consumer credit transaction is the consumer's obligation to pay after he has received the bargained for goods or services. In a published Opinion Letter dealing with the practice of assessing obstetrical services in periodic installments, the Board stated that "[a]s long as there are no finance charges assessed, and at no point do the [1669] charges for the services rendered exceed the payments to the extent that it would require more than 4 of the periodic installments to repay the obligation, then the plan would not fall within the provisions of Regulation Z."[3] (Emphasis supplied.) This statement implicitly recognizes that credit is extended only when the value of goods or services provided exceeds the payments made.[4]

[4] Legislative history bolsters the view that Congress assumed "credit" meant the receipt of goods or services in advance of paying for them. In earlier versions of the Act the definition of credit included "* * * any contract of sale of property or services, either for present or future delivery, under which part or all of the price is payable subsequent to the making of such sale or contract; * * * any contract or arrangement for the hire, bailment, or leasing of property. * * *" S. 1740, 87th Cong., 1st Sess.; S. 5, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. (as introduced January 11, 1967). During the Senate hearings, a question was raised as to whether any finance charge would be attributable to certain included transactions, particularly ordinary bailment and lease arrangements. Hearings on S. 5 before the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 663 (1967) (Statement of J. L. Robertson, Vice Chairman, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System). This criticism was heeded and the final version of the bill substituted the language now found in the Act (15 U.S.C. § 1602(e)) with the following explanation: "The original S. 5 language was deleted because it was somewhat cumbersome and sweeping and

Implicit in the positions both of Mr. Justice Douglas and of the majority is the assumption that, even admitting petitioner was to pay for each magazine before receiving it, under some factual circumstances respondent might nevertheless have extended credit.[5] Thus, Mr. Justice Douglas states that "if respondent advanced all or part of the subscription price to the publishers, respondent would be advancing 'credit' for the benefit of the customer." The majority is less clear on this point, stating only that "[i]n some cases in which a consumer pays in installments for a magazine subscription, credit may not have been extended to the consumer." N. 16, supra. The implication, however, is that in some such transactions, though the consumer pays for the magazines in advance, he may be the recipient of credit. I am unable to agree that under any set of circumstances, given the undisputed fact that petitioner agreed to pay in advance for each magazine, respondent might have extended credit. Petitioner [1670] did not obtain a loan from respondent which she would be unconditionally obligated to repay. She entered into a contract imposing continuing, mutually dependent obligations on both parties.[6] Whether respondent advanced any part of the subscription price to magazine publishers is quite immaterial to a determination of the legal effect of the only transaction involved in this case: whether there was extension of consumer credit by respondent to petitioner. The only contract at issue is that between the parties; how and upon what terms respondent may have arranged to obtain the magazines for delivery to petitioner in fulfillment of its contractual obligations is of no concern to petitioner. Nor can any referred to various types of lease situations which might not be true extensions of credit." S.Rep.No.392, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 12 (1967). In fact a lease, like the "paid during service" magazine contracts offered by respondent, often imposes a noncancellable obligation on the lessee or consumer to pay in a series of installments. Yet the lessor does not extend credit because the lessee ordinarily pays in advance for each period during which he enjoys the use of the property. Petitioner, by the same reasoning, was no more the recipient of credit than is the ordinary lessee or bailee. It would be inconsistent with this legislative history to read "extension of credit" to include every noncancellable installment obligation.

[5] The District Court found that there was no issue as to any material fact in this case. The Court of Appeals did not disturb this finding. Whether one agrees with this finding as does the majority or disagrees for reasons stated by Mr. Justice DOUGLAS, the District Court's conclusion that the uncontroverted facts establish a consumer credit transaction is clearly a conclusion of law and therefore is entitled to no presumption of correctness. Nor do respondent's dunning letters to petitioner describing her obligation as a credit account create any such presumption. Again, such statements only express a legal conclusion and do not establish the existence of a consumer credit transaction within the meaning of the Act.

[6] If respondent failed to deliver the magazines as agreed prior to completion of the specified payments, petitioner would have no further obligation to pay:

"A contract for the sale of goods may be an installment contract with respect to the goods sold as with respect to payments of the price. The non-delivery of an installment or delivery of a nonconforming installment when required by the contract is a breach for which an action can be maintained at once. There is no doubt that the buyer is privileged to withhold payment of the price of the undelivered installment or of a nonconforming installment that is rightfully rejected. * * * [T]he buyer does not have to extend such credit [beyond that which was agreed upon] to the seller by making payments without receiving the agreed goods." 3A A. Corbin, Contracts § 691, at 264 (1960). See Fla.Stat. §§ 672.2–612, 672.2–711, 672.2–717 (1969), F.S.A.

such arrangement by respondent with a third party change the nature of the transaction between the parties to this litigation.[7]

The controlling facts therefore are not in dispute, having been admitted by the cross motions for summary judgment, and I can perceive of no way in which they can be construed as an extension of consumer credit by respondent to petitioner. A remand, unnecessarily burdening the parties and the court below, would serve no useful purpose. As a matter of law respondent did not extend credit within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act. I would affirm the judgment below.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S APPAREL SALESMEN, INC., a/k/a NAWCAS GUILD, ETC., ET AL. v. F.T.C.*

No. 71–1880. F.T.C. Docket 8691.

(United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, May 21, 1973)

1. F.T.C. Entitled To Rely on N.L.R.B.'s Determination That Association of Apparel Salesmen Was Not "Labor Organization."

[140] Federal Trade Commission was entitled to rely on determination of National Labor Relations Board in collateral proceeding that association of apparel salesmen was not "labor organization" exempt from antitrust laws, in proceeding to require association to refrain from committing unfair trade practices.

2. Only Insofar as Union Pursues Legitimate Subjects of Collective Bargaining Will Antitrust Laws Yield to Labor Unions.

Antitrust laws yield for labor organizations only insofar as union pursues legitimate subjects of collective bargaining.

3. If Labor Organization Cannot Function as Collective Bargaining Agent of Employees of Particular Employer, It May Not Transgress Employer's Rights to Unrestrained Competition With Impunity.

If labor organization cannot under any set of circumstances function as collective bargaining agent of employees of particular employer, organization may not transgress employer's rights to unrestrained competition with impunity.

[7] Indeed, petitioner's complaint avers that the installment contract for the purchase and sale of the magazines is "the only instrument executed and existing between the parties," and that respondent thereby "extend[ed] consumer credit as defined in Regulation Z. * * *" There is no allegation as to extension of credit by the publishers or by any third person. Second Amended Complaint, App. 3, 4.

*Reported in 479 F.2d 139 (1973). For case before Commission, see 77 F.T.C. 988, 78 F.T.C. 446. Cert. denied: Nov. 5, 1973, 414 U.S. 1004, 94 S.Ct. 360.

4. N.L.R.B. IS VESTED EXCLUSIVELY WITH AUTHORITY TO DETERMINE REPRESENTATIONAL MATTERS UNDER THE N.L.R. ACT.

Authority to determine representational matters under National Labor Relations Act is vested exclusively with N.L.R.B.

5. UNTIL SUCH TIME AS COURT MAY OVERTURN N.L.R.B. ELECTION PROCEDURES, ACTION IS UNASSAILABLE.

Although N.L.R.B. election procedures may occasionally be overturned by court reviewing unfair labor practice proceeding, until such time board action is unassailable.

6. WHERE ORGANIZATION HAS PROPRIETARY INTEREST IN MEANS, IN AND FOR THEMSELVES, IT IS DISQUALIFIED FROM FUNCTIONING AS LABOR ORGANIZATION UNDER PROTECTIVE CLOAK.

Organization purporting to represent interests of group of employees may disregard potential impact of antitrust laws on their chosen means if ends to be accomplished are appropriate bargaining subjects for labor union, but where organization has proprietary interest in means, in and for themselves, it is disqualified from functioning as labor organization under protective cloak.

On petition for review, court held that Federal Trade Commission was entitled to rely on determination of National Labor Relations Board in collateral proceeding that association of apparel salesmen was not "labor organization" exempt from antitrust laws, in proceeding to require association to refrain from committing unfair trade practices.

JOHN R. BROWN, Chief Judge:

We enter the workroom to review the propriety of an FTC cease and desist order which compels the Petitioners, National Association of Women's & Children's Apparel Salesmen (NAWCAS) to refrain from committing certain unfair trade practices within the context of their regional trade shows. Our role is chiefly that of a tailor: we must dart the seam of two interrelated public policies—the antitrust proscription and its labor exemption. The thread which fastens this seam is composed of three independently woven fibers: (i) is NAWCAS a "labor organization" under the cloak of the Norris LaGuardia Act, [141] 29 U.S.C.A. § 104, and Clayton Act §§ 6, 20, 15 U.S.C.A. § 17, 29 U.S.C.A. § 52, special dispensation for labor? (ii) do the challenged activities arise in the context of a bona fide "labor dispute" as that term is used in these statutory provisions? and (iii) has NAWCAS acted only in its labor self-interest—eschewing any combination with non-labor groups? Unless all three questions can be answered affirmatively, NAWCAS is not entitled to don the protective cloak.

[1] The FTC, relying heavily on an NLRB holding in a collateral proceeding, answered the first two questions negatively and issued its order.[1] National Association of Women's and Children's Apparel Salesmen, 1971, 78 F.T.C. 446 [Docket No. 8691]. Because we are in agreement on these points, we enforce the order without addressing ourselves to the third question.[2]

The Wrinkled Cloak

When the National Association of Women's and Children's Apparel Salesmen was formed in 1945, its avowed purpose was to provide a forum for the free exchange of trade information and a force to represent the best interests of ready to wear clothing salesmen.[3] At that time, NAWCAS stitched together 21 local affiliate groups of salesmen.[4] One of the primary activities of these affiliates was the sponsoring of regional trade shows to minimize traveling.

[1] Counsel for NAWCAS conceded before the Commission that if his client's activities were not protected by the labor exemption to the antitrust laws, that their conduct was violative of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Thus, there is no basis from which to attack the Commission's order on its intrinsic merits if the labor exemption will not stand up.

[2] Basing our holding upon the determination that NAWCAS may not act as a labor organization, we need not determine the extent to which certain component members of NAWCAS might constitute nonlabor groups. See generally, United States v. Hutcheson, 1941, 312 U.S. 219, 61 S.Ct. 463, 85 L.Ed. 788; American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 1968, 391 U.S. 99, 88 S.Ct. 1562, 20 L.Ed.2d 460; Cedar Crest Hats, Inc. v. United Hatters, 5 Cir., 1966, 362 F.2d 322.

[3] The objective, aims, and purposes of NAWCAS were set forth in Article III, Section 1 of its constitution.

> The objectives, aims and purposes of this association shall be educational and for the promotion of the best interests of its members; to provide a national association of all organizations or groups composed of salesmen engaged in the wholesale selling of women's or children's wearing apparel or accessories * * * to promote, stimulate and protect the interests and welfare of salesmen in the women's and children's fields and the industry with which they are concerned * * * to cooperate with organizations composed of salesmen in kindred fields whenever practicable and feasible to the end that a strongly organized national voice of salesmen may be achieved * * * to institute and maintain an educational program concerning itself with the welfare and future security of salesmen * * * to create a clearing house for the interchange and dissemination of pertinent information, ideas, plans and facts helpful to members of affiliated organizations * * * to establish and maintain an active employment clearing house * * * to give wholehearted support to measures that are fair, reasonable and equitable to the interests and welfare of salesmen * * * to provide information and guidance, and promote a policy of helpful services to independent retailers, and generally foster a cordial relationship between manufacturers, retailers and salesmen and to represent the members as their bargaining agents and where appropriate to negotiate collective agreements in their behalf.

There are approximately ten thousand manufacturers of women's and children's apparel in the United States, mostly centered in and around the New York City area. Although there are [142] several industry giants, their share of the market is relatively miniscule—90 per cent of the business going to the smaller manufacturers. Their wares are normally marketed through the efforts of the hired salesmen. Most of these men work on commissions, although the trend among the larger firms is toward compensation by a fixed salary. They also tend to work exclusively for one manufacturer—purportedly to preserve design integrity and prevent "line piracy"—unless their territory is so threadbare that they must represent two or more noncompeting lines to make an adequate living.

The most effective method of marketing apparel has been found to be that of the regional, periodic trade show.[5] Sponsoring these shows is the role of the local affiliate. They are usually held in hotels, auditoriums, or merchandise marts. Long-term advance planning is necessary. The affiliate who sponsors the show rents the necessary facilities, solicits registration from members qualified to exhibit, and provides general logistical support for the registrants. Each show is governed by the rules and regulations of the sponsoring affiliate and violations of the rules may result in a fine or suspension. As noted by the NLRB and FTC, a number of the rules are designed to prevent members from participating in competing shows. Because of the tremendous prestige and economic impact of these shows, participation in them is almost a business necessity.

Many of NAWCAS's tangible goals[6] were union-like. But for the first 11 years its approach was strictly velveteen. Then, at its 1956 convention, NAWCAS adopted the "California Resolution". Under this Resolution NAWCAS decided to exert economic leverage by blacklisting "uncooperative manufacturers" from the affiliates' trade shows. At first the blacklists were confined to those manufacturers who did not put forth a cooperative effort towards resolving disputes with their association-member salesmen. In 1960, however, the economic tool of excluding uncooperative manufacturers from the trade shows was extended to those manufacturers who failed to hire their salesmen under the terms of NAWCAS's standard contract.

[4] One of these affiliates, Style Exhibitors, Inc. of Chicago is also a named party in the FTC's order and a petitioner herein. The FTC Examiner determined that the advocacy of Style Exhibitors was adequate to represent the other members of its class of affiliates, all of whom had some notice of the pending proceedings before the FTC. There is no challenge to this ruling on appeal.

[5] Other methods of marketing include direct mail sales, home office showroom sales, regional sales offices in key cities, sales to jobbers, and direct sales to a common buyer/agent for several retailers.

[6] The two chief objectives which they sought to obtain via the unfair trade practices under attack were establishment of a binding system of grievance arbitration and industry-wide use of NAWCAS's standard contract of employment for salesmen. Both are certainly legitimate goals of a bargaining representative. They have also established some rather successful programs of insurance, retirement and death benefits.

It is this refusal to deal which the FTC seeks to collar with its order.[7]

[7] The Commission's order, which is not challenged on its merits in this appeal, requires the Petitioners to cease and desist from the following:

(1) Refusing or threatening to refuse to promote, display, offer to sell, distribute, or sell at any trade show women's and children's apparel or accessories supplied by any manufacturer who is represented by a member of NAWCAS, a member of any affiliate, or person who is otherwise eligible for trade show participation.

(2) Entering into, continuing, cooperating in or carrying out any planned common course of action, understanding, or agreement with any other party for the purpose or with the effect of preventing, hindering, or interfering with a manufacturer from having his merchandise displayed, exhibited, offered for sale or sold in or from any location not actually contracted for and used as space by respondent NAWCAS or by a representative who is a member of NAWCAS, a member of any affiliate, or any person as a part of a NAWCAS trade show participation for the conduct of a trade show sponsored by NAWCAS, its members or affiliates.

(3) Entering into, continuing, cooperating in, or carrying out any [143] planned common course of action, understanding, or agreement with any other party for the purpose or with the effect of preventing, hindering, or interfering with a manufacturer's efforts to have his merchandise displayed, exhibited, sold or offered for sale in any space not actually contracted for and used by a representative who is a member of NAWCAS, trade show participation.

(4) Restricting, regulating, or limiting any member of NAWCAS, any member of any affiliate or any person who is otherwise eligible for trade show participation, in the selection of any merchandise that he may wish to display, offer for sale or sell at any trade show or exhibition.

(5) Requiring, whether directly or indirectly any manufacturer of women's and children's apparel or accessories to comply with any demand, term or condition made by NAWCAS or any of its affiliated members as a condition of having the manufacturer's goods exhibited in a NAWCAS affiliated trade show.

The Ironing Board

[144] The FTC skirted the necessity of ruling directly on the extent of protection afforded to NAWCAS's activities by labor's cloak of antitrust immunity by relying on the opinion of the NLRB in a collateral proceeding, Bambury Fashions, Inc., 1969, —— NLRB —— [Appendix at 146–156], to iron out the wrinkles. The Board held that because of the commercial nature of NAWCAS's trade shows it was disqualified from functioning as a labor organization.

[2, 3] The rationale behind this deference to the determination of the Board, is that labor's cloak of immunity must be lined with the fact that the putative labor organization is—or could be—the bargaining representative for the employees in question. This is so because the antitrust laws yield only insofar as the union pursues legitimate subjects of collective bargaining. Meat Cutter's Union v. Jewel Tea Co., 1965, 381 U.S. 676, 689 and 710, 85 S.Ct. 1596, 1601 and 1614, 14 L.Ed.2d 640, 649 and 661; American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 1968, 391 U.S. 99, 88 S.Ct. 1562, 20 L.Ed.2d 460; Hunt v. Crumboch, 1945, 325 U.S. 821, 65 S.Ct. 1545, 89 L.Ed. 1954. If an organization cannot, under any set of circumstances, function as the collective bargaining agent of the employees of a particular employer, that organization may not transgress the employer's rights to unrestrained competition with impunity under the cloth of a labor label. Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, 1945, 325 U.S. 797, 65 S.Ct. 1533, 89 L.Ed. 1939.

(15) Prohibiting, restricting, or limiting any person or firm engaged in the offering for sale, distribution or sale of women's and children's apparel or accessories from obtaining any room, rooms, or office space at any time in any facility.

(16) Refusing to accept for membership in NAWCAS any individual who is otherwise eligible for membership and is actively and regularly engaged as a salesman or manufacturer who does not have salesmen and who travels a territory or territories himself, of women's and children's wholesale apparel and accessories irrespective of whether such individual was previously denied or excluded from membership.

(17) Refusing to accept as an exhibitor at any trade show any salesman who may also be a manufacturer, importer, wholesaler, or jobber, or officers or employees thereof, whose line or lines of women's and children's apparel are not exhibited at that trade show by a member of NAWCAS or a member of any of its affiliates.

(18) Continuing to retain any provision in its constitution, by-laws, code of ethics, or rules and regulations which contravenes or conflicts in any way with any of the above prohibitions.

1015, 3 L.Ed.2d 1175. Because of the immediacy usually attending such determinations, there is no means of securing direct judicial review of the Board's determination—it must be attacked collaterally in the context of an unfair labor practice charge.[8] Boire v. Greyhound Corporation, 1964, 376 U.S. 473, 84 S.Ct. 894, 11 L.Ed.2d 849; Magnesium Casting Co. v. NLRB, 1971, 401 U.S. 137, 91 S.Ct. 599, 27 L.Ed. 2d 735; Templeton v. Dixie Color Printing Co., 5 Cir., 1971, 444 F.2d 1064. Given this commitment, under our national labor policy, to the Board's particular expertise of the task of defining what organizations are labor organizations, we hold that it was proper for the FTC to accord dispositive weight to the Board's holding.[9]

[145] [6] What the Board actually held in Bambury Fashions was that NAWCAS, because of its financial stake in the trade shows themselves, was precluded from acting as a labor organization. Thus, according to the Board, the disqualifying factor "is the latent danger that it may bargain, not for the benefit of unit employees, but for the protection and enhancement of its business interests which are in direct competition with those of the employer at the other side of the bargaining table." Bambury Fashions, supra at —. In essence it washes out to this. An organization purporting to represent the interests of a group of employees may disregard the potential impact of the antitrust laws on their chosen means if the ends to be accomplished are appropriate bargaining subjects for a labor union. But where the organization has a proprietary interest in the means, in and for themselves, it is disqualified from functioning as a labor organization under the protective cloak. "The labor exemption is inapplicable where the union acts not as a union but as an entrepreneur." Jewel Tea supra, 381 U.S. at 733, 85 S.Ct. at 1626, 14 L.Ed.2d at 675 (Goldberg, J.);

[8] Notwithstanding this canon of labor law, NAWCAS attempted to collaterally challenge the Board's order. Its futile efforts culminated in National Association of Women's & Children's Apparel Salesmen, Inc. v. NLRB, D.C.Cir., 1972, 465 F.2d 662.

[9] The FTC phrased its deference in terms of "primary jurisdiction". Actually it is more than that. Although the Board's election procedures may occasionally be overturned by a court reviewing an unfair labor practice proceeding, until that time the Board action is unassailable. Cf. Coca Cola v. FTC, 5 Cir., 1973, 475 F.2d 299; Alabama Gas Corp. v. FTC, 5 Cir., 1973, 476 F.2d 142 [1973]. There is no concurrent jurisdiction in another tribunal which stands in abeyance pending reference to the Board, as in most cases of primary jurisdiction. Cf. J. M. Huber Corp. v. Denman, 5 Cir., 1966, 367 F.2d 104; Weymouth v. Colorado Interstate Gas Co., 5 Cir., 1966, 367 F.2d 84; Carter v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 5 Cir., 1966, 365 F.2d 486.

We are not unaware of Mr. Justice White's opinion in Jewel Tea declining to stay the proceeding there until a primary jurisdiction reference to the Board could be made. But he surely did not mean that a Board determination was inconsequential, for he also stated on that same day: "Unquestionably the Board's demarcation of the bounds of the duty to bargain has great relevance to any consideration of the sweep of labor's antitrust immunity." United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 1965, 381 U.S. 657, 665, 85 S.Ct. 1585, 1590, 14 L.Ed.2d 626, 633. See also, Jewel Tea, supra, 381 U.S. at 710, 85 S.Ct. at 1614, 14 L.Ed.2d at 661 (Opinion of Goldberg, J.).

Cf. Los Angeles Meat & Provision Drivers Union, Local 626 v. United States, 1962, 371 U.S. 94, 83 S.Ct. 162, 9 L.Ed.2d 150; Columbia River Packers Association v. Hinton, 1942, 315 U.S. 143, 62 S.Ct. 520, 86 L.Ed. 750; Gulf Coast Shrimpers & Oystermans Association v. United States, 5 Cir., 1956, 236 F.2d 658.

Given this disqualification by the Board,[10] the FTC was correct in button-holing NAWCAS's anticompetitive activities.

Enforced.

SIMPSON, Circuit Judge (dissenting):

I respectfully dissent.

The majority today holds that the Federal Trade Commission properly relied upon the decision of the National Labor Relations Board in a collateral proceeding, Bambury Fashions, 1969, 179 NLRB 447, which also involved NAWCAS. In Bambury Fashions the Board concluded that NAWCAS was not qualified under the National Labor Relations Act to act as the statutory bargaining representative for certain traveling salesmen who potentially competed with employers by conducting trade shows. The majority concludes that the Commission could rely on this Board decision to hold that because NAWCAS may not act as a bargaining representative, it is not a "labor organization" entitled to the protection of the labor exemption to the federal antitrust laws. The basic holding of the majority is:

> The rationale behind this [the Commission's] deference to the determination of the Board, is that labor's cloak of immunity must be lined with the fact that the putative labor organization is—or could be—the bargaining representative for the employees in question. This is so because the antitrust laws yield only insofar as the union pursues legitimate subjects of collective bargaining. [citations omitted] If an organization cannot, under any set of circumstances, function as the collective bargaining agent of the employees of a particular employer, that organization may not transgress the employer's right to unrestrained competition with impunity [146] under the cloth of a labor label." [citations omitted]

Majority opinion at 144.

The Commission's syllogism, which the majority here endorses, is improper because the Board decided only that NAWCAS could not be a bargaining representative. It did not hold that NAWCAS was not a labor organization.

The core of the Board's opinion in Bambury Fashions was:

> Finally, notwithstanding the fact that NAWCAS, as found by the Regional Director, satisfies the two part test of the statutory definition of a labor organization, we find that it is disqualified from acting as such because its interest in > representing employee salesmen in the industry conflicts substantially with its primary interest in coordinating and strengthening the trade show activities of its affiliates. We agree with the Employers that NAWCAS in its trade show activities in behalf of independent contractor traveling salesmen members is engaged in the business of selling apparel in direct competition with apparel manufacturers. 179 NLRB at 450.

[10] The Board's finding here is bolstered by an independent finding of the FTC Examiner to substantially the same effect. Of course we are powerless to disturb this finding if "the evidence in the record reasonably supports the administrative conclusion." Colonial Stores, Inc. v. FTC, 5 Cir., 1971, 450 F.2d 733, 739.

In Bambury Fashions the Board applied its rule in Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., 1954, 108 NLRB 1555, that "* * * the Union cannot perform its statutory function as bargaining representative if simultaneously it is an immediate business competitor of the particular employer whose employees it purports to represent." Ibid. at 1562. Clearly then the Board's holding in Bambury Fashions was no more than that NAWCAS was disqualified from acting as a bargaining representative, not that NAWCAS was not a labor organization.

The Commission's extension of the Board's position is unwarranted for another reason. While it is true, as the majority states, that a union is exempt from the antitrust laws only insofar as it unilaterally pursues mandatory subjects of collective bargaining—wages, hours and working conditions, American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, 1968, 391 U.S. 99, 88 S.Ct. 1562, 20 L.Ed.2d 460—it does not follow that a union must be the National Labor Relations Act bargaining representative in order to pursue these goals, and hence enjoy the protection of the labor exemption to the antitrust laws. This is true because the umbrella of the antitrust exemption protects labor organizations. A group may be a "labor organization" within the statutory framework of the National Labor Relations Act without being a "bargaining representative" under that Act, as the language of the statute makes clear:

> The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work. National Labor Relations Act, Section 2(5); Title 29 U.S.C., Section 152(5).

NLRB v. Cabot Carbon Co., 1959, 360 U.S. 203, 79 S.Ct. 1015, 3 L.Ed.2d 1175, demonstrates that the National Labor Relations Act concepts of "labor organization" and "bargaining representative" are not coequal. In Cabot Carbon the NLRB had ordered the employer to cease and desist from unlawfully dominating certain employee committees, which coexisted with Board certified bargaining representatives at certain of the employer's plants. This Court refused to enforce the Board's order on the grounds that by the 1947 amendments to the Act Congress had not intended to include such committees within the statutory definition of labor organization, and that the term "dealing with employers" in the statutory definition of a labor organization meant in reality "bargaining with employers", and that the committees were not statutory bargaining representatives. The Supreme Court reversed, stating that the statutory term "dealing with em[147]ployers" was not to be read as synonymous with the more limited term "bargaining with employers". 360 U.S. at 211, 79 S.Ct. at 1020, 3 L.Ed.2d at 1180. Further the Court noted that Congress had rejected an amendment which would have substituted the term "bargaining collectively" for "dealing with employers" in the statutory definition of a labor organization. 360 U.S. at 211, 79 S.Ct. at 1021, 3 L.Ed.2d at 1181.

Upon this analysis it seems to me apparent that a group of persons may be a "labor organization" under the terms of the National Labor Relations Act without being a statutory bargaining representative under that Act. Furthermore, the "* * * grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work", National Labor Relations Act, Section 2(5); Title 29, U.S.C., Section 152(5), about which a "labor organization" deals with an employer are essentially equivalent to the "wages, hours, and working conditions" which constitute mandatory bargaining subjects. Unilateral labor organization activity concerning these mandatory bargaining subjects is immune from the federal antitrust laws. I conclude that a group which deals with an employer concerning such subjects is immune from the antitrust laws where such dealings are involved, even though that labor organization is not and cannot be the statutory bargaining representative. In short, an organization may pursue legitimate objectives of collective bargaining even though it is not a bargaining representative. Both the Federal Trade Commission and the majority in this case have fallen into the trap of equating qualification to act as a bargaining representative under the National Labor Relations Act with status as a labor organization.

Thus, I think the Commission based its decision below upon improper legal reasoning. A fundamental principle of judicial review of administrative action requires that in order for a reviewing court to sustain agency action the legal grounds upon which the agency acted must be correct. FTC v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 1972, 405 U.S. 233, 92 S.Ct. 898, 31 L.Ed.2d 170; SEC v. Chenery Corp., 1943, 318 U.S. 80, 63 S.Ct. 454, 87 L.Ed. 686. Because the Commission improperly relied upon the Board's decision in Bambury Fashions, supra, this case should be remanded to the Commission so that the Commission will have an opportunity to base its decision upon legally correct principles, including the extent to which certain components of NAWCAS might constitute non-labor groups not protected by the labor exemption to the antitrust laws. See generally, United States v. Hutcheson, 1941, 312 U.S. 219, 61 S.Ct. 463, 85 L.Ed. 788; American Federation of Musicians v. Carroll, supra; Cedar Crest Hats, Inc. v. United Hatters, 5 Cir. 1966, 362 F.2d 322. This latter question, which is crucial to the issue before the Commission, the majority here finds it unnecessary to consider. See majority opinion, footnote 2 at page 141.

For this reason I dissent from the majority opinion.

SEVEN-UP COMPANY v. F.T.C.*

No. 72–1680. F.T.C. Docket 8857

(United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, May 31, 1973)

FEDERAL DISTRICT LACKED SUBJECT MATTER JURISDICTION OF ACTION SEEKING TO ENJOIN F.T.C. FROM FURTHER ACTION IN PENDING ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDING, AND ALLEGING PROCEEDING WAS FATALLY DEFECTIVE WITHOUT JOINDER OF MANUFACTURER'S BOTTLERS AS INDISPENSIBLE PARTIES. MANUFACTURER MUST AWAIT ISSUANCE OF A CEASE AND DESIST ORDER BEFORE JURISDICTION WOULD LIE FOR REVIEW OF CHALLENGED INTERLOCUTORY RULING.

[756] Federal district lacked subject matter jurisdiction of soft drink manufacturer's action seeking to enjoin Federal Trade Commission from further action in its pending administrative proceeding against the manufacturer and alleging that such proceeding was fatally defective without joinder of manufacturer's 470 bottlers as indispensable parties; rather, manufacturer was required to await a cease and desist order by the Commission, if such order was ever to be issued, before jurisdiction would lie for review of challenged interlocutory ruling which denied manufacturer's motion to dismiss the administrative complaint on ground that the bottlers were indispensible parties.

On appeal, court held that federal district lacked subject matter jurisdiction of subject action which alleged that proceeding by F.T.C. was fatally defective without joinder of appellant's 470 bottlers as indispensible parties. Affirmed.

tion. Seven-Up sought below to enjoin the Federal Trade Commission from further action in its proceedings against Seven-Up, alleging that the administrative proceeding itself is fatally defective without the joinder of Seven-Up's 470 bottlers as indispensable parties.

Seven-Up, along with several other major soft drink manufacturers,[1] has been charged by the FTC with using an unfair method of competition through its license agreements with bottlers whereby the bottlers agree to not sell outside of designated geographical areas. Seven-Up moved to dismiss the administrative complaint, claiming that the bottlers are indispensible parties since they have important contract rights which are at stake in the proceedings. The motion to dismiss was denied by the Hearing Examiner whose order was then upheld by the Commission.[2] Seven-Up then petitioned the District Court for both injunctive and declaratory relief.

The Coca-Cola Company and PepsiCo., Inc., other respondents in the FTC proceedings, have both unsuccessfully presented the identical claim to the Fifth and Second Circuits. Coca-Cola Company v. FTC, 475 F.2d 299 (CA5 1973) and PepsiCo., Inc. v. FTC, 472 F.2d 179 (CA2 1972). We particularly agree with the reasoning of the Fifth Circuit and likewise hold that the action was properly dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Federal Courts have traditionally declined to interfere with ongoing agency proceedings under the doctrine requiring exhaustion of administrative remedies. See, McGee v. United States, 402 U.S. 479, 91 S.Ct. 1565, 29 L.Ed.2d 47 (1971); McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, [757] 89 S.Ct. 1657, 23 L.Ed.2d 194 (1969) and Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 50–52, 58 S.Ct. 459, 82 L.Ed. 638 (1938). Furthermore, Congress has here specified a statutory scheme which contemplates judicial review of cease and desist orders issued by the FTC exclusively by a court of appeals. 15 U.S.C. § 45 (c) and (d) provide in pertinent part that:

> (c) Any person, * * * required by an order of the Commission to cease and desist from using any method of competition or act or practice may obtain a review of such order in the court of appeals of the United States, * * *

This is fully in harmony with § 10(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act. See 5 U.S.C. § 704 and Coca-Cola, supra, 475 F.2d at 302.

The statutory provisions for review, however, have been held not to preclude district court review under all circumstances. See Elmo Divi-

[2] While we do not reach the merits of the indispensable party issue, we note that the joinder question also contains a dispute as to the underlying facts. The Hearing Examiner allowed any of the 470 bottlers to intervene if they so wished. One intervened. Seven-Up, however, asserts that this right to intervene was "limited" and insufficient. The FTC disagrees. See, e.g., PepsiCo., Inc. v. F. T. C., 472 F.2d 179, 183–184 (CA2 1972).

sion of Drive-X Co. v. Dixon, 121 U.S.App.D.C. 113, 348 F.2d 342, 343 (1965) and PepsiCo, supra, 472 F.2d at 185. Compare, Coca-Cola, supra, 475 F.2d at 302. It has been held that district courts have jurisdiction to grant relief during agency proceedings which are not yet final in certain specific instances. These include, (1) where the agency has acted in excess of its delegated powers or contrary to a specific statutory mandate. Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958); (2) where the proceedings involve questions of high national interest because of their international complexion. McCulloch v. Sociedad Nacional de Marineros de Honduras, 372 U.S. 10, 83 S.Ct. 671, 9 L.Ed.2d 547 (1963) and (3) where the agency has clearly violated the constitutional rights of the party seeking prior restraint. Fay v. Douds, 172 F.2d 720 (CA2 1949). Seven-Up clearly has not brought itself within any of these exceptions to the rule against judicial review of interlocutory agency rulings.

Seven-Up further asserts, however, that the FTC's refusal to join the bottlers as parties in its proceedings amounts to "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court" under the Administrative Procedure Act. 5 U.S.C. § 704. We disagree, for while the Commission's ruling on Seven-Up's motion at the most amounts to final agency action on the joinder issue, judicial review by a court of appeals can clearly be had once the Commission's proceedings are concluded. 5 U.S.C. § 704 goes on to provide that an interlocutory agency ruling "is subject to review on the review of the final agency action." Neither are we convinced that the absence of the bottlers as parties renders the proceedings so fundamentally defective that immediate judicial relief is required. As the Fifth Circuit stated in Coca-Cola, 475 F.2d at 304:

> The extraordinary remedy of judicial intervention in agency proceedings still in process is unavailable unless necessary to vindicate an unambiguous statutory or constitutional right, and only when this condition is satisfied will a court look to the general body of equitable jurisprudence and other appropriate sources for the purpose of fashioning relief. To adopt the plaintiffs' position, on the other hand, would be to make the rule that judicial intervention to "correct" an interlocutory agency ruling is available wherever an agency ruling differed from some equitable maxim.

We conclude that Seven-Up must await a cease and desist order by the FTC, if such is ever to be issued, before jurisdiction will lie for a review of the interlocutory ruling it challenges.[3]

Affirmed.

[3] We reject as without merit Seven-Up's contention that the standard of review on the joinder question, once the agency proceedings are completed, will necessarily be more stringent

AMERICAN GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, ET AL. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION*

Civ. A. No. 73-H-282. F.T.C. Docket 8847

(United States District Court, S.D. Texas, Houston Div., June 5, 1973)

1. By Seeking To Obtain Relief in District Court, Plaintiffs Were Improperly Attempting To Circumvent Statutory Scheme of Review and Avoid Adjudicatory Proceedings of F.T.C.

[887] Plaintiff holding company and the plaintiff company, which was proposed to be acquired, by seeking to obtain equitable relief in district court to declare Federal Trade Commission without subject matter jurisdiction to conduct proceeding with respect to challenge of merger were improperly attempting to circumvent statutory scheme of review and avoid adjudicatory proceedings of Commission which had denied motion of plaintiffs for summary decision on grounds that Commission lacked jurisdiction to challenge merger because subject matter of complaint involved business of insurance regulated by state law.

2. Action Must Be Made Reviewable by Statute or Final Agency Action With No Other Remedy in Court for Federal Court To Have Jurisdiction.

For federal court to have jurisdiction under Administrative Procedures Act, action must be one made reviewable by statute or a final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in court.

3. F.T.C.'s Summary Determination Was Not Res Judicata Even Though It Established Law of Case.

Federal Trade Commission's summary determination denying motion of plaintiffs to dismiss administrative proceedings on jurisdictional ground was interlocutory and while it established law of case it was not res judicata.

4. Denial of Summary Judgment Is Not a Final Decision as Contemplated by Statute.

Denial of motion for summary judgment is not a final decision as contemplated by statute such as to vest jurisdiction in an appellate forum to review the denial.

5. Interlocutory Appeal Will Not Lie From a Summary Interlocutory Order Which Is Not Made Appealable by Statute.

Interlocutory appeal will not lie from a summary interlocutory order which is not made appealable by statute.

6. Exception to Exhaustion Doctrine With Respect to Contravention of Statutory Mandate Is Narrowly Confined to Extreme Circumstances.

The exception to exhaustion doctrine with respect to administrative proceedings involving a plain contravention of statutory mandate is narrowly confined to the extreme circumstances.

*Reported in 359 F. Supp. 887 (1973); aff'd 496 F. 2d 197 (5 Cir. 1974), see p. 1060 herein. For case before the Commission, see ____ F.T.C. ___.

7. ACTION OF PLAINTIFFS TO ENJOIN F.T.C. FROM PROCEEDING WITH HEARINGS DID NOT FALL WITHIN NARROW EXCEPTION TO EXHAUSTION DOCTRINE.

Because it was not clear that the McCarran-Ferguson Act subjecting business of insurance to the laws of the several states clearly barred ability of Federal Trade Commission to challenge mergers of insurance companies, action by proposed merger candidates to enjoin Commission from proceeding with hearing challenging merger did not fall with[888]in narrow exception to exhaustion doctrine in cases of plain contravention of statutory mandate; plaintiffs had adequate remedy at law by way of review of final Commission order.

8. IMMUNITY FROM FEDERAL ANTITRUST LAW IS NOT LIGHTLY IMPLIED.

Immunity from federal antitrust laws is not lightly implied.

9. F.T.C. WAS NOT DEPRIVED OF JURISDICTION BY MCCARRAN-FERGUSON ACT BECAUSE STATE COULD NOT REGULATE EXTRATERRITORIALLY THE POTENTIAL REGULATION OF MERGER OF TEXAS AND MARYLAND CORPORATIONS.

Because state could not regulate extraterritorially the potential regulation of merger of Texas corporation and Maryland corporation, Federal Trade Commission was not deprived of jurisdiction by the McCarran-Ferguson Act, subjecting business of insurance to the laws of several states, from challenging the merger under Clayton Act where the impact of the merger would be felt in all states.

10. MCCARRAN-FERGUSON ACT DOES NOT PREEMPT F.T.C. JURISDICTION OVER PROPOSED MERGER.

McCarran-Ferguson Act providing for regulation by the laws of the several states of the business of insurance does not preempt Federal Trade Commission jurisdiction over proposed merger of holding company with various insurance company subsidiaries and another insurance company since the "business of insurance" within meaning of statute does not include merger activity.

11. PHRASE "BUSINESS OF INSURANCE" IN FEDERAL STATUTE LEAVING REGULATION OF INSURANCE BUSINESS TO STATES PRIMARILY INVOLVES RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INSURANCE COMPANY AND POLICYHOLDER.

The phrase "business of insurance" in federal statute leaving to the laws of the several states the regulation of the business of insurance involves primarily the relationship between the insurance company and the policyholder.

12. THERE ARE SEVERAL FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED IN DETERMINING WHETHER PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF IS APPROPRIATE.

Factors to be considered in determining whether preliminary injunctive relief is appropriate are: whether plaintiff is likely to prevail on merits, whether plaintiff is in danger of suffering irreparable harm, whether potential harm to defendant from issuance of injunction outweighs possible harm to plaintiff if injunctive relief is denied, and whether issuance of preliminary injunction will serve public interest.

13. PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF TO PREVENT F.T.C. FROM CHALLENGING MERGERS WAS DENIED IN VIEW OF UNLIKELY SUCCESS OF PLAINTIFFS ON MERITS AND FAILURE TO ESTABLISH DANGER OF IRREPARABLE HARM.

Preliminary injunctive relief to prevent Federal Trade Commission from challenging mergers of plaintiffs under Clayton Act based on plaintiffs' assertion that the insurance business was regulated by the laws of the various states was denied in view of unlikely success of plaintiffs on the merits and the failure to establish danger of irreparable harm.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

SEALS, District Judge.

Plaintiffs ask the Court in this action for declaratory and injunctive relief, to declare that the Federal Trade Commission is without subject matter jurisdiction to conduct proceedings in connection with In the Matter of American General Insurance Company, FTC Docket 8847, for the reason that the [889] McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1011 renders § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18 inapplicable to the merger of American General Insurance Company and Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland. Plaintiffs ask that a preliminary injunction issue against the Federal Trade Commission, its present members, and the administrative law judge involved in the administrative proceedings against Plaintiff American General Insurance Company enjoining them from conducting any further proceeding in FTC Docket No. 8847 until this Court has entered a final judgment determining the merits of this complaint, and that this Court enter a permanent injunction prohibiting Defendants from conducting any further proceedings in FTC Docket No. 8847 and directing Defendants to dismiss the Complaint therein in its entirety.

In response the Defendants have moved the Court to dismiss this action on the grounds that the Court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter and that the Complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. After hearing before the Court and upon the briefs and other papers filed with the Court, the Court makes the following Memorandum Opinion.

I.

This case has its roots in a merger agreement worked out in 1969 between American General Insurance Company and Fidelity and Deposit Company of Maryland. American General is a Texas corporation with its principal place of business in Houston, Texas. It is primarily a holding company: its subsidiaries include life insurance companies, property-liability insurance companies and financial noninsurance institutions. Fidelity and Deposit is a Maryland corporation with its principal place of business in Baltimore, Maryland. It is engaged in the business of writing property-liability insurance, primarily for commercial customers, and the majority of its writings consist of fidelity and surety bonds.

The merger agreement was submitted to the state insurance authorities of both Maryland and Texas who approved the plan. Subsequent to approval the new company applied for and received licenses to do business in all states where the prior companies had done business.

About June 17, 1971, the Federal Trade Commission issued a complaint alleging that American General had violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act by reason of its merger with Fidelity and Deposit. The basic allegation of the complaint was that the effect of the merger might be to lessen substantially competition or to tend to create a monopoly in the business of underwriting fidelity and surety bonds in the United States and in various states and other geographic markets.

In reply, American General alleged that the Federal Trade Commission lacked jurisdiction to challenge the merger in that the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011–1015 renders Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, inapplicable to the merger since the subject matter of the Commission's Complaint involves the business of insurance which is regulated by State law.[1] American General also denied the [890] principal allegations of the administrative complaint and requested that the complaint be dismissed. Following the intervention of Fidelity and Deposit in the administrative proceedings, plaintiffs filed a motion for summary decision on the jurisdictional ground.

Regulation by State law; Federal law relating specifically to insurance; applicability of certain Federal laws after June 30, 1948.

a. The business of insurance, and every person engaged therein, shall be subject to the laws of the several States which relate to the regulation or taxation of such business.

b. No Act of Congress shall be construed to invalidate, impair, or supersede any law enacted by any State for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance, or which imposes a fee or tax upon such business, unless such Act specifically related to the business of insurance: Provided, That after June 30, 1948, the Act of July 2, 1890, as amended known as the Sherman Act, and the Act of October 15, 1914, as amended known as the Clayton Act, and the Act of September 26, 1914, known as the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, shall be applicable to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by State law.

On March 7, 1972, the Commission's administrative law judge issued his initial decision granting the Plaintiffs' motion for summary decision and dismissing the complaint. He held that "the States of Maryland and Texas, and many of the other states, have laws, capable of being enforced, which regulate the business of insurance, within the contemplation and meaning of the McCarran-Ferguson Act," and that therefore "the Federal Trade Commission lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter of the complaint herein."

The Commission counsel supporting the administrative complaint appealed to the whole Commission and after submission of written briefs and oral argument, the Commission vacated and set aside the decision of the administrative law judge and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Commission (per Dennison, C.) held that because of territorial limitations on a state's ability to regulate, neither Texas nor Maryland, the respective domiciliary states of American General and Fidelity and Deposit, nor any other state have regulations effectively reviewing the effects of mergers of national insurance companies on the industry as a whole. The Commission held further that the merger of insurance companies is not included in the "business of insurance," the regulation of which by a state preempts federal jurisdiction under the McCarran-Ferguson Act. Thus, the Commission concluded that it was not preempted by the McCarran-Ferguson Act from challenging the instant merger. Following the Commission's action remanding the case Plaintiffs filed the suit now pending before this Court.

II.

Before this Court can consider Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief, it must first ascertain that it has the jurisdiction necessary to interfere in proceedings currently pending before an administrative agency such as the Federal Trade Commission. Stripped to the core, Plaintiffs' suit becomes an attempt to obtain review in this Court of the jurisdictional determination made by the Federal Trade Commission when it denied Plaintiffs' motion for summary decision. The Plaintiffs contend that such denial amounts to a final ruling within the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 704,[2]

Agency action made reviewable by statute and final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court are subject to judicial review. A preliminary, procedural, or intermediate agency action or ruling out directly reviewable is subject to review on the review of the final agency action. Except as otherwise expressly required by statute, agency action otherwise final is final for the purposes of this section whether or not there has been and that it is therefore within the jurisdiction of this Court for review.

The position of the Defendants is that the denial of motion for summary decision is an interlocutory order, not a "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court," 5 U.S.C. § 704, and that therefore the Plaintiffs have failed to exhaust available administrative remedies. Defendants maintain that the issue raised in Plaintiffs' complaint is one the determination of which lies exclusively within the jurisdiction of the court of appeals upon a [891] petition for review of a final order of the Commission, if indeed any order is ultimately entered against American General at the conclusion of the administrative proceeding. Under Defendants' theory the proper forum for review of a Commission proceeding initiated under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, is specified in Section 11(c) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(c), which provides:

> (c) Any person required by such order of the commission * * * to cease and desist from any such violation may obtain a review of such order in the court of appeals of the United States * * * .

Furthermore, the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals over Commission Clayton Act proceedings is exclusive.[3]

[1] It is the opinion of this Court that the Plaintiffs, by seeking to obtain equitable relief in this Court are in reality attempting to circumvent the statutory scheme of review and avoid the adjudicatory proceedings of the Commission. It is equally clear that the Supreme Court and this Circuit have repeatedly refused to allow obstructions to the orderly and expeditious operation of the administrative process. E.g., Allen v. Grand Central Aircraft Co., 347 U.S. 535, 74 S. Ct. 745, 98 L. Ed. 933 (1954); Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 58 S. Ct. 459, 82 L. Ed. 638 (1938); Bokat v. Tidewater Equipment Co., 363 F. 2d 667 (5th Cir. 1966).

[2–5] For this Court to have jurisdiction in this case under the Administrative Procedures Act, the action in question must either be one made reviewable by statute or a final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court. The denial of motion for summary decision in question in this instance is neither of these. In fact, it is analogous to a denial of motion for summary judgment and is therefore most properly characterized as interlocutory. While the Commission's summary determination as to its jurisdiction establishes presented or determined an application for a declaratory order, for any form of reconsideration, or, unless the agency otherwise requires by rule and provides that the action meanwhile is inoperative, for an appeal to superior agency authority.

[3] Section 11(d) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(d) provides as follows:

(d) Upon the filing of the record with it the jurisdiction of the court of appeals to affirm, enforce, modify, or set aside orders of the commission or board shall be exclusive.

the law of the case, it is not res judicata. Coffman v. Federal Laboratories, Inc., 171 F.2d 94 (3rd Cir. 1948); 6 Moore's Federal Practice, §§ 5614(2) at 2258 and 56.20(3–4) at 2759. Certainly a denial of a motion for summary judgment is not a "final decision" as contemplated by 28 U.S.C. § 1291 such as to vest jurisdiction in an appellate forum to review the denial. It is also clear that interlocutory appeal will not lie from a summary interlocutory order which is not made appealable by statute. 6 Moore's Federal Practice § 56.20(3.–1 at 2747).

Continuing the analogy, it is apparent that many of the considerations which support the final judgment rule with respect to appeals from interlocutory decisions of lower courts are equally applicable to actions by administrative agencies. It may be, for example, that the Commission will find in favor of American General on the merits of the administrative complaint, or that the case will be settled. However, should the Commission issue an order adverse to American General at the conclusion of the pending administrative proceeding, the court of appeals on review would best be able to assess the matter in the context of a completed administrative record. Since the denial of the motion of summary decision is not "final agency action" as contemplated by 5 U.S.C. § 704, this Court must conclude that it has no statutory jurisdiction to review the Commission's order.

The Plaintiffs maintain that a finding of jurisdiction under the Administrative Procedures Act is not essential to their case because jurisdiction is conferred by case law. It is their position that the instant case falls within the narrow exception to the exhaustion doctrine which has been judically carved by Leedom v. [892] Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958).

[6] In Kyne, the National Labor Relations Board in the course of a proceeding resulting in union certification, had grouped professionals with non-professionals in the same bargaining unit without a vote of the professionals. Such action was in defiance of an express statutory prohibition. The Supreme Court sustained jurisdiction in the district court to enjoin the NLRB from depriving some of the affected employees of a substantive right clearly granted to them by statute and from exercising authority clearly in excess of its jurisdiction. Significantly, without the district court's intervention, the deprivation could not have been reviewed pursuant to the statutory review procedures at the instance of the employees whose rights had been obliterated by the NLRB action.

Within the Fifth Circuit, the exception created by Leedom v. Kyne that only "a plain contravention of a statutory mandate" justifies district court interventions has been very narrowly confined to the extreme type of circumstances which resulted in the decision. Boire v.

Miami Herald Publishing Co., 343 F.2d 687 (5th Cir. 1965). Furthermore, such a rule has been found applicable to Federal Trade Commission proceedings. Federal Trade Commission v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 336 F.2d 687 (5th Cir. 1964). The Court stated its position most succinctly in United States v. Feaster, 410 F.2d 1354 (5th Cir. 1969):

> * * * Leedom v. Kyne represents only a narrow and rarely successfully invoked exception to the doctrine that exhaustion of administrative procedures is a condition precedent to federal court jurisdiction. Under this exception access to the courts is accorded only if the [agency's] determination is infused with error which is of a summa or magna quality as contraposed to decisions which are simply cum error. Only the egregious error melds the [agency's] decision into justiciability. Lesser malignancies thwart the jurisdiction of the courts (410 F.2d at 1368; citations omitted).

These narrow strictures of the Kyne exhaustion exception have been most recently reiterated in the Coca-Cola Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 475 F.2d 299, 5th Cir., 1973.

[7] In the case at hand we do not have the inadequacy of legal remedies which resulted in Kyne. The legal question will be subject to review when and if a final order issues from the Federal Trade Commission which Plaintiff would seek to appeal. Nor do we have in this case an assertion of jurisdiction by the Federal Trade Commission in flagrant disregard of their statutory authority as a matter of law on which this Court could ground any interference by it in the orderly process of administrative proceedings. It simply is not clear that the McCarran-Ferguson Act is a complete bar to the ability of the Federal Trade Commission to challenge the mergers of insurance companies under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Indeed, federal courts have held in similar situations that the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not preclude federal regulation being applied to the insurance industry. Federal Trade Commission v. Travelers Health Association, 362 U.S. 293, 80 S.Ct. 717, 4 L.Ed.2d 724 (1960); Securities and Exchange Commission v. National Securities, Inc., 393 U.S. 453, 89 S.Ct. 564, 21 L.Ed.2d 668 (1969); United States v. Chicago Title & Trust Co., 242 F. Supp. 56 (N.D.Ill.E.D.1965). In short, this case just does not fall within the narrow confines of Leedom v. Kyne.

This Court feels that the Plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, that being review of the final Commission order as provided by the Clayton Act. Such a holding is consistent with the Fifth Circuit's ruling in Frito-Lay, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 380 F.2d 8 (5th Cir. 1967), a case very close to this case on the facts. In that case, the Commission had issued an administra[893]tive complaint charging Frito-Lay with violations of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Frito-Lay challenged the Commission's jurisdiction to attack its acquisition of or merger with certain other corporations, arguing that it, Frito-Lay, was a "packer" within the meaning of the Packers and Stockyards Act; therefore, its acquisitions or mergers were under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture.[4]

The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in affirming the District Court's dismissal of the suit for failure to exhaust administrative remedies observed:

> Jurisdiction to review proceedings conducted by the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, is conferred upon the Courts of Appeals by Sectoin 11(c) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(c). Section 11(d), 15 U.S.C. § 21(d) makes that jurisdiction exclusive. All constitutional, jurisdictional, substantive, and procedural issues arising in Commission proceedings may be considered in a Section 11(c) appeal, * * * and this statutory right to review has long been viewed as constituting a speedy and adequate remedy at law. Where Congress has provided an adequate procedure for judicial review of administrative actions, that procedure must be followed * * * Judicial intervention without exhaustion of administrative remedies is not justified * * * where as here, the merit of [Plaintiff's] jurisdictional attack is far from clear, the administrative body may be more qualified than the court to initially consider the jurisdictional question, and the injury sought to be avoided is merely the normal cost of administrative litigation. See Davis, Administrative Law Text § 20.01-.03 (1959). [380 F.2d at 9; citations omitted.]

Having concluded that there has not yet been any final agency action, that the Federal Trade Commission has not clearly exceeded the bounds of its jurisdiction, and that the Plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law through review of the final Commission order as provided by the Clayton Act, this Court is compelled to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaint for failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

III.

Even if this Court were to find that it was within its jurisdiction to review the Federal Trade Commission's exercise of jurisdiction to challenge the American General-Fidelity and Deposit merger, the Court would still be forced to deny Plaintiffs the declaratory and injunctive relief which they seek. As noted before the Plaintiffs have asked this Court to rule that the McCarran-Ferguson Act in terms of the situation at hand means that the regulation of insurance company mergers is to be done by the individual states, and that only in the instance where a state has made no attempt to pass such legislation would the Federal Trade Commission have any jurisdiction to challenge the mergers. The Plaintiffs further maintain that since both Texas and Maryland have anti-trust regulations applicable to mergers, it is beyond the scope of authority of the Federal Trade Commission because of the McCarran-Ferguson Act to challenge such mergers. The Defendants take the position as first advanced in the opinion issued by the Commission denying summary decision on the jurisdictional point, that state regulation of the instant merger could not have extraterri[894]torial effect, and that merger activity is not a part of the "business of insurance," the regulation of which by a state preempts federal jurisdiction under the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

"It shall be unlawful * * * for any packer * * * to

(e) Engage in any course of business or do any act for the purpose or with the effect of * * * creating a monopoly in the acquisition of, buying, selling, or dealing in, any article in commerce, or of restraining commerce; * * *"

Packers and Stockyards Act, 7 U.S.C. § 193 authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the proscriptions contained in Section 192 of the Act.

Congress enacted the McCarran-Ferguson Act in reaction to the decision of the Supreme Court is United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533, 64 S.Ct. 1162, 88 L.Ed. 1440 (1944), in which the Court held that insurance transactions were subject under the Commerce Clause to federal regulation, including federal anti-trust laws. Prior to the South-Eastern Underwriters case it had generally been assumed, on the basis of Paul v. Virginia, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 1968, 19 L.Ed. 357 (1869), that the regulation of insurance transactions rested exclusively with the states. The legislative history of the Act indicates that Congress was mainly concerned with the relationship between insurance ratemaking and the antitrust laws, and with the power of the states to tax insurance companies. Indeed, the intent of the Act seemed to be to "assure that the activities of insurance companies in dealing with their policyholders would remain subject to state regulations." SEC v. National Securities, Inc., 393 U.S. 453, 458–459, 89 S.Ct. 564, 568, 21 L.Ed.2d 668 (1969).

The provision of the Act relevant to our consideration here, Section 2(b), 15 U.S.C. § 1012(b), states that the Sherman, Clayton, and Federal Trade Commission Acts "shall be applicable to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by State law." Interpretation of that section in light of the merits of the case at hand rests on the answers to two questions:

> A. Is it possible for individual States to regulate the merger activities of insurance companies operating in interstate commerce in national or regional markets?
> B. Does the "business of insurance" as used in Section 2(b) include the merger activities of such companies?

[8] The Court in interpreting Section 2(b) also takes note of the canon of construction set out in United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 83 S.Ct. 1715, 10 L.Ed.2d 915 (1963), that "immunity from the [federal] antitrust laws is not lightly implied."

A.

[9] The plaintiffs maintain that the individual states, in effect, regulate the merger activities through the anti-trust laws of the principal places of business of the merging companies, and through the licensing requirements of each of the states in which the new company does business. But the plain fact remains that a state's ability to regulate is bounded by its state lines. Furthermore, a state in regulating such activities as mergers will be concerned with the effect of the merger on business in that state; it will not examine a merger in terms of national effect, because it has no power to regulate beyond the boundaries of the state.[5]

In Maryland Casualty Co. v. American General Insurance Co., (1964) Trade Cas. 71,188 (D.D.C.1964), a case somewhat similar to the case at bar, the jurisdictional issue involved the application of Section 7 to the stock acquisition of a Maryland domiciled insurance company by a Texas domiciled insurance company. As in our case the acquired company was licensed and doing business in all fifty states. The Court held that the McCarran Act did not preclude [895] application of Section 7 of the Clayton Act to the merger. As observed by the court:

> No regulation of the proposed acquisition of control of [Maryland Casualty Co.] or its agencies under Texas or Maryland statutes can be adequate or effective because of territorial limitations of Texas and Maryland regulations. Texas and Maryland statutes do not provide for adequate or effective regulation of the proposed acquisition of control of [Maryland Casualty Co.] or its agencies and there is no such regulation thereunder as precludes this suit under the antitrust laws (71,188 at 79,719).

This concept that the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not contemplate extraterritorial regulation by the states was established by the Supreme Court in Federal Trade Commission v. Travelers Health Association, 362 U.S. 293, 80 S.Ct. 717, 4 L.Ed.2d 724 (1960). In that case the Commission was attempting to apply Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, to the advertising practices of an insurance company which was licensed in Nebraska and Virginia but which sold insurance policies by mail in all states. Nebraska had in force a statute which prohibited its domiciliaries from engaging in unfair and deceptive practices in the conduct of the business of insurance in any other state, territory, country or district. It was the conclusion of the Court of Appeals that because the domiciliary state had made provisions for regulating such advertising practices, that the McCarran-Ferguson Act precluded the Federal Trade Commission from regulating insurance advertising in interstate commerce. Travelers Health Association v. Federal Trade Commission, 262 F.2d 241 (8th Cir. 1959).

[5] An example of the inward focus of the states is found in the Model Insurance Holding Company System Regulatory Act, promulgated by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners and enacted and currently in force in substantially comparable form in some thirty-seven states including Maryland and Texas, which provides that:

The Commissioner is required to disprove the merger if he finds the effect of the purchases, exchanges, mergers, or other acquisitions of control may be substantially to lessen competition in insurance in this state, or tend to create a monopoly therein. (emphasis added).

The Supreme Court reversed. In concluding that McCarran-Ferguson does not operate to preempt federal jurisdiction by reason of a state's attempt to regulate its domiciliary's extraterritorial activities it observed:

> We cannot believe that this kind of law of a single state takes from the residents of every other State the protection of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

The Court in construing the Act, delved into Congressional intent relative to its enactment and extraterritorial regulation by the respective states, and concluded:

> * * * It is clear that Congress viewed state regulation of insurance solely in terms of regulation by the law of the State where occurred the activity sought to be regulated. There was no indication of any thought that a State could regulate activities carried on beyond its own borders. (362 U.S. at 300, 80 S.Ct. at 721).

The Court quoted the following statement made by Senator O'Mahoney, one of the three Senate conferees on the bill, as illustrative of meaning intended by Congress for Section 2(b) of the Act:

> When the moratorium period passes, the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act come to life again in the field of interstate commerce, and in the field of interstate regulation. Nothing in the proposed law would authorize a State to try to regulate for other States, or authorize any private group or association to regulate in the field of interstate commerce."

Thus, it is clear that the extraterritoriality rationale of Travelers applies with equal force to federal antitrust regulation under the Clayton Act. It is the conclusion of this Court that because a state cannot regulate extraterritorially, the potential regulation of the instant merger by Texas and Maryland, the domiciliary states of the Plaintiffs, does not by way of the McCarran-Ferguson Act deprive the Commission of jurisdiction to challenge the merger under Section 7 of the Clayton Act when the im-[896]pact of the merger obviously will be felt in all fifty states.

B.

[10, 11] We have held that the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not preempt Commission jurisdiction over the instant merger since no State can regulate extraterritorially. It is the further conclusion of this Court that the McCarran Act does not preempt Commission jurisdiction over this merger since the "business of insurance" does not include merger activity. Section 2(b) of the Act bars application of federal law which would "invalidate, impair or supersede any law enacted by any State for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance." Congress failed to define the scope of "business of insurance," and therefore it has been left to the courts to determine what activities of insurance companies are in fact the "business of insurance." [6]

The clearest delineation of what constitutes the "business of insurance" as contemplated by the McCarran-Ferguson Act is found in Securities and Exchange Commission v. National Securities, Inc., 393 U.S. 453, 89 S.Ct. 564, 21 L.Ed.2d 668 (1969). The SEC had brought suit against National Securities, an insurance company, alleging violation of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. § 78j(b), with regard to a fraudulent scheme centering on a contemplated merger of a subsidiary of National Securities and another insurance company.

The Supreme Court reversed the court of appeals who had upheld the district court's refusal to take action on the ground that to do so would violate Section 2(b) of McCarran-Ferguson in that the pertinent Arizona statute regulated the "business of insurance." The Supreme Court's examination of what constitutes the "business of insurance" is particularly useful as it relates to the case at bar. As analyzed by the Court:

> [The McCarran-Ferguson Act] did not purport to make the States supreme in regulating all the activities of insurance companies; its language refers not to the persons or companies who are subject to state regulation, but to laws "regulating the business of insurance." Insurance companies may do many things which are subject to paramount federal regulation; only when they are engaged in the "business of insurance" does the statute apply. Certainly the fixing of rates is part of this business; that is what South-Eastern Underwriters was all about. The selling and advertising of policies, FTC v. National Casualty, 357 U.S. 560, 78 S.Ct. 1260, 2 L.Ed.2d 1540 (1958), and the licensing of companies and their agents, cf. Robertson v. California, 328 U.S. 440, 66 S.Ct. 1160, 90 L.Ed. 1366 (1946), are also within the scope of the statute. Congress was concerned > with the type of state regulation that centers around the contract of insurance, the transaction which Paul v. Virginia held was not "commerce." The relationship between insurer and insured, the type of policy which could be issued, its reliability, interpretation, and enforcement—these were the core of the "business of insurance." * * * But whatever the exact scope of the statutory term, it is clear where the focus was—it was on the relationship between the insurance company and the policyholder. Statutes aimed at protecting or regulating this relationship, directly or indirectly, are laws regulating the "business of insurance." (393 U.S. 459–460, 89 S.Ct. 568).

[6] The Court takes note of the fact that issuing policies of insurance is only one facet of the modern insurance companies' activities; insurance companies, among other things, are major investors in the nation's public corporations; and are prime financers of commercial construction and land development.

The relationship involved in the merger of insurance companies is in essence one between individual companies and between those companies seeking to [897] merge and the industry as a whole. State anti-trust statutes seek to deal with the competitive aspects of these mergers, certainly a subject far removed from the relationship between the insurance company and the policyholder contemplated in National Securities as constituting the "business of insurance" to be protected by McCarran-Ferguson. This Court must conclude that the merger activity of insurance companies is not part of the "business of insurance" over which state regulation is given paramount importance in McCarran, and that Section 7 of the Clayton Act which is grounded on the federal interest in maintaining competition in interstate commerce in no sense invalidates, impairs, or supersedes state insurance laws which regulate the "business of insurance," i.e. the relationship between the insurance company and the policyholder.

IV.

[12] Plaintiffs have requested that the Court issue a preliminary injunction to stop pending Federal Trade Commission proceedings in FTC Docket 8847 pending the determination of this case on the merits. The factors to be considered by the Court in determining whether preliminary injunctive relief is appropriate are:

(1) whether the plaintiff is likely to prevail on the merits;

(2) whether the plaintiff is in danger of suffering irreparable harm;

(3) whether the potential harm to the defendant from issuance of the injunction outweighs the possible harm to the plaintiff if injunctive relief is denied;

(4) whether issuance of a preliminary injunction will serve the public interest.

Blackshear Residents v. Rommey, 472 F.2d 1197 (5th Cir., 1973). The discussions of jurisdiction and the merits of the case in which this Court has already engaged negate in large part the need to consider the request for preliminary injunction. However, because proof was offered on the subject at the hearing, the Court will evaluate it in terms of the four criteria set out above.

[13] As indicated by the previous discussion of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, the Court does not believe Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on the merits of this complaint. Furthermore, it is the opinion of this Court that the Plaintiffs failed to establish that they are in danger of suffering irreparable harm if the Commission is not enjoined from conducting the administrative proceeding.

The Plaintiffs attempted to show through statistics and testimony that the pending Federal Trade Commission case has caused them to lose business and to lose an increasing number of key employees which is resulting in irreparable injury. They argue that because of the Commission proceedings they have been unable to merge the companies and begin to offer the multiple line insurance coverage which is necessary to maintaining their competitive position in the market place. However, the Commission has taken no action to prevent such a consolidation. In fact, almost a year lapsed between the consummation of the merger agreement and the instituting of the Commission proceedings. Clearly, it is the Plaintiffs who have determined to withhold merging pending the outcome of the proceedings. Such action hardly constitutes the kind of irreparable harm a preliminary injunction is designed to prevent.

Likewise, the Court cannot accept the argument advanced by Plaintiff Fidelity and Deposit that they are losing an increasing number of key personnel as a result of the uncertainty created by the Commission. The testimony at the hearing indicated that Fidelity and Deposit is the kind of company that hires young men and women right out of college and subjects them to an intensive training program. As a result they have a large percentage of highly-trained and skilled people available which makes them subject to raids of personnel by competing companies. [898] Thus it cannot be said that the loss of personnel is the result of the pending Commission proceedings.

This Court is of the opinion that the granting of the injunctive relief requested by Plaintiffs would serve only to impede the efficient administration of the law by the Federal Trade Commission and would adversely affect third parties, including customers and competitors of American General and Fidelity and Deposit by denying them effective antitrust protection. It is the Federal Trade Commission's statutory obligation to protect the public from mergers which might result in substantially lessening competion or tending to create a monopoly. In this case the public interest is best served by denying the request for preliminary injunctive relief.

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that Plaintiffs' prayer for a preliminary, as well as a permanent injunction, and for declaratory relief shall be, and hereby is, denied; and that the Defendants' motion to dismiss is granted.

BORDEN, INC. v. F.T.C.*

Civ. A. No. 73 C 1187. FTC Docket 8866.

(United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, June 7, 1973)

In an action for declaratory judgment determining the jurisdiction of the F.T.C. and injunctive relief to enjoin the F.T.C. from conducting further administrative proceedings, court held that it is deprived of jurisdiction of Count I by the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies, and that even if it had jurisdiction, injunctive relief would not be warranted.

Before McLAREN, District Judge.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

This matter is before the Court upon the motion of defendant Federal Trade Commission ("Commission") to dismiss Count I of the complaint and the motion of plaintiff Borden, Inc. ("Borden") for a preliminary injunction under that count restraining the Commission, its staff, administrative law judges, and other agents from any further proceedings on the Commission's complaint issued against Borden and The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Inc. ("A&P"). For the reasons set forth below, the Commission's motion will be granted and Borden's motion will be denied

Count I alleges that the issuance of the Commission complaint (Docket No. 8866) followed a "clear and material violation of the Commission's own rules requiring notice to parties under investigation." The Commission had in effect during the relevant time period Rule 2.6, 16 C.F.R. § 2.6, or a rule substantially similar thereto. Rule 2.6 provides:

> Any person under investigation compelled or requested to furnish information or documentary evidence shall be advised with respect to the purpose and scope of the investigation.

It is alleged that one of the purposes and effects of Rule 2.6 is to provide the person under investigation an opportunity to furnish the Commission with exculpatory information respecting the acts or practices under investigation prior to the Commission's decision to issue a complaint.

It is further alleged on information and belief that during at least part of the relevant period the following unpublished Commission rule or directive implemented and interpreted Rule 2.6:

*Not otherwise reported; aff'd 495 F. 2d 785 (7 Cir. 1974), see p. 931 herein. For case before the Commission, see In the Matter of The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc., et al., 87 F.T.C. 962. See also p. 802 herein for district court's ruling as to Count II.

> As a matter of standard operating procedure, in any matter in which a recommendation for a complaint is contemplated the proposed respondent should be * * * afforded an opportunity to furnish information respecting the acts or practices involved prior to submitting the matter to the Commission with recommendation for complaint.

In November 1965, Borden began selling private label fluid milk products to A&P stores in the Chicago area. Counts I and II of the Commission complaint allege that A&P wrongfully induced discriminatory prices on said sales. Count III charges A&P and Borden with a combination, the effect of which was stabilization of prices. Borden is not charged with price discrimination.

The Commission investigation leading to its complaint commenced at some time prior to March 1967. During March 1967, Borden received notice that the Commission's Chicago Office was investigating whether Borden's sale of milk to A&P involved illegal price discrimination in violation of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(f), or sales at unreasonably low prices or at prices below cost for the purpose of eliminating or lessening competition in violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45. On January 21, 1969 the Commission authorized by formal resolution an investigation of Borden with respect to possible discriminatory pricing practices. Borden alleges that it was informed of this resolution in October 1969.

It is undisputed that Borden was not given notice that it was under investigation for possible charges of illegal combination or price stabilization prior to its receipt of a copy of the Commission complaint on June 1, 1971.

Borden moved before the administrative law judge that Count III of the Commission complaint be dismissed for violation of the Commission's rules. The motion was denied. Borden moved for reconsideratin of this denial, or in the alternative for certification of the denial to the Commission pursuant to Rule 3.23, 16 C.F.R. § 3.23. This motion was also denied. Administrative hearings on the complaint are scheduled to begin on June 11, 1973.

Borden alleges that the Commission's failure to provide notice and an opportunity to submit information relating to the Count III charges during the investigation violated the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 551–59, and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. As a result, the Commission is allegedly without jurisdiction to proceed on its complaint.

Borden's theory here is that Rule 2.6 and the unpublished rule cited above are designed to provide a potential respondent with an opportunity to present exculpatory information to the Commission staff prior to a decision to issue and prosecute a complaint. In effect, Borden contends that it is entitled by these rules to an opportunity to attempt to resolve the matter before the Commission issues a complaint. In support thereof it cites E. Pollock, Pre-Complaint Investigations by the Federal Trade Commission, 45 Chicago Bar Record 379, 381–82 (1964).

The Commission has taken the position here that the purpose of Rule 2.6 is to provide a standard of relevancy for one who is requested to produce documentary materials; it should not be interpreted—as Borden urges—to bar a complaint against a violation which is uncovered during an investigation simply because such a violation was not within the Rule 2.6 notification of purpose.[1]

Borden contends that it has shown that the requirements for the issuance of preliminary injunctive relief are met by the circumstances of this case. The Commission not only denies this, but seeks dismissal of Count I on the ground that Borden has failed to exhaust its administrative remedies, thus depriving this Court of jurisdiction. It has been recognized that the exhaustion doctrine relates to the timing of, rather than the power to, review, and rests, at least in part, on general equity principles. Bannercraft Clothing Co. v. Renegotiation Bd., 466 F.2d 345, 355–59 (D.C.Cir. 1972). It is thus no coincidence that the two factors which the Court finds to be dispositive of the exhaustion issue in the Commission's favor below would, if jurisdiction existed, nevertheless require the denial of Borden's motion for a preliminary injunction.

The first factor is the requirement that a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits be shown. The "merits" of Count I has to do with the issue of whether the Commission has jurisdiction to proceed on its complaint against Borden. In cases challenging agency jurisdiction which have dealt with the exhaustion issue, the relative clarity of administrative jurisdiction appears to have been considered relevant. See Lone Star Cement Corp. v. FTC, 339 F.2d 505 (9th Cir. 1964); 3 K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 20.03, at 69; cf. Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 188 (1958) (where the statute was "clear and mandatory").

Borden's asserted right to pursue informal settlement and explanation prior to the filing of a complaint does not appear plainly on the face of Rule 2.6. The unpublished rule cited as evidence of that interpretation simply states that a party should be given an opportunity to supply information respecting the matters under investigation. Granted that the latter rule begins with the phrase "as a matter of standard operating procedure," it is not clearly mandatory that such an opportunity be provided.

[1] It should be noted that the scope of a formal subpoena duces tecum is defined by a Commission resolution.

Borden's contention that the Commission lacks jurisdiction must be considered in light of the explicit rule providing for informal disposition. Rule 2.21, 16 C.F.R. § 2.21, states:

> (a) The Commission, when it has information indicating that a person or persons may be engaging in a practice which may involve violation of a law administered by it, and if it deems the public interest will be fully safeguarded thereby may afford such person or persons the opportunity to have a matter disposed of on an informal nonadjudicatory basis.
> (b) In determining whether the public interest will be fully safeguarded through such informal administrative action, the Commission will consider: (1) the nature and gravity of the alleged violation; (2) the prior record and good faith of the parties involved; and (3) other factors, including, where appropriate, adequate assurance of voluntary compliance.[2]

On November 29, 1969, the Commission issued a statement explaining Rule 2.21. 34 Federal Register 19044; 3 Trade Reg. Rep. ¶9591.18, at 17,092.

It is clear from Rule 2.21 and the explanatory statement that the Commission considers this informal enforcement procedure to be within its discretion. Even granting arguendo that Borden could not have attempted to achieve an informal settlement on Count III of the Commission's complaint when it did not know of the nature of the investigation, the contention, based on Rule 2.6, that an opportunity for informal settlement is a jurisdictional requirement is weak in light of the apparent discretionary nature of such settlement.

However, the most significant point against Borden's reading of the Commission's rules—and thus its contention that the Commission lacks jurisdiction—is the interpretation contended for by the Commission itself. It is obvious that the best source for the meaning of the rules is the agency which promulgated them. The courts accord great weight to an administrative agency's interpretation of its rules; indeed, its interpretation is binding unless plainly erroneous or inconsistent with the regulation. Bowles v. Seminole Rock & Sand Co., 325 U.S. 410, 414 (1945); FCC v. Pottsville Broadcasting Co., 309 U.S. 134, 143 n.6 (1940). The Commission's interpretation of the rules at issue is neither. Rather, it is a good deal more plausible than that proposed by Borden, particularly in the light of the Commission's procedure with respect to formal subpoenas, as noted above. Borden's reading would bar the Commission from filing a complaint for illegal acts discovered during an investigation unless a second Rule 2.6 notice were sent and opportunity provided for a second round of informal discussions—all notwithstanding the Commission's clear intention that the use of these procedures be discretionary.

This Court has concluded that it is not at all clear that the Commission lacks jurisdiction to proceed on its complaint.[3] This factor alone is sufficient to preclude judicial interference in the administrative process under the exhaustion doctrine and to prevent the issuance of a preliminary injunction, even if jurisdiction existed. This is so because plaintiff has thus failed to show a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits.

Another factor prevents jurisdiction and preliminary injunctive relief here as well. To justify deviation from the exhaustion doctrine and granting of injunctive relief, the cases demand that irreparable injury be shown.

Borden argues that it will be irreparably harmed if it does not obtain review of the Commission's jurisdiction to proceed on its complaint because the court of appeals will not inquire into the propriety of the issuance of the complaint if an appeal is taken from a final Commission order. It relies upon Jewel Cos., Inc. v. FTC, 432 F.2d 1155, 1159 (7th Cir. 1970). Whatever the basis for the court's statement there that on review it "would only decide whether the final order is supported by the evidence and not question the authority of the Commission in issuing the complaint * * *," this court believes that the factual and legal circumstances of this case are distinguishable from those in Jewel. The issue there was whether a commissioner had misconstrued the statute controlling the issuance of complaints under the Clayton Act. The court of appeals characterized the question as "inherently a legal one" and "one of statutory construction" and concluded that "[t]he legal obligation, * * * can be determined by the courts without delay and we think the proper approach is to allow such inherently legal attacks prior to an agency's final order." Id. (emphasis added)

The nature of the legal question involved here differs in a significant way from that in Jewel. There, the legal question required the interpretation of a statute—a task to which the courts are accustomed and well suited and to which administrative agencies have no claim of expertise. 4 Davis § 30.01, at 241. In the area of interpretation of agency rules, however, the primary responsibility of interpretation rests with the agencies themselves and, as noted above, great weight is accorded their interpretations. Thus the determination of the jurisdictional issue in this case, unlike that in Jewel, is not susceptible to determination by the Court without delay.

[3] This absence of clarity that the Commission lacks jurisdiction is in marked contrast to the cases upon which Borden relies. In Jewel Cos., Inc. v. FTC, 432 F.2d 1155 (7th Cir. 1970) the result depended upon statutory construction. Similarly, in Elmo Division of Drive-X Co. v. Dixon, 348 F.2d 342 (D.C.Cir. 1965), the court considered the question analogous to statutory construction since the rule filled in the statute's "interstices" and furthermore was incorporated into an earlier consent decree.

The issuance of the Commission's complaint would seem to constitute intermediate agency action and the decisions of the administrative law judge would appear to be procedural rulings within the scope of the court of appeals' power to review under 5 U.S.C. § 704. No reported case has extended Jewel's statement that the propriety of the issuance of the Commission complaint would not be reviewed to the situation where the propriety depends upon an interpretation of the Commission's rules, rather than a statute. And the Court finds the situations to be distinguishable in any event, as previously noted. Thus the possibility that Borden will be deprived of all judicial review of the issuance of the complaint seems remote. Certainly the Commission, which has repeatedly asserted that this is the type of issue the court of appeals will consider on review (Memorandum in Support of Defendant's Opposition to Plaintiff's Motion for Preliminary Injunction, at 8–9; Transcript of Proceedings on May 23, 1973, at 47 and 49) cannot argue to the contrary in good conscience if appeal is taken from a final order. To the extent that Borden contends that it will suffer actual prejudice in the Commission hearing due to the action complained of, the FTC has argued, and it appears, that the court of appeals would be free to examine any alleged unfairness. Sterling Drug Inc. v. FTC, 450 F.2d 698, 712 n. 13 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

Borden also alleges in its complaint that it will be irreparably harmed in that there is a risk that a different standard of review would apply on a final appeal of a Commission order. Borden apparently assumes that this Court could substitute its own judgment with respect to the Commission's interpretation of its rules, whereas on appeal the standard would be whether the Commission acted reasonably. Such an assumption seems to be unmerited. Cf. FCC v. Schreiber, 381 U.S. 279, 291 (1965). In reaching this conclusion the Court also notes that an agency's interpretation of its own procedural rules is to be given great weight, supra.

Borden further contends that it will be irreparably injured by the cost and inconvenience of defending against the Commission complaint. In other cases in which agency jurisdiction has been challenged, the courts have responded to this contention in various ways. In Petroleum Exploration, Inc. v. Public Service Comm'n, 304 U.S. 209, 221 (1938) the Supreme Court declared that the cost of the administrative proceeding "is not the sort of irreparable injury against which equity protects." The Supreme Court did take such costs into account in affirming an injunction against a state utilities commission in Public Utilities Comm'n v. United Fuel Gas Co., 317 U.S. 456, 469 (1943). There, however, the commission orders were "plainly invalid."

In comparing these two cases, Professor Davis has observed with respect to Petroleum Exploration, Inc. that:

> [i]nstead of this unqualified proposition that equity does not protect against expense of an investigation that may be unauthorized, the Court might well have advanced the proposition that equity does protect against such expense if the lack of the agency's jurisdiction clearly appears from facts and policy that the Court is qualified to pass upon.

Following United Fuel Gas, this Court is of the view that jurisdiction must be clearly lacking before the cost of the administrative proceeding can justify judicial intervention.

For the foregoing reasons, the Court has concluded that it is deprived of jurisdiction of Count I by the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies, and that even if it had jurisdiction, injunctive relief would not be warranted. Accordingly, the Commission's motion to dismiss that count is granted and Borden's motion for a preliminary injunction is denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

WARNER-LAMBERT COMPANY v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, ET AL.*

Civ. A. No. 652–73. F.T.C. Docket 8891

(United States District Court, District of Columbia, June 14, 1973)

1. Drug Manufacturer Did Not Have Standing To Challenge Memorandum of Understanding Between F.T.C. and F.D.A.

   [949] Drug manufacturer did not have standing, in proceeding to restrain FTC from undertaking further proceedings with regard to the labeling claims of drug and to restrain FDA from further proceeding with its review of over-the-counter cold remedies, to challenge memorandum of understanding which was issued jointly by the FTC and FDA and which was promulgated primarily for convenience of agencies in carrying out their functions under two different statutes.

2. Proceedings by F.D.A. To Review All OTC Drugs and by F.T.C. Against One Such Drug Were Not Within Provisions of Memorandum of Understanding Between the Two Regulatory Agencies.

   Proceedings by FDA to review all over-the-counter drugs and by FTC against one such drug were not within provisions of memorandum of understanding which was issued jointly by FTC and FDA and by which these agencies agreed to limit proceedings where FTC would file a complaint seeking a cease and desist order on basis of false and misleading claims and where FDA would initiate a seizure proceeding seeking to condemn product on same grounds.

Even if disparate actions of FTC, which issued administrative complaint with regard to cold and sore throat labeling claims of drug, and FDA, which sought review of all over-the-counter drugs, could be construed as simultaneous duplicative proceedings against a mouthwash preparation, manufacturer had no basis on which to maintain action to restrain these agencies from undertaking further proceedings, where action was neither unlawful nor arbitrary and capricious.

Memorandum Opinion and Order

This matter is before the Court for consideration of defendants' motion for summary judgment. Upon consideration of the complaint, the motion of defendants for summary judgment, the opposition of plaintiff thereto, and it appearing to the Court that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact, the motion of defendants for summary judgment is granted, based upon the following:

Plaintiff, Warner-Lambert Company (hereinafter referred to as "Warner-Lambert"), is engaged in the manufacture, advertising, labeling and sale of [950] the mouthwash preparation Listerine Antiseptic (hereinafter referred to as "Listerine").

The Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter referred to as "FTC") is an administrative agency of the United States established by the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 41 et seq. for the purpose, inter alia, of preventing unfair methods of competition and unfair and deceptive acts and practices.

Individual defendants, Engman, Dixon, MacIntyre, Jones and Dennison are commissioners of the FTC.

Individual defendants Weinberger and Gardner (hereinafter referred to collectively as "FDA") are the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and the Acting Commissioner of Food and Drugs, respectively.

The Secretary and Commissioner are responsible, inter alia, for the enforcement of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act. 21 U.S.C. § 301 et seq.

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

This action seeks to restrain the Federal Trade Commission from undertaking further proceedings in FTC Docket No. 8891, and to restrain the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and the Commissioner of Food and Drugs from further proceeding with its review of over-the-counter cold remedies, unless and until the two federal agencies take appropriate action to prevent the conduct of two simultaneous proceedings with regard to the cold and sore throat claims of Listerine Antiseptic. The action further seeks to restrain the Federal Trade Commission from undertaking further proceedings in FTC Docket No. 8891 with regard to the cold and sore throat labeling claims of Listerine Antiseptic.

A.

The FTC Proceeding

Plaintiff is the respondent in an adjudicative proceeding presently pending before the FTC under FTC Docket 8891. The proceeding was initiated by issuance of an administrative complaint on June 27, 1972. A copy of the administrative complaint is attached to Warner-Lambert's complaint as Attachment A.

The complaint, in general, alleges Warner-Lambert, in its advertising, offering for sale, sale and distribution of the mouthwash preparation Listerine to retailers for resale to the public, has misrepresented by false, deceptive and misleading statements the effect of the product in the prevention, cure, treatment and mitigation of colds and sore throats. The false, deceptive and misleading statements were, it is averred, made on packages or labels, printed advertisements, and television commercials.

The allegations of the complaint also state Warner-Lambert has falsely represented that the use of Listerine would make colds milder or less severe, by relieving or lessening the severity of cold symptoms to a significant degree. It is also stated Warner-Lambert has misrepresented that its most recent test results and studies prove or support the representation that children "who gargle with Listerine twice a day have fewer and milder colds and miss fewer days of school because of colds than do those children who do not gargle with Listerine twice a day."

The complaint further alleges Warner-Lambert, through the use of the statement "Kills Germs by Millions on Contact," represents, contrary to fact, that the ability of Listerine to kill germs is of medical significance in the prevention, cure or treatment of colds and sore throats. Such representations, the complaint states, have the capacity and tendency to mislead the purchasing public into the purchase of substantial quantities of Listerine to the injury of the public and in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45).

Warner-Lambert, on August 30, 1972, filed an answer denying the substantive averments of the FTC complaint (Attachment B to the complaint). Hear[951]ings before the Administrative Law Judge have been scheduled to commence on September 24, 1973.

B.

The FDA Proceeding

Recognizing that self-medication is essential to the nation's health care system, FDA has concluded: it is "imperative that over-the-counter drugs available for human use be safe and effective and bear fully informative labeling" and a substantial number of the 100,000 to 500,000 over-the-counter drugs on the market do not have their claimed effect. 37 Fed.Reg. 85 (1972). Because of the inadequacy, great cost, and burden on the courts of proceeding against individual drugs on a case-by-case basis, the Commissioner of Food and Drugs, on December 30, 1971, proposed new regulations setting up a procedure for a thorough and complete review of all over-the-counter drugs. 37 Fed.Reg. 85 (1972).

The proposed regulations were published in final form on May 11, 1972.[1] An advisory panel of qualified experts, for each of 26 categories of over-the-counter drugs, upon consideration of, inter alia, data submitted by drug manufacturers relating to the safety and effectiveness of the drug involved, will submit to the Commissioner a report containing its conclusions and recommendations with respect to the category of drug it has reviewed. Included in this report will be a recommended monograph, which shall establish the conditions under which the drugs involved are generally recognized as safe and effective and not misbranded. 21 C.F.R. 130.301(a)(1)–(5), 37 Fed.Reg. 9474 (1972). Thereafter, the Commissioner shall publish: (1) a proposed monograph, after which comments are invited; (2) a tentative final monograph following a review of the comments received; and (3) a final monograph, following a review of the objections of the tentative final monograph and a consideration of any oral hearing before the Commissioner, if any. The final monograph constitutes final agency action from which appeal lies to the courts 21 C.F.R. 130.301(a)(10). Any product which fails to conform to the final monograph is liable to regulatory action. 21 C.F.R. 130.301(a)(12), 37 Fed.Reg. 9475 (1972).

Advisory panels of experts for certain of the categories of OTC drugs have already convened. One proposed monograph, relating to antacid drugs, has been published. 38 Fed.Reg. 8714 (1973). With respect to cold remedies, Listerine is one of many products to be reviewed. No monograph has yet been proposed. An invitation for all interested persons to submit data bearing on the safety and effectiveness of the ingredients of cough-cold remedies was published on August 9, 1972. 37 Fed.Reg. 16029. The purpose of FDA's request is to gain information seeking to establish product standards applicable to the entire industry. As a nonprescription cough and cold remedy, Listerine will be subject to the requirements of any monograph issued by FDA pursuant to the rulemaking proceedings.[2]

C.

Plaintiff argues the two proceedings complained of are unlawful in that they violate a "rule" of both agencies. The "rule" which plaintiff asserts is binding upon defendants is a "Memorandum of Understanding" issued jointly by FTC and FDA and published at 36 Fed. Reg. 18539 (1971). Plaintiff's contention is erroneous. Even assuming, arguendo, the "rule" is binding on defendants,[3] it is [952] clear it does not apply to the proceedings in issue.

[1] The Memorandum is an agreement between the two agencies promulgated primarily for the convenience of the agencies in carrying out their functions under two different statutes. The only parties to the agreement were the two agencies involved, and an individual private party, such as plaintiff, may not invoke the agreement in challenging these agency actions. Furthermore, in the Court's opinion, the agreement has not been breached. It is apparent from the affidavits of Messrs. Freer and Fine filed with the Court on May 1, 1973 that there was considerable liaison resulting in an express agreement between the two agencies sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Memorandum of Understanding.

As far as the proceedings themselves are concerned, it is the Court's opinion they are quite different. As has been pointed out previously, the proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission is an adversary proceeding. It is an adjudicatory proceeding. It involves only Warner-Lambert.

The proceeding before the Food and Drug Administration is a rulemaking proceeding. It involves thousands of manufacturers of over-the-counter products, including cold remedies. It is a proceeding which individual companies can participate in or decline to participate in, at their option, recognizing it may also be to their possible disadvantage.

If this Court were to require the Food and Drug Administration to exempt plaintiff from its proceeding, it seems such action would give plaintiff a discriminatory preference over the manufacturers of many products of a similar kind, namely, over-the-counter cold remedy products.

[2] The joint proceedings which FDA and FTC agreed to limit were intended to be proceedings where the FTC would file a complaint seeking a cease-and-desist order on the basis of false and misleading claims, and where the FDA would institute a seizure proceeding seeking to condemn the product on the same grounds. It is certain that the present proceedings, i.e., the FDA review of all OTC drugs, and the FTC complaint against one OTC drug, are not within the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding. For if this were the case, then the FTC would now be foreclosed from proceeding against any of the 100,000 to 500,000 OTC drugs currently on the market, no matter how false or how misleading the claims for such a product.

D.

[3] The Supreme Court has long held that the same issues and parties may be proceeded against simultaneously by more than one agency. FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 68 S.Ct. 793, 92 L.Ed. 1010 (1948); United States v. W. T. Grant Company, 345 U.S. 629, 631–632, 73 S.Ct. 894, 97 L.Ed. 1303 (1953); United States v. Radio Corpo- ration of America, 358 U.S. 334, 343–344, 79 S.Ct. 457, 3 L.Ed.2d 354 (1959); FTC v. Motion Picture Advertising Service Company, 344 U.S. 392, 73 S.Ct. 361, 97 L.Ed. 426 (1953); United States v. Borden Company, 347 U.S. 514, 74 S.Ct. 703, 98 L.Ed. 903 (1954). In FTC v. Cement Institute, supra, the defendant sought dismissal of the FTC proceedings on the basis that the Department of Justice had proceeded against them in District Court under the Sherman Act. The defendant, as plaintiffs do here, asserted that it was against the public interest to defend both the FTC proceeding and the Sherman Act proceeding which were based on the same alleged misconduct. The Supreme Court, in a holding that has been followed many times, stated that the Sherman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act provide the Government with cumulative remedies which are not mutually exclusive.

[4, 5] These same principles apply to the concurrent actions of FDA and FTC which may involve the same parties or [953] issues. The propriety of simultaneous FDA–FTC proceedings involving the same issues does not, as claimant would have this Court believe (Complaint, par. 17), present a novel legal issue. For in at least three cases, the courts, including this Court, have held that concurrent FDA–FTC proceedings involving the same or similar matters are proper, and that the statutory remedies of the two agencies are cumulative and not mutually exclusive. United States v. 1 Dozen Bottles, etc., 146 F.2d 361 (4 Cir. 1944); United States v. *5 Cases * * * Capon Springs Water*, 156 F.2d 493 (2 Cir. 1946); United States v. "* * * Instant Alberty Food * * *.", 83 F. Supp. 882 (D.D.C. 1949).

[6] In the present case, even if the disparate actions of the FTC and FDA could be construed as simultaneous duplicative proceedings against Listerine Antiseptic, it is clear that the action is neither unlawful nor arbitrary and capricious and therefore plaintiff has no basis upon which to maintain this action.

E.

Plaintiff has available administrative remedies before each agency which have not been exhausted. Still to be completed before FTC is the administrative proceeding in which Warner-Lambert will have full opportunity to present evidence and argument in its behalf. If the adjudicative proceedings do terminate in an order against Warner-Lambert to cease and desist, Warner-Lambert has the right to appeal directly to a United States Court of Appeals. Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45. The Act further provides that the jurisdiction of the courts of appeals "to affirm, enforce, modify or set aside orders of the Commission shall be exclusive." 15

U.S.C. § 45(d). The Act nowhere provides for a review in district courts of interlocutory rulings by the Commission, and 5 U.S.C. § 704 expressly provides: "A preliminary, procedural or intermediate agency action or ruling not directly reviewable is subject to review on the review of the final agency action." Similarly, if FDA issues a monograph at the conclusion of its proceedings, review of that action may be sought in the courts.[4]

CONCLUSION

Having considered the foregoing, the Court concludes: there is a rational basis for the actions of each of the agencies in initiating and pursuing their individual proceedings; plaintiff does not have standing to challenge, in this action, the Memorandum of Understanding between the agencies; the two agencies complied with the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding; the proceedings before the two agencies are not duplicative; plaintiff has not exhausted its administrative remedies; there is no evidence of record that plaintiff is required to respond to the proceeding before FDA, although its failure to respond may be at its peril; and there is no indication that it is in the public interest to enjoin the disparate agency proceedings at this stage.

In summary, plaintiff has not met the criteria for the granting of a preliminary injunction and its motion for a preliminary injunction is denied. Count II of the complaint seeking a permanent injunction against FTC maintaining the labeling charges against plaintiff is dismissed and defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted.

The foregoing shall constitute the Court's Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Order.

CHARNITA, INC., ET. AL. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, ET AL.*

No. 72-1707. F.T.C. Docket 8829

(United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, June 25, 1973)

1. JUDGMENT NOTE TRANSACTIONS PERMITTED BY LAW OF PENNSYLVANIA ARE COVERED BY REGULATION OF BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM ENACTED TO CARRY OUT PURPOSES OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT.

[684] Regulations of board of governors of Federal Reserve system enacted to carry out purposes of Truth in Lending Act covered judgment note transactions whereby real estate vendor took judgment notes which were permitted by law [685] of Pennsylvania and which, when filed with prothonotary, created lien on all real estate of debtor in the county.

[4] 21 C.F.R. 130.301(a)(10) provides that the monograph contained in the final order constitutes final agency action from which appeal lies to the courts.

*Reported in 479 F.2d 684 (1973). For case before the Commission, see 80 F.T.C. 892.

2. PROMULGATION OF REGULATION WAS REASONABLE EXERCISE OF AUTHORITY GRANTED BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM BY STATUTE.

Promulgation of regulation, by board of governors of Federal Reserve system, to carry out purposes of Truth in Lending Act was reasonable exercise of authority granted by the statute and was consonant with discretion granted by Congress to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

3. REALTY VENDORS' INSISTENCE IN KEEPING POSSESSION DEED UNTIL CERTAIN NUMBER OF PAYMENTS ARE MADE, CONSTITUTED "SECURITY INTEREST" UNDER THE TRUTH IN LENDING ACT.

Insistence of realty vendor in keeping possession of deed until certain number of payments had been made by purchaser, depriving purchaser of possibility of recordation, constituted "security interest" within Truth in Lending Act and regulations promulgated thereunder.

4. SALE OF UNIMPROVED LAND NOT COVERED BY PROVISION OF TRUTH IN LENDING ACT APPLYING TO RETENTION OF FIRST LIEN AGAINST DWELLING TO FINANCE ACQUISITION OF THAT DWELLING.

Provision of Truth in Lending Act that "this section does not apply to the creation or retention of a first lien against a dwelling to finance the acquisition of that dwelling" applied only to "dwelling" and not to mere sale of unimproved land.

5. F.T.C. ORDER REQUIRING VENDOR TO OFFER RIGHT OF RESCISSION WAS REASONABLE AND NOT BEYOND AUTHORITY OF COMMISSION.

Where vendor of realty committed various violations of Truth in Lending Act and was found to have taken security interests by reason of which purchasers should have had right to rescind the transactions until midnight of third business day following consummation of transaction or delivery of disclosures required, Federal Trade Commission's order that vendor offer right of rescission by two-step process designed to identify eligible parties and extend to them the opportunity to rescind was reasonable and not beyond authority of Commission, and would be enforced.

(Syllabus, With Substituted Captions, Was Taken From 479 F.2d 684)

Court held that regulations of board of governors of the Federal Reserve System were a reasonable exercise of authority under the Truth in Lending Act and that the F.T.C. order requiring vendor to offer right of rescission by a two-step process was reasonable and not beyond the Commission's authority.

Order affirmed and enforced.

OPINION OF THE COURT

WEIS, Circuit Judge.

The Federal Trade Commission has issued an order finding that there were violations of the Truth in Lending Act by petitioner Charnita, Inc. and requiring it to give notice to certain of its customers an opportunity to rescind their transactions.

Charnita, Inc. is a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the business of selling land for recreational and residential home sites in that state. Many of the sales are credit transactions and in the period from July 1, 1969 to March, 1970 involved the use of the "judgment note" which is permitted by the law of Pennsylvania. This type of promissory note enables the holder to enter judgment in the state court without notice or opportunity to be heard being extended to the maker. Filing of the note with the prothonotary of the court immediately creates a lien on all real estate in the county.

In the period after November, 1970, the promissory note was altered to state that real estate to be used as a principal residence of the maker was exempted from the lien of the confessed judgment, but Charnita then instituted the practice of retaining the deed to the lot in its possession until after the purchaser had made four or more payments.

[686] The FTC found that various violations of the Truth in Lending Act [1] had occurred which were not seriously questioned by appellant. The Commission further determined that the judgment notes given by the purchasers in the period from July 1, 1969 to March, 1970 and the withholding of the deeds by Charnita constituted "security interests" within the scope of the Act and interpretative regulations. The appellant was therefore required to take appropriate steps to advise eligible purchasers of the right to rescind granted by § 125 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1635(a).[2]

[2] "(a) Except as otherwise provided in this section, in the case of any consumer credit transaction in which a security interest is retained or acquired in any real property which is used or is expected to be used as the residence of the person to whom credit is extended, the obligor shall have the right to rescind the transaction until midnight of the third business day following the consummation of the transaction or the delivery of the disclosures required under this section and all other material disclosures required under this part whichever is later by notifying the creditor, in accordance with regulations of the Board of his intention to do so. The creditor shall clearly and conspicuously disclose, in accordance with regulations of the Board, to any obligor in a transaction subject to this section the rights of the obligor under this section. The creditor shall also provide, in accordance with regulations of the Board, an adequate opportunity to the obligor to exercise his right to rescind any transaction subject to this section."

The principal issues to be decided on this appeal are whether the determinations of the existence of "security interests" were properly made.

The Act authorized the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to enact appropriate regulations to carry out the purposes of the statute. The authorization was quite broad and provided, "These regulations may contain such classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such adjustments and exceptions for any class of tranactions, as in the judgment of the Board are necessary or proper to effectuate the purposes of this subchapter, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate compliance therewith."[8]

The Supreme Court in Mourning v. Family Publications Service, Inc., 411 U.S. 356, 93 S.Ct. 1652, 36 L.Ed. 318 (1973), recognizing the wide scope of authority granted, noted that Congress was aware that there could be evasion of the requirements of the Act and that accordingly the Board was given the power to prevent noncompliance by the use of varied and ingenious subterfuges. The Court stated the standard to be "Given that some remedial measure was authorized, the question remaining is whether the measure chosen is reasonably related to its objectives." (page —, 93 S.Ct. page 1661).

The Act itself does not set out the meaning of "security interest" but the Board supplied the definition in its regulation, 12 CFR § 226.2 (z), where we read the following:

> "Security interest" and "security" means any interest in property which secures payment or performance of an obligation. The terms include, but are not limited to, security interest under the Uniform Commercial Code, real property mortgages, deeds of trust, and other consensual or confessed liens whether or not recorded, mechanic's, materialmen's, artisan's, and other similar liens, vendor's liens in both real and personal property, the interest of a seller in a contract for the sale of real property, any lien on property arising by operation of law, and any interest in a lease when used to secure payment or performance of an obligation.

By way of further explanation, in 12 CFR § 226.202(a) the Board said:

> Under § 226.2(z) "security interest" is defined to include confessed liens whether or not recorded * * * (b) In some of the States, confession of judgment clauses or cognovit provi[687]sions are lawful and make it possible for the holder of an obligation containing such clause or provision to record a lien on property of the obligor simply by recordation entry of judgment; the obligor is afforded no opportunity to enter a defense against such action prior to entry of the judgment. (c) * * * such clauses and provisions in those States are security interests under § 226.2(z) and for the purposes of §§ 226 * * *.9.

Section 226.9 sets forth the requirements for rescission granted by § 125.[4]

[1] Clearly then the regulations do cover the judgment note transactions in which Charnita participated.

[2] We hold that the promulgation of the regulation was a reasonable exercise of the authority granted by the statute and is consonant with the discretion granted by Congress to effectuate the purposes of the Act. See Mourning v. Family Publication Service, Inc., supra; N. C. Freed Company, Inc. v. Board of Governors of Federal Reserve System and Federal Trade Commission, 473 F.2d 1210 (2nd Cir. 1973); Gardner and North Roofing and Siding Corp. v. Board of Governors of Federal Reserve System, 150 U.S.App.D.C. 329, 464 F.2d 838 (1972); cf. Douglas v. Beneficial Finance Co. of Anchorage, 469 F.2d 453 (9th Cir. 1972). As the Court said in the Freed case:

> The challenged regulation constitutes a clarification, and not an improper extension, of the statute and it therefore does not exceed the bounds of the mandate given the Board by Congress. Since the regulation is clearly consistent with the legislative purpose, it may not be overturned. (473 F.2d page 1217)

[3] We have little difficulty, also, in finding that the insistence of the seller that it keep possession of the deed until a certain number of payments have been made by the buyer constitutes a security interest within the meaning of the Act and the regulations. Retention of title or its indicia is one of the classic methods of protection, utilized by sellers for centuries to pressure purchasers to comply with their commitments. Charnita's retention of the deed prevented its recordation by the purchaser and thus deprived him of the very valuable rights of the holder of record title.

[4] Additionally, however, petitioner posits the proposition that it is entitled to the exemption granted by 15 U.S.C. § 1635(e):

> This section does not apply to the creation or retention of a first lien against a dwelling to finance the acquisition of that dwelling.

We do not accept Charnita's position. The language in the statute obviously applies only to a "dwelling" and not to the mere sale of land. And as the legislative history reveals, this section was intended to apply to a first mortgage on the sale of a residence. See 114 Congressional Record 14388 (1968). We concur with the finding of the FTC that the practices here do not fall within the exemption.

The Commission ordered Charnita to offer the right of rescission by a two-step process which was designed to, first identify those parties who had acquired the real estate for use or expectation of use as the principal place of residence and are thus covered by § 125, and then, extend to only those eligible persons the opportunity to rescind.

Since this provision of the Act grants the purchaser the right to rescind until midnight of the third business day following the consummation of the transaction or until the required disclosures are made to the buyer, the Board reasoned that until such time as the seller complies with the requirement of furnishing information to its customer, the violation is a continuing one.

[5] Charnita contends that the order is in effect punishment for past misdeeds and hence beyond the authori-[688]ty of the FTC. However, in our view, the construction of the statute by the Board and the remedial action prescribed are not unreasonable and enforcement is required.[5] We find that the corrective measures devised meet the test set out in Windsor Distributing Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 437 F.2d 443 (3rd Cir. 1971), as being within the area of the Commission's discretion in framing relief appropriate to the practices found to exist. We do not think the notification requirements imposed upon Charnita are unduly burdensome but conclude that they represent a reasonable exercise of the Commission's authority to redress continuing violations.

The order of the Commission will be affirmed and will be enforced in its entirety.

FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER COMPANY v. F.T.C.*

No. 72–1990. F.T.C. Docket 8818.

(United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, June 27, 1973)

1. F.T.C. FINDINGS OF FACT ENTITLED TO BE GIVEN GREAT WEIGHT.

   [246] Federal Trade Commission's findings of fact in area of trade and commerce are entitled to be given great weight.

2. F.T.C. PERMITTED TO DRAW REASONABLE INFERENCES AND FINDINGS ARE CONCLUSIVE IF SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

   The Federal Trade Commission is permitted to draw reasonable inferences from the evidence in hearing on deceptive advertising matter and its findings are conclusive if supported by substantial evidence.

3. F.T.C. FINDINGS THAT "SAFE TIRE" CLAIM WAS DECEPTIVE WAS SUPPORTED BY SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

   Findings of Federal Trade Commission in unfair advertising proceeding that tire manufacturer's advertising of its product as the "safe tire" was deceptive was supported by substantial evidence.

[5] In Waohtel v. West, 476 F.2d 1062 (6th Cir. 1973), the Court said, "The provisions with respect to the right of rescission seem to contemplate a continuing violation when the disclosures are not made, but such is not the case when damages are sought."

* Reported in 481 F.2d 246 (1973). Cert. denied, Dec. 17, 1973, 414 U.S. 1112, 94 S.Ct. 841. For case before the Commission, see 81 F.T.C. 398.

4. F.T.C. FINDINGS THAT CLAIM "STOPS 25% QUICKER" WAS UNFAIR AND DECEPTIVE, WAS SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

Finding of Federal Trade Commission in unfair advertising proceeding that tire manufacturer's claim that its product "stops 25% quicker" was unfair and deceptive to consumers because it was without substantial scientific test data to support it was supported by the evidence and by the fair inferences which the Commission was entitled to draw therefrom.

On petition to review, court held that advertisement of tire manufacturer that its product was the "safe tire" was deceptive and that its advertisement that its product "stopped 25% quicker" was unfair and deceptive because it was without substantial scientific test data to support it; and that F.T.C. findings were supported by substantial evidence.

Order affirmed and granted enforcement.

EDWARDS, Circuit Judge.

Petitioner Firestone seeks review of an order of respondent Federal Trade Commission under 15 U.S.C. § 45(c) (1970), FTC had found Firestone guilty of unfair and deceptive advertising, in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 45(a) (1970), in relation to two particular advertisements. One of them may be characterized as the "Safe Tire" ad and the second ad as the "Stop 25% Quicker" ad.

I THE "SAFE TIRE" AD.

As to this series of advertisements, the parties stipulated as follows:

I. Duration of Advertising Program

1. Beginning on December 25, 1967, and continuing through May 18, 1968, the following text, or a text substantially similar to it, was used in certain Firestone advertisements:

THE SAFE TIRE. FIRESTONE

When you buy a Firestone tire—no matter how much or how little you pay—you get a safe tire.

Firestone tires are custom-built one by one. By skilled craftsmen. And they're personally inspected for an extra margin of safety. If these tires don't pass all of the exacting Firestone inspections, they don't get out.

Every new Firestone design goes through rugged tests of safety and strength far exceeding any driving condition you'll ever encounter. We prove them in our test lab. On our test track. And in rigorous day-to-day driving conditions. All Firestone tires meet or exceed the new Federal Government testing requirements. (They have for some time.)

Firestone—The Safe Tire. At 60,000 Firestone Safe Tire Centers. At no more cost than ordinary tires.

II. Firestone's Design And Manufacturing Testing And Quality Control Procedures

1. The state of tire manufacturing technology in [sic] such that use of the best manufacturing procedures and tests and quality control techniques known to the industry cannot insure that each tire produced by a manufacturer is absolutely free from any defects in materials or workmanship.

2. During the period of the advertisements set forth above, Firestone exercised due care and used its best efforts to employ the best manufacturing procedures and tests and quality control techniques known to the industry to design and manufacture tires free from defects in materials and workmanship.

As to this issue the Commission's opinion says:

> We conclude that respondent's absolute representation that its tires are "safe" is false and deceptive on its own admission that tires cannot under today's technology be assured of being free of defects. In view of this technological impossibility, it is an unfair and deceptive act and practice for respondent to make the unqualified assertion of safety which it made in this case.
> [248] While it is clear from the face of the advertisement that respondent makes no explicit claim that its tires are safe under all conditions of use, we believe it does so implicitly. Respondent's advertisement asserts flatly that the Firestone tire is "The Safe Tire" and describes the exacting rugged tests ("far exceeding any driving conditions" consumers will ever encounter) which the tires are put through to assure this safety. Respondent's advertisement gives no indication that there is any limit to the safety of this tire or what such limits might be.

Firestone, on the other hand, emphasizes the stipulation recited above as to its employing the language, "the best manufacturing procedures and tests and quality control techniques known to the industry" and interprets the "Safe Tire" ad as "assuring average tire consumers that Firestone did everything humanly and technically possible to sell tires free of defects." Firestone also emphasizes that a large majority of persons interviewed concerning the "Safe Tire" ad thought that it meant something less than a guarantee of absolute safety.

As to this issue the Commission ordered Firestone to cease and desist from:

> 1. Representing, directly or by implication, that every purchaser of tires bearing the brand name "Firestone," or any other brand name, is assured of receiving tires free from defects in materials or workmanship or other manufacturing defects.
> 2. Misrepresenting, in any manner, the effectiveness of respondent's quality control or inspection procedures.
> 3. Using the words, "The Safe Tire," or any other word or phrase of similar import or meaning to describe or designate respondent's tires or otherwise representing, directly or by implication, that respondent's tires will be safe under all conditions of use.
> 4. Making any representation, directly or by implication, regarding the safety of respondent's tires without disclosing clearly and conspicuously and in close conjunction with such representation that the safety of any tire is affected by conditions of use, such as inflation pressure, vehicle weight, wear, and other operating conditions.

[1, 2] In approaching decision of this issue, this court is limited by statute and case law as to its proper function. The statute which provides for our review also provides that "the findings of the Commission as to the facts if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive." 15 U.S.C. § 45(c) (1970). This court has described such findings as "entitled to be given great weight," and has noted that "the Commission is permitted to draw reasonable inferences from the evidence * * *" Doherty, Clifford, Steers & Shenfield, Inc. v. FTC, 392 F.2d 921, 925 (6th Cir. 1968).

Even more to the point and worth quoting at length is the following description of our function in the words of a leading Supreme Court opinion:

> In reviewing the substantive issues in the case, it is well to remember the respective roles of the Commission and the courts in the administration of the Federal Trade Commission Act. When the Commission was created by Congress in 1914, it was directed by § 5 to prevent "[u]nfair methods of competition in commerce." Congress amended the Act in 1938 to extend the Commission's jurisdiction to include "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce"—a significant amendment showing Congress' concern for consumers as well as for competitors. It is important to note the generality of these standards of illegality; the proscriptions in § 5 are flexible, "to be defined with particularity by the myriad of cases from the field of business." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Motion Picture Advertising Service [249] Co., 344 U.S. 392, 394, 73 S.Ct. 361, 97 L.Ed. 426.

> This statutory scheme necessarily gives the Commission an influential role in interpreting § 5 and in applying it to the facts of particular cases arising out of unprecedented situations. Moreover, as an administrative agency which deals continually with cases in the area, the Commission is often in a better position than are courts to determine when a practice is "deceptive" within the meaning of the Act. This Court has frequently stated that the Commission's judgment is to be given great weight by reviewing courts. This admonition is especially true with respect to allegedly deceptive advertising since the finding of a § 5 violation in this field rests so heavily on inference and pragmatic judgment. Nevertheless, while informed judicial determination is dependent upon enlightenment gained from administrative experience, in the last analysis the words "deceptive practices" set forth a legal standard and they must get their final meaning from judicial construction. Cf. Federal Trade Comm'n v. R. F. Keppel & Bros., Inc., 291 U.S. 304, 314, 54 S.Ct. 423, 427, 78 L.Ed. 814. FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 384–385, 85 S.Ct. 1035, 1042, 13 L.Ed. 2d 904 (1965). (Footnotes omitted.)

[3] Employing these standards, we affirm the findings of the FTC on the "Safe Tire" issue and enforce its order.

There is, of course, no question but that the ad indulges in some puffing. The statement, "When you buy a Firestone Tire * * * you get a safe tire," contains no use qualifications as to inflation, load and speed, and is measured against no comparative performance.

When the statement is compared to the stipulation previously quoted, its deficiencies are obvious:

> 1. The state of tire manufacturing technology in [sic] such that use of the best manufacturing procedures and tests and quality control techniques known to the industry cannot insure that each tire produced by a manufacturer is absolutely free from any defects in material or workmanship.

This stipulation, in effect, concedes that defective Firestone tires can and do reach the consumer.

We deal, of course, with a statutory ban on "unfair or deceptive acts or practices." If no one were misled, we might reexamine our own conclusions vis-a-vis the Commission's inferences about this ad in considerably more detail. Here, however, Firestone's own consumer survey demonstrated that 15.3% of a scientifically selected sample of tire purchasers thought the "Safe Tire" ad meant:

> (d) "Every Firestone tire is absolutely safe no matter how it is used and regardless of the tire inflation pressure and load of the car;" or "Every single Firestone tire will be absolutely free from any defects."

We find it hard to overturn the deception findings of the Commission if the ad thus misled 15% (or 10%) of the buying public.

We find no overbreadth or deficiency in the remedial order of the Commission, and as to it we affirm and grant enforcement.

II The "Stops 25% Quicker" Ad.

The Firestone "Stops 25% Quicker" ad reads:

> * * * Like the original Super Sports Wide Oval Tire. It came straight out of Firestone racing research. It's built lower, wider. Nearly two inches wider than regular tires. To corner better, run cooler, stop 25% quicker.

By stipulation the parties agreed that the "stop 25% quicker" portion of the ad above was employed by Firestone in nationwide magazine advertising from January 16, 1967 to September 20, 1968, and omitted thereafter.

The only comparative stopping test submitted by Firestone was also stipu-[250]lated by the parties as having been proved for this proceeding:

TESTED 5-13-66—SURFACE WET SMOOTH CONCRETE

	Stopping Dist.	Load—1120 lbs/tire infl—24 psi

	77	52
AVG.	75. 8	53. 2

The Commissioner's position on this issue is stated as follows:

> In sum, we find that the admitted circumstances under which respondent tested its tires were limited and that despite these limited test conditions, respondent used these tests as its sole support for its advertisement representing that its Wide Oval tires would stop 25% quicker under all road and weather conditions and relative to all other types of regular tires. Its test did not support, either directly or by reasonable extrapolation, respondent's broad stopping claim. The particular claim at issue here involves a matter of human safety. It is a claim which consumers themselves cannot verify since they have neither the equipment nor the knowledge to undertake the complicated tire tests required. They must rely on the technical expertise of the manufacturer to assure the validity of its claims. Under such circumstances, it is both unfair and deceptive to consumers to make a specific advertising claim without substantial scientific test data to support it.

Firestone's position, on the other hand, as stated in its brief is as follows:

> As set forth in the statement of facts, there is no dispute in the record that (1) Firestone conducted stopping tests of its Wide Oval tires prior to publishing the advertised claim, (2) Firestone's tests were adequate and well controlled scientific tests conducted according to established technological standards, (3) the wet concrete test surface was a typical wet hazardous road surface which might be encountered by motorists, (4) the tests demonstrated that on the wet concrete surface, the Wide Oval tire stopped 29.8% quicker than the regular width tire. These record facts, combined with Dr. Brenner's expert conclusion that the effect of the greater tread width would be more pronounced on dry surfaces, affirmatively demonstrate that Firestone's scientific tests adequately established the factual accuracy of the "stops 25% quicker" comparison between the Wide Oval and narrow tires.

As to this issue the Commission's order directed Firestone to cease and desist from:

> 5. Representing, directly or by implication, that any of respondent's automobile tires have any safety or performance characteristic or are superior in quality or performance to other products unless each such characteristic was fully and completely substantiated by competent scientific tests, with the results of the test, the original test data collected in the course of the test, and a detailed description of how the test was performed available in written form for inspection for at least three years following the final use of the representation.

On this appeal Firestone argues that 1) its ad did not impliedly assert that the "stops 25% quicker" language was based on scientific testing and that the Commission made no explicit finding to that effect; 2) that in any event, its own series of tests on wet, slippery pavement did represent adequate scientific proof of its assertion, or if not that, such proof could reasonably be extrapolated from that test, and 3) that the cease and desist order was unreasonably broad and restrictive in requiring [251] scientific proof as to any safety or performance characteristic advertised.

As to the first of these issues, we believe the Commission did find that the "Stops 25% Quicker" ad implied scientific testing. It said:

> In the circumstances of this case, we believe that consumers could reasonably have expected Firestone's performance and safety claims to have been substantiated by scientific tests.

In addition, we think such an implication is entirely reasonable from the comparison and percentage language employed.

As to Firestone's second argument above, we note at the outset that Firestone presented no witnesses at all in this proceeding. It relied entirely upon data provided by a comparison of two tires (both Firestone products) in ten runs on the same day on the same wet, smooth concrete surface at 15 m.p.h. with the same tire pressure and load. These ten runs showed an average stopping distance of 29.8% less for the Firestone Super Sports Wide Oval tire as compared to a Firestone Super Sports tire of standard tread width.

The Commission makes no comment derogatory to the scientific nature or the accuracy of the test upon which Firestone relies. Rather, it attacks the adequacy of one set of tests on one surface (we would be tempted to add, at one speed) to support the "stops 25% quicker" generalization. Of course, we note that the Commission's own expert witness, Dr. Brenner, seemed to concede that a tire which stopped quicker on a wet surface would, under similar conditions, as to surface, speed, etc., stop still more quickly on a dry surface. What Dr. Brenner would not concede was that testing on any one surface was adequate to represent driving conditions nationwide. As to his own testing practices, he testified:

> In our attempts to develop a test method in order to establish a standard for traction, we laid out five surfaces with different coefficients of friction and different textures, and we ran somewhere in the neighborhood of sixty-five different sets of tires through a variety of tests using skid trailers and vehicle in two maneuvers, stopping distance and in spin-out on a curve. And then we ranked the tires according to their performance on each test, on each surface in each maneuver.

[4] We are by no means sure that the Firestone Wide Oval tire does not "stop 25% quicker." But that is not our question. We have to deal with the record that has been submitted in this case. On this record we conclude that the Commission's finding (that Firestone's "broad stopping claim" was "unfair and deceptive to consumers" because it was "without substantial scientific test data to support it") was supported by the evidence in this record and by the fair inferences which the Commission was entitled to draw therefrom. Under our limited standard of review, we certainly cannot hold to the contrary. FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 384–385, 85 S.Ct. 1035, 13 L.Ed.2d 904 (1965).

As to Firestone's third argument regarding the "stops 25% quicker" ad, we find no overbreadth or violation of due process in the cease and desist order paragraph 5.

The Commission's order to cease and desist is affirmed and granted enforcement.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, ET AL. *

No. 72-1446, F.T.C. No. 215-21

(United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, June 27, 1973)

1. Only By Considering Powers Granted By Congress, Can Extent of Power of F.T.C. Be Decided, Since It Is a Creation of Congress.

[672] Federal Trade Commission is creation of Congress and extent of its powers can be decided only by considering powers Congress specifically granted it in light of statutory language and background.

2. In Statutory Construction, Maxim Expressio Unius Est Exclusio Alterius Is Increasingly Considered Unreliable.

Maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius is increasingly considered unreliable in statutory construction.

3. F.T.C. Has Responsibility To Protect Consumer From Being Misled.

Federal Trade Commission has responsibility to protect consumer from being misled by governing conditions under which goods and services are advertised and sold to individual purchasers.

4. Court's Duty Is To Favor Interpretation Which Would Render Statutory Design Effective in Determining Legislative Intent.

In determining legislative intent, court's duty is to favor interpretation which would render statutory design effective in terms of policies behind its enactment and to avoid interpretation which would make such policies more difficult of fulfillment.

5. Court Must Consult Both the Language of Statute and the Articulated Concerns Motivating Law's Framers Where Statute Is Susceptible of More Than One Meaning.

Where statute is said to be susceptible of more than one meaning, court must not only consult its language but must also relate interpretation provided to felt and openly articulated concerns motivating law's framers.

6. Defendant Must Be Given Opportunity To Demonstrate That Circumstances Warrant Waiving Rule's Applicability.

Defendant in enforcement proceeding by Federal Trade Commission must be given opportunity to demonstrate that special circumstances of his case warrant waiving rule's applicability.

7. ANY RULES ADOPTED BY F.T.C. ARE SUBJECT TO JUDICIAL REVIEW.

Any rules adopted by Federal Trade Commission as part of carrying out its duties to prevent unfair methods of competition are subject to judicial review testing their legality and insuring that they are within scope of broad statutory prohibition they purport to define.

8. F.T.C. NOT FREE TO WRITE ITS OWN LAW.

9. FACT THAT F.T.C. DID NOT ASSERT POWER TO PROMULGATE SUBSTANTIVE RULES DID NOT PRECLUDE FINDING THAT F.T.C. HAD POWER TO MAKE SUCH RULES.

Fact that Federal Trade Commission did not assert power to promulgate substantive rules for many years and had indicated before that time that it lacked such power did not preclude finding that Commission had power to make such rules.

10. STATEMENTS BY F.T.C. REPRESENTATIVES QUESTIONING F.T.C. AUTHORITY WERE NOT DETERMINATIVE.

Various statements made by Federal Trade Commission representatives questioning Commission's authority to promulgate rules which could be used with binding effect on subsequent adjudications were not determinative of whether Commission did in fact have power to make substantive rules.

11. FACT CONGRESS WAS AWARE OF F.T.C. RESTRICTIVE VIEW DID NOT PRECLUDE FINDING THAT COMMISSION DID HAVE RULE-MAKING POWER.

Fact that Congress was fully aware of Federal Trade Commission's restrictive view of its power and passed series of laws granting limited substantive rule-making authority to Commission did not preclude finding that Commission did have rule-making power under original enactment.

12. F.T.C. ACT CONFERRED ON F.T.C. AUTHORITY TO PROMULGATE RULES HAVING EFFECT OF SUBSTANTIVE LAW.

Federal Trade Commission Act conferred on Federal Trade Commission the authority to promulgate trade regulation rules having effect of substantive law.

On appeal, court held that F.T.C. Act conferred on F.T.C. the authority to promulgate trade regulation rules which have effect of substantive law.

J. Skelly Wright, Circuit Judge:

This case presents an important question concerning the powers and procedures of the Federal Trade Commission. We are asked to determine whether the Commission, under its governing statute, the Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 41 et seq. (1970), and specifically 15 U.S.C. § 46(g), is empowered to promulgate substantive rules of business conduct or, as it terms them, "Trade Regulation Rules." The effect of these rules would be to give greater specificity and clarity to the broad standard of illegality—"unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce"—which the agency is empowered to prevent. 15 U.S.C. § 45(a). Once promulgated, the rules would be used by the agency in adjudicatory proceedings aimed at producing cease and desist orders against violations of the statutory standard. The central question in such adjudicatory proceedings would be whether the particular defendant's conduct violated the rule in question. See 16 C.F.R. § 1.12(c) (1973).

The case is here on appeal from a District Court ruling that the Commission lacks authority under its governing stat[674]ute to issue rules of this sort. National Petroleum Refiners Assn. v. FTC, D.D.C., 340 F. Supp. 1343 (1972). Jurisdiction in the District Court was based on Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2) (1970). Specifically at issue in the District Court was the Commission's rule declaring that failure to post octane rating numbers on gasoline pumps at service stations was an unfair method of competition and an unfair or deceptive act or practice.[1] The plaintiffs in the District Court, appellees here, are two trade associations and 34 gasoline refining companies. Plaintiffs attacked the rule on several grounds,[2] but the District Court disposed of the case solely on the question of the Commission's statutory authority to issue such rules. That is the only question presented for our consideration on appeal. We reverse and remand to the District Court for further consideration of appellees' challenge to the validity of the procedure before the Commission which resulted in the rule.

[1] The rule provides:

"In connection with the sale or consignment of motor gasoline for general automotive use, in commerce as 'commerce' is defined in the Federal Trade Commission Act, it constitutes an unfair method of competition and an unfair or deceptive act or practice for refiners or others who sell to retailers, when such refiners or other distributors own or lease the pumps through which motor gasoline is dispensed to the consuming public, to fail to disclose clearly and conspicuously in a permanent manner on the pumps the minimum octane number or numbers of the motor gasoline being dispensed. In the case of those refiners or other distributors who lease pumps, the disclosure required by this section should be made as soon as it is legally practical; for example, not later than the end of the current lease period. Nothing in this section should be construed as applying to gasoline sold for aviation purposes.

"NOTE: For the purposes of this section, 'octane number' shall mean the octane number derived from the sum of research (R) and motor (M) octane numbers divided by 2; (R + M)/2. The research octane (R) and motor octane number (M) shall be as described in the American Society for Testing and Materials (ASTM) 'Standard Specifications for Gasoline' D 439–70, and subsequent revisions, and ASTM Test Methods D 2699 and D 2700."

[1] Our duty here is not simply to make a policy judgment as to what mode of procedure—adjudication alone or a mixed system of rule-making and adjudication, as the Commission proposes—best accommodates the need for effective enforcement of the Commission's mandate with maximum solicitude for the interests of parties whose activities might be within the scope of the statutory standard of illegality. The Federal Trade Commission is a creation of Congress, not a creation of judges' contemporary notions of what is wise policy. The extent of its powers can be decided only by considering the powers Congress specifically granted it in the light of the statutory language and background. See Textile and Apparel Group v. FTC, 133 U.S. App.D.C. 353, 356–357, 410 F.2d 1052, 1055–1056, cert. denied, 396 U.S. 910, 90 S.Ct. 223, 24 L.Ed.2d 185 (1969). The question to be answered is "not what the [Commission] thinks it should do but what Congress has said it can do." CAB v. Delta Air Lines, 367 U.S. 316, 322, 81 S. Ct. 1611, 1617, 6 L.Ed. 869 (1961).

As always, we must begin with the words of the statute creating the Commission and delineating its powers. Section 5[3] directs the Commission to [675] "prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations * * * from using unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce."[4] Section 5(b) of the Trade Commission Act specifies that the Commission is to accomplish this goal by means of issuance of a complaint, a hearing,[5] findings as to the facts, and issuance of a cease and desist order. The Commission's assertion that it is empowered by Section 6(g) to issue substantive rules defining the statutory standard of illegality in advance of specific adjudications does not in any formal sense circumvent this method of enforcement. For after the rules are issued, their mode of enforcement remains what it has always been under Section 5: the sequence of complaint, hearing, findings, and issuance of a cease and desist order. What rule-making does do, functionally, is to narrow the inquiry conducted in proceedings under Section 5(b). It is the legality of this practice which we must judge.

[2] In addition to arguing that the Commission lacked statutory authority to promulgate the rule, appellees also charged that the rule was an unconstitutional usurpation of Congress' legislative powers; that the procedures under which the rule was adopted deprived them of rights to a hearing allegedly guaranteed by § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the due process clause of the 5th Amendment, and the Administrative Procedure Act; that the rule lacks factual support; and that promulgating the rule was arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, and otherwise not in accordance with law.

[2] Appellees argue that since Section 5 mentions only adjudication as the means of enforcing the statutory standard, any supplemental means of putting flesh on that standard, such as rule-making, is contrary to the overt legislative design. But Section 5(b) does not use limiting language suggesting that adjudication alone is the only proper means of elaborating the statutory standard. It merely makes clear that a Commission decision, after complaint and hearing, followed by a cease and desist order, is the way to force an offender to halt his illegal activities.[6] Nor are [676] we persuaded by appellees' argument that, despite the absence of limiting language in Section 5 regarding the role of adjudication in defining the meaning of the

"Whenever the Commission shall have reason to believe that any such person, partnership, or corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition or unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce, and if it shall appear to the Commission that a proceeding by it in respect thereof would be to the interest of the public, it shall issue and serve upon such person, partnership, or corporation a complaint stating its charges in that respect and containing a notice of a hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed at least thirty days after the service of said complaint. The person; partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the Commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. Any person, partnership, or corporation may make application, and upon good cause shown may be allowed by the Commission to intervene and appear in said proceeding by counsel or in person. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the Commission. If upon such hearing the Commission shall be of the opinion that the method of competition or the act or practice in question is prohibited by sections 41 to 46 and 47 to 58 of this title, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue and cause to be served on such person, partnership, or corporation an order requiring such person; partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from using such method of competition or such act or practice. Until the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition has been duly filed within such time, or, if a petition for review has been filed within such time then until the record in the proceeding has been filed in a court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided, the Commission may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or any order made or issued by it under this section. After the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition has been duly filed within such time, the Commission may at any time, after notice and opportunity for hearing, reopen and alter, modify, or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or order made or issued by it under this section, whenever in the opinion of the Commission conditions of fact or of law have so changed as to require such action or if the public interest shall so require: Provided, however, That the said person, partnership, or corporation may, within sixty days after service upon him or it of said report or order entered after such a reopening, obtain a review thereof in the appropriate court of appeals of the United States, in the manner provided in subsection (c) of this section."

statutory standard, we should apply the maxim of statutory construction expressio unius est exclusio alterius and conclude that adjudication is the only means of defining the statutory standard. This maxim is increasingly considered unreliable, see Potomac Passengers Assn. v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co., 154 U.S.App.D.C. ——, ———, 475 F.2d 325, 331–332 (1973), cert. granted, sub nom. Nat'l. R. R. Passenger Corp. v. Nat'l. Assn. of R. R. Passengers, 411 U.S. 981, 93 S.Ct. 2273, 36 L.Ed.2d 957 (1973), for it stands on the faulty premise that all possible alternative or supplemental provisions were necessarily considered and rejected by the legislative draftsmen. See American Trucking Assns. v. United States, 344 U.S. 298, 309–310, 73 S.Ct. 307, 97 L.Ed. 337 (1953); Durnin v. Allentown Federal Savings & Loan Assn., E.D.Pa., 218 F. Supp. 716, 719 (1963). Here we have particularly good reason on the face of the statute to reject such arguments. For the Trade Commission Act includes a provision which specifically provides for rule-making by the Commission to implement its adjudicatory functions under Section 5 of the Act. Section 6(g) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 46(g), states that the Commission may "[f]rom time to time * * * classify corporations and * * * make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 41 to 46 and 47 to 58 of this title." [7]

According to appellees, however, this rule-making power is limited to specifying the details of the Commission's non-adjudicatory, investigative and informative functions spelled out in the other provisions of Section 6 [8] and should not be read to encompass substantive

[8] Section 6 of the Trade Commission Act provides:

The Commission shall also have power—

To gather and compile information concerning, and to investigate from time to time the organization, business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the Act to regulate commerce, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

To require, by general or special orders, corporations engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the Act to regulate commerce, or any class of them, or any of them, respectively, to file with the Commission in such form as the Commission may prescribe annual or special, or both annual and special, reports or answers in writing to specific questions, furnishing to the Commission such information as it may require as to the organization, business, conduct, practices, management, and relation to other corporations, partnerships, and individuals of the respective corporations filing such reports or answers in writing. Such reports and answers shall be made under oath, or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe, and shall be filed with the Commission within such reasonable period as the Commission may prescribe, unless additional time be granted in any case by the Commission.

Wherenever a final decree has been entered against any defendant corporation in any suit brought by the United States to prevent and restrain any violation of the antitrust Acts, to make investigation, upon is own initiative, of the manner in which the decree has been or is being carried out, and upon the application of the Attorney General it shall be its duty to make such investigation. It shall transmit to the Attorney General a report embodying its rule-[677]making in implementation of Section 5 adjudications. We disagree for the simple reason that Section 6(g) clearly states that the Commission "may" make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of Section 5 and it has been so applied. For example, the Commission has issued rules specifying in greater detail than the statute the mode of Commission procedure under Section 5 in matters involving service of process, requirements as to the filing of answers, and other litigation details necessarily involved in the Commission's work of prosecuting its complaints under Section 5. Such rule-making by the Commission has been upheld. See Hunt Foods & Industries, Inc. v. FTC, 9 Cir., 286 F.2d 803, 810 (1960); United States v. San Juan Lumber Co., D.Colo., 313 F. Supp. 703, 708 (1969).

Moreover, the Supreme Court has ruled that the powers specified in Section 6 do not stand isolated from the Commission's enforcement and law-applying role laid out in Section 5. In United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 70 S.Ct. 357, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950), the Court unanimously rejected arguments that the powers in the two sections are to be exercised separately. There the Court upheld the Commission's power to utilize its authority under Section 6(b) to compel the filing of "special reports" to monitor a defendant's compliance with a cease and desist order issued under Section 5. The Commission sought information in such reports to supplement the reports the defendants had been ordered to file by the Court of Appeals which had affirmed findings and recommendations as a result of any such investigation, and the report shall be made public in the discretion of the Commission.

Upon the direction of the President or either House of Congress to investigate and report the facts relating to any alleged violations of the antitrust Acts by any corporation.

Upon the application of the Attorney General to investigate and make recommendations for the readjustment of the business of any corporation alleged to be violating the antitrust Acts in order that the corporation may thereafter maintain its organization, management, and conduct of business in accordance with law.

To make public from time to time such portions of the information obtained by it hereunder, except trade secrets and names of customers, as it shall deem expedient in the public interest; and to make annual and special reports to the Congress and to submit therewith recommendations for additional legislation; and to provide for the publication of its reports and decisions in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use.

From time to time to classify corporations and to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 41 to 46 and 47 to 58 of this title.

To investigate, from time to time, trade conditions in and with foreign countries where associations, combinations, or practices of manufacturers, merchants, or traders, or other conditions, may affect the foreign trade of the United States, and to report to Congress thereon, with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

the Commission's original cease and desist order. Finding the Commission's request squarely within a commonsense definition of a "special report," the Court reasoned that the power to compel "special reports" meant that the agency could "elicit any information beyond the ordinary data of a routine annual report." Id. at 650, 70 S.Ct. at 368. More importantly, the Court rejected arguments that the legislative history compelled an opposite result, pointing out that while the legislative history did not specifically underwrite this function of "special reports," neither did it explicitly "deny [their] use for any purpose within the duties of the Commission, including a § 5 proceeding." Id. at 649, 70 S.Ct. at 367. The Court concluded [678] that the Trade Commission Act should be read as an "integrated whole." Id. at 650, 70 S.Ct. 357.

A similarly broad construction was given the Commission's powers in FTC v. Dean Foods Co., 384 U.S. 597, 86 S.Ct. 1738, 16 L.Ed.2d 802 (1966), where the Commission sought a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction against the consummation of a corporate merger against which it was proceeding under Section 5 of the Trade Commission Act and Section 7 of the Clayton Act.[9] The Supreme Court rejected arguments that the Commission lacked the specific authority under its enabling statute to move into court in advance of issuing a cease and desist order and that the Commission, having sought similar powers unsuccessfully from Congress, should not be granted them by judicial implication. Id. at 607–611, 86 S.Ct. 1738. The Court upheld the Commission's authority to petition Courts of Appeals to exercise their power under the All Writs Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1651(a) (1970), to preserve the status quo in merger cases pending Commission proceedings. Significantly, for our purposes here, the Court reasoned that, while the Commission was acting without specific statutory warrant, "[s]uch ancillary powers have always been treated as essential to the effective discharge of the Commission's responsibilities." Id. at 607, 86 S.Ct. at 1744.

Of course, it is at least arguable that these cases go no farther than to justify utilizing Section 6(g) to promulgate procedural, as opposed to substantive, rules for administration of the Section 5 adjudication and enforcement powers. But we see no reason to import such a restriction on the "rules and regulations" permitted by Section 6(g). On the contrary, as we shall see, judicial precedents concerning rule-making by other agencies and the background and purpose of the Federal Trade Commission Act lead us liberally to construe the term "rules and regulations." The substantive rule here unquestionably implements the statutory plan. Section 5 adjudications—trial type proceedings—will still be necessary to obtain cease and desist orders against offenders, but Section 5 enforcement through adjudication will be expedited, simplified, and thus "carried out" by use of this substantive rule. And the overt language of both Section 5 and Section 6, read together, supports its use in Section 5 proceedings.

II

Our belief that "rules and regulations" in Section 6(g) should be construed to permit the Commission to promulgate binding substantive rules as well as rules of procedure is reinforced by the construction courts have given similar provisions in the authorizing statutes of other administrative agencies. There is, of course, no doubt that the approved practices of agencies with similar statutory provisions is a relevant factor in arriving at a sound interpretation of the Federal Trade Commission's power here. See FTC v. Dean Foods Co., supra, 384 U.S. at 607, 86 S.Ct. 1738; FPC v. Texaco, Inc., 377 U.S. 33, 39–41, 84 S.Ct. 1105, 12 L.Ed.2d 112 (1964). In National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, 319 U.S. 190, 63 S.Ct. 997, 87 L.Ed. 1344 (1943), for example, the Supreme Court upheld the Federal Communications Commission's chain broadcasting rules regulating programming arrangements between networks and affiliates, in part on the basis of the FCC's generalized rule-making authority in 47 U.S.C. § 303(r) (1970). See 319 U.S. at 217, 63 S.Ct. 997. It rejected arguments similar to those made here, ruling that this authority extended beyond specification of technical and financial qualifications to be used as guides in the administration of the Commission's license-granting power. Id. at 220, 63 S.Ct. 997. It permitted the FCC to use rule-making to elaborate the [679] terms of its mandate to pursue the "public convenience, interest, or necessity," 47 U.S.C. § 303, by framing rules carrying out public policy objectives like affiliate independence and avoidance of undue network control over programming in the hope that listeners would be ensured a diversity of program offerings.

United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., 351 U.S. 192, 76 S.Ct. 763, 100 L.Ed. 1081 (1956), took the FCC's rulemaking power a step further, holding that applicants for licenses could be rejected before receiving a hearing specified by statute, see 47 U.S.C. § 309(b) (1970), in the event they did not comply with the Commission's rule limiting networks' power to own stock in affiliates and did not give sufficient reasons why the rule should be waived. The Court held:

> We do not read the hearing requirement, however, as withdrawing from the power of the Commission the rulemaking authority necessary for the orderly conduct of its business. * * *

>  * * The Communications Act must be read as a whole and with appreciation of the responsibilities of the body charged with its fair and efficient operation. * * ***

Storer and its successors are, of course, closely related to the question we face here. For a major component of appellees' complaint is the abridgement of their interest in having the Trade Commission Act's standard of illegality elaborated only in an adjudicatory context. In our view, this argument was adequately answered in Storer, at least to the extent the FTC's rule serves the "purpose of shortening and simplifying the adjudicative process and of clarifying the law in advance,"[10] and thus, in Storer's language, aids the Commission in the "orderly conduct of its business."[11]

This obvious judicial willingness to permit substantive rule-making to undercut the primacy of adjudication in the development of agency policy is not limited to cases involving the FCC. The Federal Power Commission has successfully utilized rules regulating practical business conduct to frame, and even to cut off, what were once thought to be certificate applicants' absolute rights to individualized adjudications. This practice was upheld in large part on the authority of Storer in FPC v. Texaco, Inc., supra. Similarly, this court has upheld the authority of the Civil Aeronautics Board to utilize substantive rules affecting allocation of air cargo business among different types of air carriers to modify existing certificates without the full adjudicatory hearing contemplated by the agency's statute. See American Airlines, Inc. v. CAB, 123 U.S.App.D.C. 310, 359 F.2d 624 (1966) (en banc). And see also Air Lines Pilots Assn. Int. v. Quesada, 2 Cir., 276 F.2d 892 (1960), [680] upholding a Federal Aviation Agency regulation barring pilots from service after their 60th birthday without providing for individualized hearings on the resultant modification of their pilots' licenses. The propriety of using rulemaking rather than adjudication alone to set substantive regulatory standards has also been approved under the Poultry Products Inspection Act which, like the Federal Trade Commission Act, authorizes an agency, there the Secretary of Agriculture, to promulgate rules and regulations, 21 U.S.C. § 463 (1970), and also provides for specific adjudicatory procedures to determine the existence of misleading food labels, 21 U.S.C. § 457 (1970). Borden Co. v. Freeman, D.N.J., 256 F. Just as there has been little question of allowing substantive rulemaking to intrude on asserted rights to a full hearing before an agency for a determination of a party's rights and liabilities, there has been a similar lack of hesitation in construing broad grants of rulemaking power to permit promulgation of rules with the force of law as a means of agency regulation of otherwise private conduct. See, e.g., American Trucking Assns. v. United States, supra, upholding the Interstate Commerce Commission's authority under the Motor Carrier Act, 49 U.S.C. § 301 et seq. (1970), to promulgate rules regulating the use of leased equipment by authorized motor carriers; Morgan Stanley & Co. v. SEC, 2 Cir., 126 F.2d 325 (1942), upholding SEC rules involving underwriters' commissions in public utility offerings under the Public Utility Holding Company Act, 15 U.S.C. § 79a et seq. (1970). Indeed, the general rule courts have adopted toward agencies' use of rule-making power to define standards of conduct by regulated parties, where a general rule-making provision is in the agency statute, was stated succinctly and definitively for this court by Judge Fahy in Public Service Comm'n of State of New York v. FPC, 117 U.S.App.D.C. 195, 199, 327 F.2d 893, 897 (1964):

> All authority of the Commission need not be found in explicit language. Section 16 [the general rule-making provision] demonstrates a realization by Congress that the Commission would be confronted with unforseen problems of administration in regulating this huge industry and should have a basis for coping with such confrontation. While the action of the Commission must conform with the terms, policies and purposes of the Act; it may use means which are not in all respects spelled out in detail. * * *

The need to interpret liberally broad grants of rule-making authority like the one we construe here has been emphasized time and again by the Supreme Court. Just recently the Court upheld the authority of the Federal Reserve Board to promulgate rules under the Truth-in-Lending Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1601 et seq. (1970), specifying new cost and financing disclosure requirements for merchants selling goods payable in more than four installments. Mourning v. Family Publications Service, Inc., 411 U.S. 356, 93 S.Ct. 1652, 36 L.Ed.2d 318 (1973). One such rule, promulgated un[681]der a general rule-making provision authorizing the Board to "prescribe regulations to carry out the purposes of [the Act]," 15 U.S.C. § 1604, was attacked on the ground that it was inconsistent with some portions of the statute, that the statute itself authorized a disclosure requirement with reference to transactions actually involving a finance charge, and that the Board was exceeding its authority and countermanding the statutory plan by using rule-making power to impose disclosure requirements on credit transactions where no finance charges are involved. Thus the challenge to the Federal Reserve Board's rule was in some respects similar to the challenge here: we are told that rule-making is authorized with reference to one part of the Federal Trade Commission Act but not another, that the statutory standard of illegality may be enforced only through the case-by-case adjudication specifically mentioned in Section 5 of the Act, and that the grant of rule-making power in Section 6(g) must not be extended to allow elaboration of the Section 5 standard in nonadjudicatory proceedings. But Mourning rejected this crabbed, inhospitable construction of a broad grant of rule-making authority, relying in large part on American Trucking Assns. v. United States, supra:

> To accept respondent's argument would undermine the flexibility sought in vesting broad rule making authority in an administrative agency. In American Trucking Association[s] v. United States, 344 U.S. 298, [73 S.Ct. 307, 97 L.Ed. 337] (1953), we noted that it was not—
> "a reasonable canon of interpretation that the draftsmen of acts delegating agency powers, as a practical and realistic matter, can or do include specific consideration of every evil sought to be corrected. * * * [N]o great acquaintance with practical affairs is required to know that such prescience, either in fact or in the minds of Congress, does not exist. Its very absence, moreover, is precisely one of the reasons why regulatory agencies such as the Commission are created, for it is the fond hope of their authors that they bring to their work the expert's familiarity with industry conditions which members of the delegating legislatures cannot be expected to possess." 344 U.S., at 309–310, [73 S.Ct. at 314] (citations omitted).
> Neither the sections of the Truth-in-Lending Act which refer specifically to transactions involving finance charges nor any other sections of the Act indicate that Congress attempted to list comprehensively all types of transactions to which the > Board's regulations might apply. To the contrary, [the] broad grant of rule making authority [in 15 U.S.C. § 1604] reflects an intention to rely on those attributes of agency administration recognized in American Trucking. We cannot then infer that references in the Act to transactions involving credit charges were intended to limit the deterrent measures which the Board might choose.

Thus there is little question that the availability of substantive rule-making gives any agency an invaluable resource-saving flexibility in carrying out its task of regulating parties subject to its statutory mandate. More than merely expediting the agency's job, use of substantive rule-making is increasingly felt to yield significant benefits to those the agency regulates. Increasingly, courts are recognizing that use of rule-making to make innovations in agency policy may actually be fairer to regulated parties than total reliance on case-by-case adjudication.

The Supreme Court made this suggestion initially in SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947), where it dealt with an agency adjudication imposing novel restraints on the power of management of corporations to purchase stock during periods of reorganization under the Pub-[682]lic Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. While the Court did not hold that the Securities and Exchange Commission was bound to follow rule-making procedures in making such a market policy departure, it was clearly aware that exclusive reliance on adjudication could be criticized for unfairly focusing on a single defendant in a restricted proceeding when promulgating a new policy with industry-wide ramifications. The Court said:

> * * * The function of filling in the interstices of the Act should be performed, as much as possible, through this quasi-legislative promulgation of rules to be applied in the future. * * * 332 U.S. at 202, 67 S.Ct. at 1580.

Four years ago a majority of the Supreme Court hinted that there may be circumstances where agency policy innovations should be made only in rule-making proceedings. In NLRB v. Wyman-Gordon Co., 394 U.S. 759, 89 S.Ct. 1426, 22 L.Ed. 709 (1969), the Court upheld an adjudicatory order based on a prior decision where the Labor Board had decided that a new rule of management conduct during election campaigns should operate only prospectively. But the four-man plurality opinion by Mr. Justice Fortas sharply criticized the Board's initial promulgation in adjudicatory proceedings of a rule applicable in election campaigns generally. He argued that rule-making, under the Administrative Procedure Act's provisions for advance notice and broad public participation, 5 U.S.C. § 553 (1970), assured "fairness and mature consideration" in a way that adjudication, inevitably tending to focus more narrowly on the behavior of given parties, could not. 394 U.S. at 764, 89 S.Ct. 1426. Mr. Justice Douglas, dissenting from the majority's actual holding, argued similarly that where the Board imposed a new standard of conduct that is "not particularized to special facts * * * [but] is a statement of far-reaching policy covering all future representation elections," id. at 777, 89 S.Ct. at 1435, it should be required to follow the APA's rule-making procedures. He stressed that rulemaking, unlike adjudication, "gives notice to an entire segment of society of those controls or regimentation that is forthcoming * * * [and] an opportunity for persons affected to be heard." Ibid., 89 S.Ct. at 1436. And since the agency is bound under the APA to consider the submissions of those affected between the time a rule is proposed and when it is promulgated, 5 U.S.C. § 553 (c), (d), it has a valuable opportunity to modify its initial inclinations. In other words, by exposing itself to a wider range of criticism and advice than is ordinarily available in adjudicatory proceedings the agencies may, in Mr. Justice Douglas' words, "discover that they are not always repositories of ultimate wisdom; they learn from the suggestions of outsiders and often benefit from that advice." Id. at 777–778, 89 S.Ct. 1436. Also dissenting, Mr. Justice Harlan said that where the agency had taken the position that its new adjudication-based rule was so revolutionary that it could be applied only prospectively, such marked departures in agency policy could only be taken through rule-making: "Either the rule-making provisions [of the APA] are to be enforced or they are not. Before the Board may be permitted to adopt a rule that so significantly alters pre-existing labor-management understandings, it must be required to conduct a satisfactory rule-making proceeding, so that it will have the benefit of wide-ranging argument before it enacts its proposed solution to an important problem." Id. at 781, 89 S.Ct. at 1438.

Even more recently, the Second Circuit has taken Wyman-Gordon's suggestions to their logical conclusion. In Bell Aerospace Div. of Textron, Inc. v. NLRB, 2 Cir., 475 F.2d 485 (1973), that court refused to enforce a Labor Board bargaining order in part on the ground that the Board had made such a significant change in its previous definition of types of workers protected by the Na[683]tional Labor Relations Act that rule-making rather than adjudication was required. In holding that the agency "should be particularly sure that it has all available information," 475 F.2d at 497, Chief Judge Friendly's opinion ordering rule-making, id. at 496, relied heavily on a factor stressed in the opinions of Justices Fortas, Douglas and Harlan in Wyman-Gordon—a sharp change in agency policy with obvious effects on a vastly wider range of parties than those immediately before the agency. Id. at 496–497. Moreover, he stressed that the argument for mandatory rule-making was especially strong where the defendant was exposed by the adjudicatory order to "new and unexpected liability." Id. at 497.

This judicial trend favoring rule-making over adjudication for development of new agency policy does not, of course, directly dispose of the question before us. There was no question that the SEC in Chenery had substantive rule-making powers. See 332 U.S. at 201, 67 S.Ct. 1575. And Wyman-Gordon assumed that the NLRB also had substantive rule-making powers under 29 U.S.C. § 156 (1970). 394 U.S. at 763–765 & n. 3, 89 S.Ct. 1426. Here we must decide just that question, whether Congress has given the FTC the same alternate means of proceeding, not whether the FTC should be required to use rule-making in some circumstances. But Chenery, Wyman-Gordon and Bell Aerospace cannot be ignored, for they indisputably flesh out the contemporary legal framework in which both the FTC and this court operate and which we must recognize. See Moragne v. States Marine Lines, Inc., 398 U.S. 375, 390–391, 90 S.Ct. 1772, 26 L.Ed.2d 339 (1970). To us, these cases suggest that contemporary considerations of practicality and fairness—specifically the advisability of utilizing the Administrative Procedure Act's rule-making procedures to provide an agency about to embark on legal innovation with all relevant arguments and information, 5 U.S.C. § 553—certainly support the Commission's position here. As Wyman-Gordon and Bell Aerospace explicitly noted, utilizing rule-making procedures opens up the process of agency policy innovation to a broad range of criticism, advice and data that is ordinarily less likely to be forthcoming in adjudication. Moreover, the availability of notice before promulgation and wide public participation in rule-making avoids the problem of singling out a single defendant among a group of competitors for initial imposition of a new and inevitably costly legal obligation, cf. Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 412 U.S. 645, 93 S.Ct. 2488, 37 L.Ed.2d 235 (1973); Weinberger v. Hynson, Westcott & Dunning, Inc., supra, 411 U.S. at 903, 93 S.Ct. 2469; FTC v. Universal-Rundle Corp., 387 U.S. 244, 87 S.Ct. 1622, 18 L.Ed.2d 749 (1967); Moog Industries, Inc. v. FTC, 355 U.S. 411, 78 S.Ct. 377, 2 L.Ed.2d 370 (1958).

Such benefits are especially obvious in cases involving initiation of rules of the sort the FTC has promulgated here. The Commission's statement on basis and purpose indicated that the decision to impose the obligation of octane rating disclosure on gasoline dealers entailed careful consideration of automobile engine requirements, automobile dealers' practices in instructing purchasers how to care for their engines, consumer gasoline purchasing habits, and costs to gasoline dealers. In addition, the Commission had to choose exactly what kind of disclosure was the fairest. In short, a vast amount of data had to be compiled and analyzed, and the Commission, armed with these data, had to weigh the conflicting policies of increasingly knowledgeable consumer decision-making against alleged costs to gasoline dealers which might be passed on to the consumer. True, the decision to impose a bright-line standard of behavior might have been evolved by the Commission in a single or a succession of adjudicatory proceedings, see, e.g., FTC v. Texaco, Inc., 393 U.S. 223, 89 S.Ct. 429, 21 L.Ed.2d 394 (1968), much as the Supreme Court has imposed per se rules of [684] business behavior in antitrust cases. See, e.g., United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., 405 U.S. 596, 92 S.Ct. 1126, 31 L.Ed.2d 515 (1972) (horizontal territorial restraints); United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 60 S.Ct. 811, 84 L.Ed. 1129 (1940) (price fixing). But evolution of bright-line rules is often a slow process and may involve the distinct disadvantage of acting without the broad range of data and argument from all those potentially affected that may be flushed out through use of legislative-type rule-making procedures. Cf. United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., supra, 405 U.S. at 620, 92 S.Ct. 1126 (Mr. Chief Justice Burger, dissenting). And utilizing rule-making in advance of adjudication here minimizes the unfairness of using a purely case-by-case approach requiring "compliance by one manufacturer while his competitors [engaging in similar practices] remain free to violate the Act." Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., supra, 412 U.S. at 645, 93 S.Ct. at 2494. In light of Chenery, Wyman-Gordon and Bell Aerospace, therefore, it is hard to escape noting that the policy innovation involved in this case underscores the need for increased reliance on rule-making rather than adjudication alone.

[3] Appellees contend, however, that these cases and the general practice of agencies and courts in underwriting the broad use of rule-making are irrelevant to the FTC. They argue that the Trade Commission is somehow sui generis, that it is best characterized as a prosecuting rather than a regulatory agency, and that substantive rule-making power should be less readily implied from a general grant of rule-making authority where the agency does not stand astride an industry with pervasive license-granting, rate-setting, or clearance functions. Initially it should be noted that appellees, for obvious reasons, do not rely on the NLRB in making their prosecutorial argument. The statutory method of adjudication and enforcement used by the NLRB is, of course, very similar to that of the FTC. Compare 29 U.S.C. § 160 (1970) with 15 U.S.C. § 45. And the courts, including the Supreme Court, have, as shown in the preceding section, repeatedly encouraged the NLRB to make use of its general grant of rule-making authority, 29 U.S.C. § 156, to issue substantive rules. We do not assert that the FTC is compelled by its statutory charter to exert the kind of ongoing regulatory scrutiny exercised by agencies like the FCC, FPC, ICC, SEC, CAB, or even the Department of Agriculture. But we do not find the absence of license-granting, rate-making or clearance power a sufficiently principled distinction to accept appellees' argument. For a more compelling argument can be made that the FTC's duty to prevent "unfair methods of competition" and "unfair or deceptive acts or practices" is just as potentially pervasive, in the sense of affecting commercial practices, as the regulatory schemes of agencies utilizing rate-making, licensing, and similar means of regulation. The FTC's charter to prevent unfair methods of competition is tantamount to a power to scrutinize and to control, subject of course to judicial review, the variety of contracting devices and other means of business policy that may contradict the letter or the spirit of the antitrust laws. FTC v. Brown Shoe Co., 384 U.S. 316, 320–322, 86 S.Ct. 1501, 16 L.Ed.2d 587 (1966); FTC v. Motion Picture Advertising Service Co., 344 U.S. 392, 394–395, 73 S.Ct. 361, 97 L.Ed. 426 (1953); FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 689–695, 68 S.Ct. 793, 92 L.Ed. 1010 (1948). The pervasiveness of the antitrust laws' coverage, in the sense of affecting business decision-making, needs no elaboration. Suffice it to say that it cuts deeply into and, with limited exceptions,[13] widely across virtually all, [685] of American business. In addition, under its mandate to prevent "unfair or deceptive acts or practices," the Commission has the responsibility to protect the consumer from being misled by governing the conditions under which goods and services are advertised and sold to individual purchasers. See FTC v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 239–244, 92 S.Ct. 898, 31 L.Ed. 170 (1972). And while the boundaries of the Commission's power to proscribe conduct it deems harmful to the consumer or to competition are not clearly defined, they are indeed expansive. Id. at 244, 92 S.Ct. 898.

Given the expanse of the Commission's power to define proper business practices, we believe it is but a quibble to differentiate between the potential pervasiveness of the FTC's power and that of the other regulatory agencies merely on the basis of its prosecutorial and adjudicatory mode of proceeding. Like other agencies, wholly apart from the question of rule-making power it exerts a powerfully regulatory effect on those business practices subject to its supervision. Of course, its regulatory authority is not complete. But neither is the regulation exercised by other agencies. See J. I. Case Co. v. Borak, 377 U.S. 426, 432, 84 S.Ct. 1555, 12 L.Ed.2d 423 (1964). And the Commission has this regulatory effect irrespective of whether it chooses to elaborate the vague but comprehensive statutory standards through rule-making or through case-by-case adjudication. Businesses whose practices appear clearly covered by the Trade Commission's adjudicatory decisions against similarly situated parties presumably will comply with the Commission's holding rather than await a Commission action against them individually; we must presume that in many cases where a guideline is laid down in an individual case it is, like many common law rules, generally obeyed by those similarly situated. Moreover, there are ample indications in the Commission's legislative history that the agency, by gathering information on business practices, issuing periodic reports, and moving against those practices which appear "unfair," was meant to have just this sort of regulatory impact, despite the purely prosecutorial mode of proceeding provided in Section 5 of the Act.[14] Not only is the Commission's regulatory power much broader than appellees would have us believe; there is simply no compelling evidence in the Act's legislative history or in the language of the statute itself which would limit the exercise of that power to the prosecutorial function or prevent the Commission from making that function more effective by rule-making.

[13] The Federal Trade Commission Act exempts from its coverage banks, common carriers subject to other federal regulation, air carriers and foreign air carriers subject to the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, and persons subject to the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. See 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(6).

Although we believe there are thus persuasive considerations for accepting the FTC's view that the plain meaning of the statute supports substantive rule-making, the question is not necessarily closed. For appellees' contention—that the phrase "rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out" Section 5 refers only to rules of procedure and practice for carrying out the Commission's adjudicatory responsibility—is not implausible. The opinion of the District Court argues forcefully that, in spite of the clear and unlimited language of Section 6(g) granting rule-making authority to the Commission, the Congress that enacted Section 5 and Section 6(g) gave clear indications of its intent to reject substantive rule-making, that the FTC's own behavior in the years since that time supports a narrow interpretation of its mandate to promulgate "rules and regulations," and that where Congress desired to give the FTC substantive rule-making authority in discrete areas it did so in subsequent years in unambiguous terms. Our own conclusion, [686] based on an independent review of this history, is different. We believe that, while the legislative history of Section 5 and Section 6(g) is ambiguous, it certainly does not compel the conclusion that the Commission was not meant to exercise the power to make substantive rules with binding effect in Section 5(a) adjudications. We also believe that the plain language of Section 6(g), read in light of the broad, clearly agreed-upon concerns that motivated passage of the Trade Commission Act, confirms the framers' intent to allow exercise of the power claimed here. We do not find the District Court's reliance on the agency's long-standing practice, until 1962, of not utilizing rule-making or the District Court's reliance on enactment of specific grants of rule-making power in narrow areas sufficiently persuasive to override our view, and the Commission's view, that rule-making is not only consistent with the original framers' broad purposes, but appears to be a particularly apt means of carrying them out.

[14] See, e.g., S.Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 9–10 (1914); H.R.Rep. No. 1142, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 18–19 (1914).

In analyzing the origins of the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914, and Section 5 and 6(g) in particular, both parties would have us focus heavily on the floor debates and committee reports that accompanied the legislation on its tortuous path toward enactment. Certainly these materials are relevant to our inquiry and cannot be ignored. But our examination of the comments made by legislators that allegedly bear directly on the question whether the Commission was initially meant to exercise substantive, legislative-type rule-making power has led us to the conclusion, familiar in cases dealing with strongly contested questions of statutory interpretation, that the specific intent of Congress here cannot be stated with any assurance. The materials cited to us indicate that the question before us—whether the Commission can elaborate the meaning of Section 5's standard of illegality through rule-making as well as through case-by-case adjudication—was not confronted straightforwardly and decisively. Given this conclusion, which we elaborate in detail in the appendix to this opinion, we are hardly at liberty to override the plain, expansive language of Section 6(g) as well as the gloss that has been placed on that kind of rule-making provision by the series of decisions dealing with agencies whose enabling statutes have similar rule-making provisions. See United States v. Oregon, 366 U.S. 643, 647–648, 81 S.Ct. 1278, 6 L.Ed.2d 575 (1961).

Moreover, while we believe the historical evidence is indecisive of the question before us, we are convinced that the broad, undisputed policies which clearly motivated the framers of the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914 would indeed be furthered by our view as to the proper scope of the Commission's rule-making authority. The multiplicity of differing plans proposed for a trade commission prior to 1914[15] and during [687] the intensive debates in 1914[16] immediately preceding enactment of the Trade Commission Act demonstrates, of course, that proponents of the agency were hardly agreed on exactly what powers the agency should assume. But the variety of plans and the proponents of the agency all unquestionably shared deep objections to the existing structure of judicial monopolization of cases involving unfair, anticompetitive business practices. Those who believed from the start in a commission with independent enforcement powers,[17] as the Commis[688]sion was finally given in the [15] See S. 2941, 62d Cong., 2d Sess. (1911). This bill, introduced by Senator Newlands of Nevada, then a ranking member of the Senate Commerce Committee, provided for a 5-man independent commission whose presidentially appointed members would have fixed tenure, with powers to compel corporations whose annual gross receipts exceeded $5 million to furnish annual reports showing their "organization, financial condition, and operations as may be prescribed by regulations to be made in pursuance of this act." Such corporations, moreover, would be subject to a federal registration requirement, and registration could be revoked upon a commission finding that they had engaged in "unfair or oppressive methods of competition," or suffered from "overcapitalization," or "improper financial organization." Application of these standards to the facts of any given corporation was left to the commission. Finally, the commission was empowered under the plan to order that a defendant corporation found liable "thereafter shall not engage in interstate commerce." This order was enforceable by fine and injunction in the federal district courts. Although this stringent legislation was not voted upon during the session, it does serve to indicate serious unease with the existent policy of entrusting the courts with exclusive responsibility for antitrust enforcement. A subsequent proposal, S. 5485, 62d Cong., 2d Sess. (1912), provided for a commission without any independent enforcement authority, but with powers to investigate and report publicly on corporate financial and business practices, to recommend antitrust prosecutions to the Department of Justice, and to assist the federal courts, as a sort of special master, in framing decrees of dissolution or reorganization once underlying antitrust liability under the Sherman Act had been found. Stronger legislation was introduced in the House in 1913, H.R. 9299, H.R. 9300 & H.R. 9301, 63d Cong., 1st Sess. (1913), by the Progressive Party leader, Congressman Murdock of Kansas. These bills would create a commission with power to issue orders restraining unfair competitive practices that would be enforceable in federal courts, but these bills too were not reported to the floor. Moreover, the platforms of both the Republican and the Progressive Parties in the 1912 election called for establishment of a commission. The Republicans called for a "Federal trade commission, thus placing in the hands of an administrative board many of the functions now necessarily exercised by the courts. This will promote promptness in the administration of the laws and avoid delays and technicalities incident to court procedure." Quoted in H.R. Rep. No. 553, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., Views of the Minority, 1 (1914). The Progressives called for a "commission of high standing, which shall maintain permanent active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in interstate commerce, * * * doing for them what the Government now does for national banks, and what is now done for the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission." Quoted in id., Part 3, at 2. The 1912 Democratic platform signally failed to promote a trade commission, though it did call for greater specificity in the antitrust laws. See G. Henderson, The Federal Trade Commission : A Study in Administrative Law and Procedure 16 (1924). The reluctance of the Democrats, including President Wilson, to embrace plans for an independent commission was based on several grounds. First, through his campaign Mr. Wilson opposed creation of a new agency to supervise corporate behavior simply on the ground that additional bureaucracy was undesirable per se. See A. Link, Wilson : The New Freedom 327 (paper ed. 1956). Second, the Progressive Party plan for a commission treating large trusts as corporations with a "public use" appeared to contemplate an extraordinary degree of regulation, including licensing and price control. Such supervision raised the spectre of possible government immunization, through regulation, of monopolistic practices from more straightforward legal attack. See G. Henderson, op. cit, supra, at 22–24.

[17] Senator Newlands, for example, stated in a hearing before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce on Aug. 4, 1911, that his bill, S. 2941, supra note 15, would allow the commission to achieve ends that had eluded the courts:

"* * * We want traditions; we want a fixed policy; we want trained experts; we want precedents; we want a body of administrative law built up. This can not be well done by the single occupant of an office, subject to constant changes in its incumbency and subject to higher executive authority. Such work must be done by a board or commission of dignity, permanence, and ability, independent of executive authority, except in its selection, and independent in character."

Quoted in Appendix to S. Rep. No. 597, supra note 14, at 22.

President Wilson did not originally back proposals giving a trade commission independent enforcement power. When he announced his antitrust program in an address to Congress on Jan. 20, 1914, 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 2) 1963 (1914), he relented his campaign opposition to any new commission. But the agency he proposed had no independent enforcement power, as had been proposed in 1911 and 1913, see note 15 supra, and was clothed with merely investigative and publicity powers, "a clearing house for the facts by which both the public mind and the managers of great business undertakings should be guided," 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 2) at 1963. He also proposed permitting the commission to assist the courts and the Justice Department in framing decrees and settlements. His rejection of an agency with its own enforcement power was seemingly based on fears that it might thus be "empowered to make terms with monopoly or * * * to assume control of business." Ibid.

Those who felt that Wilson did not go far enough sharply disagreed with the President's apparent willingness to leave powers of enforcement exclusively to the courts. Congressman Stevens of New Hampshire, whose views subsequently helped change the President's opposition to a commission with independent enforcement power, see A. Link, op. cit. supra note 15, at 436–438, refused to sign the majority report of the House Committee on Interstate Commerce when it reported out the Administration's original proposal for a commission without any independent enforcement power. He stressed that the "regulation of large corporations by suits at law is a slow, costly process and even where the Government has eventually won, the results have been most disappointing," and that only an "administrative board having general power to prevent unfair competitive practices" could ameliorate this problem. H.R. Rep. No. 553, supra note 15, Part 2 at 1. On the House floor, members who opposed the President's bill on the ground that it gave the commission insufficient power made similar arguments, namely, that the commission, as proposed, simply did not strike at the core problem of antitrust enforcement. Congressman Murdock of Kansas, a leading Progressive, sharply attacked the original Administration plan:

"The pending Democratic measures, save for a mere rudimentary and purely investigative trade commission, which is to go hunting in the trust jungles—with a camera—leave all the work to the lingering, laborious, inexpert adjustments of the overcrowded courts. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) 8973 (1914). Murdock argued that the Administration's supplement to its original trade commission proposal, a set of laws specifying in greater detail anticompetitive practices, was defective precisely because the new proposals were to be "enforced only by the long, difficult, delaying processes of the courts." Id. at 8974. Congressman Dillon of South Dakota, another proponent of a stronger commission, argued that giving enforcement power to the commission would avoid this problem:

"* * * If we rely on the judiciary, our progress must necessarily be slow. We prefer to place our hopes and aspirations in an administrative board, a board that would not be hampered by appeals, delays, and technicalities."

Id. at 9057.

Criticism of exclusive reliance on judicial enforcement of the antitrust laws was equally evident when Wilson changed his mind after passage of the weak commission bill in the House and backed a commission with independent enforcement authority. See generally Appendix at pp. 700–702 infra. The report of the Senate Commerce Committee, chaired by Newlands, endorsing the latter plan argued that a commission composed of members familiar with the problems of business competition "could be vastly more effectual than through the courts alone, which in most cases will take no cognizance of violations of the law for months or years after the violations occurred, and when the difficulty of awarding reparation for the wrong is almost unsurmountable." S. Rep. No. 597, supra note 14, at 5–6. During the subsequent floor debate, Senator Saulsbury of Delaware, who subsequently 1914 legislation, and those who believed the Commission should have lesser powers,[18] agreed that entrusting enforcement of [689] congressional policy to prevent undue incursions on competition exclusively to the courts was a serious mistake. The courts were said to lack sufficient expertise in matters of economic complexity,[19] their decisions were said to be wanting in the clarity planners of complicated business transactions and innovations required,[20] and finally and most importantly, the courts lacked both the resources and the skill to proceed with speed and expedition in the trial and disposition of complicated cases involving economic questions.[21] This concern over judicial delay, inefficiency and uncertainty was echoed time and again throughout the 1914 debates over the form a commission would take.[22]

[4, 5] In determining the legislative intent, our duty is to favor an interpretation which would render the statutory design effective in terms of the policies behind its enactment and to avoid an interpretation which would make such policies more difficult of fulfillment, particularly where, as here, that interpretation is consistent with the plain language of the statute. See Bird v. United States, 187 U.S. 118, 124, 23 S.Ct. 42, 47 L.Ed. 100 (1902); United States v. Blasius, 2 Cir., 397 F.2d 203, 207 n. 9 (1968), cert. dismissed, 393 U.S. 1008, 89 S.Ct. 615, 21 L.Ed.2d 557 (1969). served on the conference committee which produced the final bill, argued in favor of a commission with its own enforcement power on the ground that "[t]he delays and expense incident to obtaining redress for such wrongs in the courts have made adequate relief to litigants almost unattainable in these cases and, in the public mind there has been growing up a belief, which to some extent may be justified, that the courts were not efficient, because of the usual delay and expense in providing early, adequate, and inexpensive relief from oppressions. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 12) 11593 (1914).

[18] Congressman Covington of Maryland, the floor manager of the Administration's original proposal which gave the commission no independent enforcement power, said as much on the House floor shortly after a bill embodying the Administration's plans was reported out from committee when he described the problems that ensued in attempting to render a decree of dissolution in one notable antitrust case:

> "* * * [B]y reason of the lack of an efficient body charged with the handling of the numerous facts relating to all those tobacco concerns and assisting the court, a delay was caused and an imperfect decree resulted. If Judge Lacombe had been able to refer to a commission of the sort now proposed the whole record in the case and obtain a report concerning the form of a proper constructive decree of dissolution, the public would have been more speedily and more effectively served."

51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) at 8846–8847. The Senate Commerce Committee, while it decided not to report S. 5485, discussed at note 15 supra, noted that the bill's feature of permitting the commission to act as a sort of special master in assisting the federal courts to frame decrees of dissolution or settlement in Sherman Act cases would serve as a partial cure for "judicial deliberation and delay," ensuring that violations would be promptly attacked and remedies imposed quickly if they were needed. tive," we cannot "construe the Act in a manner which runs counter to the broad goals which Congress intended it to effectuate." FTC v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 390 U.S. 341, 349, 88 S.Ct. 904, 908, 19 L.Ed.2d 1222 (1968). Indeed, as Mr. Justice Harlan put it in a case involving a question of the Federal Power Commission's power under a general rule-making provision to alter radically its customary modes of proceeding, "This Court has repeatedly held that the width of administrative authority must be measured in part by the purposes for which it was conferred." Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 776, 88 S.Ct. 1344, 1364, 20 L.Ed.2d 312 (1968); see also id. n. 40; Thorpe v. Housing Authority of the City of Durham, 393 U.S. 268, 277–281, 89 S.Ct. 518, 21 L.Ed.2d 474 (1969) (upholding rules of the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development promulgated pursuant to a rule-making provision, 42 U.S.C. § 1408 (1970), phrased in terms almost identical with those of Section 6(g) of the Trade Commission Act). This view was reiterated just a few weeks ago by Mr. Chief Justice Burger, writing for the Court:

> * * * Where the empowering provision of a statute states simply that the agency may "make * * * such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act," we have held that the validity of a regulation promulgated thereunder will be sustained so long as it is "reasonably related to the purposes of the enabling legislation." * * *

[690] Mourning v. Family Publications Service, Inc., supra, 411 U.S. at 369, 93 S.Ct. 1660–1661. (Footnote omitted.) In short, where a statute is said to be susceptible of more than one meaning, we must not only consult its language; we must also relate the interpretation we provide to the felt and openly articulated concerns motivating the law's framers. See J. I. Case Co. v. Borak, supra, 377 U.S. at 432–433, 84 S.Ct. 1555. In this way we may be sure we are construing the statute rather than constructing a new one.

The problems of delay and inefficiency that proponents of both a strong and a weak commission aimed to eliminate or minimize have plagued the Trade Commission down to the present. While the Commission has broad common law-like authority to delineate the scope of the statute's prohibitions, see FTC v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., supra, 405 U.S. at 244, 92 S.Ct. 898, like the federal courts it was designed to supplement, it has remained hobbled in its task by the delay inherent in repetitious, lengthy litigation of cases involving complex factual questions under a broad legal standard. Close students of the agency agree that the historic case-by-case purely adjudicatory method of elaborating the Section 5 standard and applying it to discrete business practices has not only produced considerable uncertainty, see Report of the ABA Commission to Study the Federal Trade Commission 11 (1969); Auerbach, The Federal Trade Commission: Internal Organization and Procedure, 48 Minn.L.Rev. 383, 445–449, 464–465, 518–519 (1964); Cushman, The Problem of the Independent Regulatory Commission 24 in President's Comm'n on Administrative Management, Studies No. 1–5 (1937); Baum, Reorganization, Delay and the Federal Trade Commission, 15 Admin.L.Rev. 92, 93, 108–110 (1963), but also has helped to spawn litigation the length of which has frequently been noted ruefully by commentators on the Commission's performance. See Note, The Federal Trade Commission and Reform of the Administrative Process, 62 Colum.L.Rev. 671, 692–693 (1962); Report of the ABA Commission to Study the Federal Trade Commission, supra, at 10, 28–32. We believe that, to the extent substantive rule-making to implement Section 5 proceedings is likely to deal with these problems given the statutory authority provided in Section 6(g), the Commission's position should be upheld as a reasonable means of attacking ills the Commission was created to cure.

There is little disagreement that the Commission will be able to proceed more expeditiously, give greater certainty to businesses subject to the Act, and deploy its internal resources more efficiently with a mixed system of rule-making and adjudication than with adjudication alone. With the issues in Section 5 proceedings reduced by the existence of a rule delineating what is a violation of the statute or what presumptions the Commission proposes to rely upon, proceedings will be speeded up. For example, in an adjudication proceeding based on a violation of the octane rating rule at issue here, the central question to be decided will be whether or not pumps owned by a given refiner are properly marked. See also pages 691–692 infra. Without the rule, the Commission might well be obliged to prove and argue that the absence of the rating markers in each particular case was likely to have injurious and unfair effects on consumers or competition.[23] Since this laborious process might well have to be repeated every time the Commission chose to proceed subsequently against another defendant on the same ground, the difference in administrative efficiency between the two kinds of proceedings is obvious. Furthermore, rules, as contrasted with the holdings reached by case-by-case adjudication, are more specific as to their scope, and industry com[691]pliance is more likely simply because each company is on clearer notice whether or not specific rules apply to it.

Moreover, when delay in agency proceedings is minimized by using rules, those violating the statutory standard lose an opportunity to turn litigation into a profitable and lengthy game of postponing the effect of the rule on their current practice[24] As a result, substantive rules will protect the companies which willingly comply with the law against what amounts to the unfair competition of those who would profit from delayed enforcement as to them. This, too, will minimize useless litigation and is likely to assist the Commission in more effectively allocating its resources. In addition, whatever form rules take, whether bright-line standards or presumptions that are rebuttable, they are likely to decrease the current uncertainty many businesses are said to feel over the current scope and applicability of Section 5.[25] But the important point here is not that rule-making is assuredly going to solve the Commission's problems. It is rather that recognition and use of rule-making by the Commission is convincingly linked to the goals of agency expedition, efficiency, and certainty of regulatory standards that loomed in the background of the 1914 passage of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

This relationship between rule-making's probable benefits and the broad concerns evident when the FTC was created, together with the express language of Section 6(g), help persuade us that any purported ambiguity of the statute be resolved in favor of the Commission's claim. "In a case much more clouded with doubts than this one, we held that we would not 'in the absence of compelling evidence that such was Congress' intention * * * prohibit administrative action imperative for the achievement of an agency's ultimate purposes.' Permian Basin Area Rate Cases, 390 U.S. 747, 780, 88 S.Ct. 1344, 1367, 20 L.Ed. 2d 312." Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., supra, 412 U.S. at 645, 93 S.Ct. at 2494.

Despite the import of Section 6(g)'s plain language, the overwhelming judicial support given to expansive agency readings of statutory rule-making authorizations that are not flatly inconsistent with other statutory provisions, and the incontestable relationship between the broad policies behind the 1914 Act and the utility of substantive rule-making power, appellees argue that substantive rule-making represents a sufficiently important innovation in Commission practice for us to balk at authorizing its use on the basis of an arguably ambiguous statute in the absence of very firm indications of affirmative and specific legislative intent. Indeed, courts have assumed such a stance toward novel assertions of agency powers. This court did so in Textile and Apparel Group v. FTC, supra, where we reviewed an agency rule allowing for ex parte seizure of imports at Customs and a procedure for testing goods prior to entry, both without provision for the Trade Commission's normal enforcement procedure of adversary cease-and-desist proceedings and judicial review. Because this procedure entirely dispensed with a hearing and because it varied so sharply from the Commission's customary mode of proceeding against possible wrongdoers, we structured our review to "look for some fairly strong indication, backed by sound policy, that Congress meant for the Commission to act in this way." [6] Unlike either Textile & Apparel Group or Anglo-Canadian Shipping Co., this case does not involve nearly so drastic a departure from accustomed modes of agency proceeding. The rule here does not bypass the Commission's statute-based cease-and-desist proceedings. It merely supplements them. Moreover, in light of the concern evident in the legislative history that the Commission give attention to the special circumstances of individual businesses in proceeding against them, see Appendix at pages 704–705, the Commission should administer any rules it might promulgate in much the same way that courts have ordinarily required other agencies to administer rules that operate to modify a regulated party's rights to a full hearing. That is, some opportunity must be given for a defendant in a Section 5 proceeding to demonstrate that the special circumstances of his case warrant waiving the rule's applicability, as where the rationale of the rule does not appear to apply to his own situation or a compelling case of hardship can be made out. See FPC v. Texaco, Inc., supra, 377 U.S. at 40, 84 S.Ct. 1105; United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., supra, 351 U.S. at 205, 76 S.Ct. 763; Gulf Oil Corp. v. Hickel, 140 U.S. App. D.C. 368, 375, 435 F.2d 440, 447 (1970); WAIT Radio v. FCC, 135 U.S. App. D.C. 317, 321, 418 F.2d 1153, 1157 (1969); Sun Oil Co. v. FPC, 5 Cir., 355 F.2d 181, 183 (1965). See generally Sofaer, Judicial Control of Informal Discretionary Adjudication and Enforcement, 72 Colum.L.Rev. 1293, 1329–1330 (1972); Note, The Use of Agency Rulemaking to Deny Adjudications Apparently Required by Statute, 54 Iowa L.Rev. 1086, 1104–1105, 1115–1119 (1969).

[7] Moreover, as we have pointed out, substantive rule-making is a widely utilized practice throughout our administrative agencies, and its use has been upheld even in cases where its use appears to conflict with regulated parties' adjudicatory rights, as in Storer, Texaco,

Inc., and their successors. In dealing with this apparent conflict of private parties' adjudicatory rights and the agencies' interests in promulgating clear policy guidelines to provide notice to an industry and to avoid time-consuming individualized hearings on issues that are common in that industry, courts have stressed the advantages of efficiency and expedition which inhere in reliance on rule-making instead of adjudication alone. See FPC v. Texaco, Inc., supra, 377 U.S. at 44, 84 S.Ct. 1105; American Airlines, Inc. v. CAB, supra, 123 U.S. App. D.C. at 315, 359 F.2d at 629; see also Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., supra, 412 U.S. at 645, 93 S.Ct. 2488; Weinberger v. Hynson, Westcott & Dunning, Inc., supra, 411 U.S. at 903, 93 S.Ct. 2469. Furthermore, under the Administrative Procedure Act the public, including all parties in the industry who might be affected, are given a significant opportunity prior to promulgation of a rule to ventilate the policy and empirical issues at stake through written submissions, at a minimum, see 5 U.S.C. § 553, or more, as here, where the agency permitted oral argument in a nonadjudicatory setting. Finally, any rules promulgated by the agency are subject to judicial review testing their legality and ensuring that they are within the scope of the broad statutory prohibition they purport to define.

[8] Any fears that the agency could successfully use rule-making power as a means of oppressive or unreasonable regulation, seem exaggerated in view of courts' general practice in reviewing rules to scrutinize their statement of basis and purpose to see whether the major issues of policy pro and con raised in the submissions to the agency were given sufficient consideration. Automotive Parts & Accessories Assn. v. Boyd, 132 U.S.App.D.C. 200, 208–213, 407 F.2d 330, 338–343 (1968). See also City of Chicago, Ill. v. FPC, 147 U.S. App.D.C. 312, 322–326, 458 F.2d 731, 741–745 [693] (1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1074, 92 S.Ct. 1495, 31 L.Ed.2d 808 (1972). The Commission is hardly free to write its own law of consumer protection and antitrust since the statutory standard which the rules may define with greater particularity is a legal standard. Although the Commission's conclusions as to the standard's reach are ordinarily shown deference, see FTC v. Motion Picture Advertising Service Co., supra, 344 U.S. at 396, 73 S.Ct. 361; FTC v. Cement Institute, supra, 333 U.S. at 720–721, 68 S.Ct. 793; FTC v. R. F. Keppel & Bro., Inc., 291 U.S. 304, 314, 54 S.Ct. 423, 78 L.Ed. 814 (1934), the standard must "get [its] final meaning from judicial construction." FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 385, 85 S.Ct. 1035, 1043, 13 L.Ed.2d 904 (1965). See also FTC v. Cement Institute, supra, 333 U.S. at 709, 68 S.Ct. 793; Atlantic Refining Co. v. FTC, 381 U.S. 357, 368, 85 S.Ct. 1498, 14 L.Ed.2d 443 (1965).

As we suggested earlier, our task in determining the meaning of this legislation is the usual one of "starting from the areas where the legislative intent is readily discernible, and projecting to fair and reasonable corollaries of that intent for the specific issue before us." Montana Power Co. v. FPC, 144 U.S. App.D.C. 263, 270, 445 F.2d 739, 746 (1970) (en banc), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 1013, 91 S.Ct. 566, 27 L.Ed.2d 627 (1971). Under this approach, we start here with the language of Section 6(g). It is as clear as it is unlimited: "The Commission shall also have power * * * to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of [Section 5]." Ambiguous legislative history cannot change the express legislative intent. The Commission is using rule-making to carry out what the Congress agreed was among its central purposes: expedited administrative enforcement of the national policy against monopolies and unfair business practices. Under the circumstances, since Section 6(g) plainly authorizes rule-making and nothing in the statute or in its legislative history precludes its use for this purpose, the action of the Commission must be upheld.

VI

[9, 10] Our conclusion as to the scope of Section 6(g) is not disturbed by the fact that the agency itself did not assert the power to promulgate substantive rules until 1962 [26] and indeed indicated intermittently before that time that it lacked such power.[27] As the

Nye of S. Dak., to give these rules the force of law, as substantive rules are said to have today, see S. 2628, 72d Cong., 1st Sess. (1932), 75 Cong.Rec. (Part 2) 1287 (1932), but no action was taken in Congress on his bill. In some cases, moreover, the Supreme Court has referred to the Commission's method of elaborating the statutory standard as a " 'gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion,' " see FTC v. Raladam Co., 283 U.S. 643, 648, 51 S.Ct. 587, 590, 75 L.Ed. 1324 (1931), quoting Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U.S. (6 Otto) 97, 104, 24 L.Ed. 616 (1878). See also Pan American World Airways v. United States, 371 U.S. 296, 307–308, 83 S.Ct. 476, 9 L.Ed.2d 325 (1963); Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 533, 55 S.Ct. 837, 79 L.Ed. 1570 (1935); FTC v. Gratz, 253 U.S. 421, 435–437, 40 S.Ct. 572 64 L.Ed. 993 (1920). But these isolated quotes are hardly determinative, since the Court has never faced the precise question of whether the Commission was delegated substantive rule-making power by Congress and the various comments can be best understood as descriptive of the Commission's then existent mode of operation rather than as prescriptive of the lawful bounds of the agency's powers. To give weight to these quotes would force us to weigh them against the unelaborated assertion by Mr. Justice Goldberg in his dissenting opinion in Atlantic Refining Co. v. FTC, 381 U.S. 357, 390–391, 85 S.Ct. 1498, 1517, 14 L.Ed.2d 443 (1965), that "[t]he Commission has the general power to choose to

Su[694]preme Court put it in United States v. Morton Salt Co., supra, a case which involved what was thought to be a novel assertion of the FTC's statutory authority:

> The fact that powers long have been unexercised well may call for close scrutiny as to whether they exist; but if granted, they are not lost by being allowed to lie dormant, any more than nonexistent powers can be prescripted by an unchallenged exercise. We know that unquestioned powers are sometimes unexercised from lack of funds, motives of expediency, or the competition of more immediately important concerns. We find no basis for holding that any power ever granted to the Trade Commission has been forfeited by nonuser [sic].

338 U.S. at 647–648, 70 S.Ct. at 366. See also FTC v. Dean Foods Co., supra, 384 U.S. at 610, 86 S.Ct. 1738; United States v. E. I. du Pont & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 590, 77 S.Ct. 872, 1 L.Ed.2d 1057 (1957). The various statements made by Commission representatives questioning its authority to promulgate rules which are to be used with binding effect on subsequent adjudications are not determinative of the question before us. True, the accustomed judicial practice is to give "great weight" to an agency's construction of its own enabling legislation, particularly when such a construction stretches back, as here, to a time close to the agency's origin.[28] See Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16, 85 S.Ct. 792, 13 L.Ed.2d 616 (1965); United States v. American Trucking Assns., 310 U.S. 534, 549, 60 S.Ct. 1059, 84 L.Ed. 1345 (1940); Norwegian Nitrogen Products Co. v. United States, 288 U.S. 294, 315, 53 S.Ct. 84, 77 L.Ed. 512 (1933). The argument for judicial deference is not so strong where, as here, the question does not require special agency competence or expertise, requiring the agency, for example, to make a complex judgment involving its areas of expertise, competition and impact of business practices on consumer behavior. Here, the question is simply one of statutory interpretation concerning the procedures and setting in which the Commission may elaborate its statutory standard. Since this sort of question calls largely for the exercise of historical analysis and logical and analogical reasoning, it is the everyday staple of judges as well as agencies. Thus we feel confident in making our own judgment as to the proper construction of Section 6(g). See Wilderness Society v. Morton, 156 U.S.App.D.C. 121, 145, 479 F.2d 842, 866 (1973) (en banc), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 917, 93 S.Ct. 1550, 36 L.Ed.2d 309, (1973); Thompson v. Clifford, 132 U.S.App.D.C. 351, 364, 408 F.2d 154, 167 (1968). We are, of course, reassured by the proceed in this field, as in others, through either rule-making or the process of case-by-case adjudication. * * * Whichever method the Commission chooses to use, however, it seems obvious to me that the Commission must formulate a clear rational rule which is based on an adequate economic explication and takes into consideration the situation of all industry members affected by the rule." In our view, to repeat, it seems safe to conclude that no decision of the Supreme Court concerning the agency foreshadows today's result either way.

fact that the Commission itself, as distinguished from its former spokesmen, has come to the same conclusion.

Our refusal to abdicate our "ultimate responsibility to construe the language employed by Congress," Zuber v. Allen, 396 U.S. 168, 193, 90 S.Ct. 314, 328, 24 L.Ed.2d 345 (1969), is further supported by the fact that the Commission's [695] present claim of substantive rule-making authority is not new, but of several years' standing,[29] and, more important, by our belief that rejecting the claim of rule-making power would run counter to the broad policies of expeditious enforcement and greater certainty in the administration of the statute that clearly motivated Congress in 1914. Cf. ibid. So far as we can tell, the earlier assertions of lack of rule-making power were based on an unduly crabbed and cautious analysis of the legislative background, an analysis that we have conducted independently and that has brought us to an opposite but, in our judgment, correct conclusion.

A more troubling obstacle to the Commission's position here is the argument that Congress was made fully aware of the formerly restrictive view of the Commission's power and passed a series of laws granting limited substantative rule-making authority to the Commission in discrete areas allegedly on the premise that the 1914 debate withheld such authority. Where there has been evidence of congressional knowledge of and acquiescence in a long-standing agency construction of its own powers, courts have occasionally concluded that the agency construction had received a de facto ratification by Congress. See Power Reactor Development Co. v. Int. Union of Elec., Radio & Machine Wkrs., 367 U.S. 396, 409, 81 S.Ct. 1529, 6 L.Ed.2d 924 (1961); cf. Boesche v. Udall, 373 U.S. 472, 482–483, 83 S.Ct. 1373, 10 L.Ed.2d 491 (1963).

But de facto ratification through acquiescence in an administrative construction is not lightly attributed. See Zuber v. Allen, supra, 396 U.S. at 193, 90 S.Ct. 314; Power Reactor Development Co. v. Int. Union of Elec., Radio & Machine Wkrs., supra; Ex parte Endo, 323 U.S. 283, 303 n. 24, 65 S.Ct. 208, 89 L.Ed. 243 (1944). The argument before us is not that Congress, by a combination of its knowledge of the agency construction and its inaction, as in Power Reactor, could be said to have accepted the construction. Even in these cases it can be argued quite plausibly that imputing ratification in this fashion fails to take into account significant practical aspects of the legislative process: those legislators actually aware of the construction in question may not have been so concerned as to raise it to the attention of most members,[30] and even in the event some legislators were deeply troubled by the construction, the press of other business was such as to keep the question on the "back burner." [31] Here the situation is different. The view that the Commission lacked substantive rule-making power has been clearly brought to the attention of Congress [32] and, rather than simply failing to act on [696] the question, Congress, in expanding the agency's powers in several discrete areas of marketing regulation, affirmatively enacted limited grants of substantive rule-making authority in the Wool Products Act of 1939,[33] the Fur Products Labeling Act of 1951,[34] the Flammable Fabrics Act of 1953 as amended in 1967,[35] the Textile Fiber Products Identification Act of 1958,[36] and the Fair Packaging and Labeling Act of 1967.[37] Thus it is argued that Congress would not have granted the agency such powers unless it had felt that otherwise the agency lacked rule-making authority.

[29] The Commission first announced it would enforce the prohibitions of § 5 with the assistance of substantive rules in 1962 when it amended its Rules of Practice to provide for issuance of Trade Regulation Rules, 27 Fed.Reg. 4636, 4796 (1962). But the actual effect of these rules and the Commission's view of whether they were merely to be viewed as interpretive or statutorily based and thus determinative of the questions to be litigated in § 5 proceedings remained unclear. See Statement of Basis and Purpose of Trade Regulation Rule [Cigarette Advertising], 29 Fed.Reg. 8325, 8369 n. 143 (1964). The chairman of the FTC, Mr. Paul Rand Dixon, indicated after 1962 that the kind of binding rule-making authority the FTC asserts here did not exist. See, e.g., Hearings on H.R. 15440 Before House Interstate & Foreign Commerce Committee, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 990 (1966); Hearings on S. 387 Before Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust & Monopoly of the Committee on the Judiciary, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., 281–282 (1963). See generally Case Note, supra note 23, 14 B.C.Ind. & Comm.L.Rev. at 376–382.

[11] Conceding the greater force of this argument than one premised on congressional inaction, we believe it must not be accepted blindly. In such circumstances, it is equally possible that Congress granted the power out of uncertainty, understandable caution, and a desire to avoid litigation. While this argument, like any theory requiring us to draw inferences from congressional action or inaction, may be speculative, we believe it cannot be ignored here. For there is ample evidence that, while some of the limited rule-making legislation may well have been influenced by the belief that the 1914 Act did not grant the Commission substantive rule-making power,[38] at least during the passage of the Packaging and Labeling Act of 1967, this assumption was not accepted and was thought by many congressmen to be an open question, despite the protestations of the Commission's chairman that the agency was powerless under the 1914 Act.[39] The report of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, while pointing out that the agency lacked "specific authority" (emphasis added) to issue regulations prescribing standards for package labeling, suggested that the question of the agency's general authority under Section 6(g) to do so was open. The report noted that the "authority of the Commission to issue trade regulation rules * * * has never been passed on in the courts." H.R. Rep. No. 2076, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 22 (1966). The Senate Committee report did not touch on the issue directly, instead focusing on the question whether stronger procedural safeguards than were guaranteed by the Administrative [697] Procedure Act should be enacted in the standards-setting section. S. Rep. No. 1186, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 17 (1966). But the dissenting members argued that the bill's provision of rule-making authority was redundant and that the rule-making provision merely served to "make the [Commission's] authority apparent." Id. at 40. As we suggested earlier, imputing congressional ratification to a disputed administrative construction of its powers is, in the words of the Supreme Court, "shaky business," Power Reactor Development Co. v. Int. Union of Elec., Radio & Machine Wkrs., supra, 367 U.S. at 409, 81 S.Ct. 1529. Where there is solid reason, as there plainly is here, to believe that Congress, in fact, has not wholeheartedly accepted the agency's viewpoint and instead enacted legislation out of caution and to eliminate the kind of disputes that invariably attend statutory ambiguity, we believe that relying on the de facto ratification argument is unwise. In such circumstances, we must perform our customary task of coming to an independent judgment as to the statute's meaning, confident that if Congress believes that its creature, the Commission, thus exercises too much power, it will repeal the grant.[40]

[33] See 15 U.S.C. § 68a (1970). The FTC, in furtherance of its power to enforce § 2 of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act of 1936, 15 U.S.C. § 13 (1970), is also empowered "after due investigation and hearing to all interested parties, [to] fix and establish quantity limits, and revise the same as it finds necessary, as to particular commodities or classes of commodities, where it finds that available purchasers in greater quantities are so few as to render differentials on account thereof unjustly discriminatory or promotive of monopoly in any line of commerce; and the foregoing shall then not be construed to permit differentials based on differences in quantities greater than those so fixed and established * * *." 15 U.S.C. § 13(a). And it is argued that the existence of this narrow provision should be taken, by implication, to exclude any broader Commission rule-making authority, especially in the pricing field. F. Rowe, Price Discrimination Under the Robinson-Patman Act 123–124 (1964 Supp.). But, as we suggested in text, see pp. 675–676 supra, this sort of logic, resting on the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, is unreliable.

[38] See, e.g., 86 Cong.Rec. (Part 10) 11320 (1940), where Congressman Case, in discussing the Wool Products Labeling Act's provision for rule-making and the opposition to granting such power to the agency, said:

"The second argument * * * is that the evils of false labeling are being curbed and gradually cured by the Federal Trade Commission. If that were so the Federal Trade Commission itself would not be on record in favor of the passage of the bill and the Federal Trade Commission did testify in favor of the bill. It testified that something like this was needed to put teeth into their recommendations to the trade."

[12] In sum, we must respectfully register our disagreement with the District Court's painstaking opinion. Its result would render the Commission ineffective to do the job assigned it by Congress. Such a result is not required [698] by the legislative history of the Act. We rely, therefore, on the plain language of Section 6(g) which gives the Commission the authority to "make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of [Section 5]." See Mourning v. Family Publications Service, Inc., supra. We hold that under the terms of its governing statute, 15 U.S.C. § 41 et seq., and under Section 6(g), 15 U.S.C. § 46(g), in particular, the Federal Trade Commission is authorized to promulgate rules defining the meaning of the statutory standards of the illegality the Commission is empowered to prevent. Thus we must reverse the District Court's judgment and remand this case for further proceedings.

It is so ordered.

[40] We are aware, of course, that in both the just concluded 92nd Congress and the current 93rd Congress legislation granting the FTC limited substantive rule-making power in the area of "unfair and deceptive practices" has been under consideration. One such bill, S. 986 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971), was passed by the Senate, 117 Cong.Rec. S. 17887 (daily ed. Nov. 8, 1971), but did not come to a vote in the House. It is also true that in the Senate debate on S. 986 comments were made by various Senators to the effect that the Commission currently lacked the power to issue rules defining either unfair methods of competition or unfair or deceptive acts or practices, which rules would be enforceable in cease and desist proceedings. See id. at 17843–17848 (statement of Sen. Hruska); id. at 17849 (statement of Sen. Cook); id. at 17873 (statement of Sen. Cotton), but no such statement was made by the bill's sponsor, Sen. Magnuson, who pointed out, "For years the argument has been going on about the Federal Trade Commission not having the authority it should have. We tried to fashion a bill. I, myself, had some doubts about the rule-making authority, but I think the bill covers it very well." Id. at 17858. The bill that passed the Senate not only gave the FTC power "to issue legislative rules defining with specificity acts or practices which are unfair or deceptive to consumers and which section 5(a)(1) of this Act proscribes," S. 986, supra, § 206, but it also provided that procedures available in adjudication under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 556, 557 (1970), should be employed and judicial review should employ the substantial evidence rule. Ibid. Moreover, such rules would only become effective in the event neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate disapproved them within 60 calendar days while in session. Ibid. If this legislation had actually been enacted, of course, the Commission would not have all the power it assumes today, since the proposed rule-making section in S. 986 repealed § 6(g), as passed in 1914, and substituted a provision allowing only rules and regulations "as are specifically provided for hereinafter," thus nullifying any argument that rules might be promulgated to define "unfair methods of competition." On the other hand, but for the statements on the Senate floor quoted above, it is possible to interpret S. 986 as an indication of senatorial intent to narrow what the legislators felt was presently an overbroad rule-making power under the current statute. In any event, the legislation did not pass, and we take its reintroduction in the current session in substantially similar form, S. 356, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. (1973), as an indication that the questions of FTC rule-making power, its scope, and the safeguards surrounding the promulgation of such rules, are under close study and nothing more. In the event Congress decides that the scope of rule-making power that we find to be implied in the 1914 Act is too broad or lacks sufficient safeguards, surely it appears in a prime position to make the required changes.

APPENDIX

THE 1914 CONGRESSIONAL DEBATES INVOLVING TRADE COMMISSION RULE-MAKING POWER

The result we reach in this case might be different if we were convinced that the legislators who worked out the details of the Federal Trade Commission Act had carefully focused on the implications of rule-making power and given a clear indication that they rejected its use except for purely procedural purposes. We have examined the legislative history—the debates and reports—with considerable care and have analyzed appellees' arguments based on that history. We find that on the question of rule-making the leading proponents of the legislation in both Houses spoke ambiguously. The scope of the Commission's power to make rules was not a central issue in the lengthy debate, and the occasional comments to which we are referred by appellees as demonstrating a firm contrary intent on the part of those most familiar with the details of the legislation turn out, on close inspection, to be most sensibly interpreted in ways other than those urged on us.

I. Consideration in the House of President Wilson's 1914 Proposal

Two days after President Wilson's 1914 message to Congress, the Administration's plan for a trade commission was introduced in both Houses of Congress. Sponsored by Congressman Clayton of Alabama and Senator Newlands, the bill[1] essentially provided for an investigatory commission, clothed with power to compel reports on corporations and business and financial practices and to recommend prosecution under the antitrust laws. The proposed agency lacked any independent power to order a halt to business practices involving a violation of law. The agency did have the power, upon the initiative of the Attorney General, to assist him in framing antitrust settlements and, upon the request of federal judges trying antitrust cases, to make findings involving questions in pending litigation as well as to assist in framing decrees. The Clayton-Newlands bill was modified somewhat in the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill reported out, drafted by Congressman Covington,[2] deleted the authority contained in the original proposal to allow the commission to recommend antitrust prosecutions, but otherwise was closely similar to the bill originally proposed. The Committee majority explicitly rejected "the establishment of a commission having powers of regulation or control of prices, or the power directly to issue orders controlling the lawful operations of industrial business in this country."[3]

The Covington bill did, however, include a section granting the commission authority to "make rules and regulations [699] and classifications of corporations" in order to carry out the bill's other provisions, but it was agreed that this merely gave the commission power to elaborate in detail which businesses would be subject to its reporting requirements. See 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) 8842–8844 (1914) (statement of Congressman Covington); id. at 9047–9048 (statement of Congressman Towner of Iowa).[4]

Little that occurred in the House debate up to the passage on June 5 of the Covington bill, still formally backed by the President, bears directly on the issue before us. The proposed commission was given no power to approve or disapprove particular business practices according to a legal standard, and thus the question of utilizing substantive rulemaking in aid of adjudication was submerged under the broader question whether the commission should have any independent enforcement authority at all.

This is not to say that the House wholly ignored the question of independent enforcement authority for the commission. Five Republican members of the Committee, while accepting the Covington bill, noted pointedly that it did not follow the approach of the 1912 GOP platform, which had proposed having the commission assume some of the antitrust functions currently exercised by the courts, an undoubted reference to plans that the agency should have power to bring cases, hear evidence, make findings, and promulgate orders enforceable in federal courts. Representative Stevens of New Hampshire dissented from the majority on the Committee and berated the Covington bill for failing to give the commission "general power to prevent unfair competitive practices" in order to correct what he saw as the "disappointing" results of relying wholly on Justice Department prosecutions in the federal courts, which he characterized as a "slow, costly process."[5] Stevens' own proposal to give the commission independent adjudicatory power, H.R. 15660, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. (1914), did not appear to contemplate use of substantive rules promulgated separately from the hearings he proposed to order corporations to halt practices constituting "unfair or oppressive competition." Instead, he viewed "unfair or oppressive competition" as a "question of fact to be decided by the commission the same way [on a case-by-case basis] that the Interstate Commerce Commission decides what rates and practices of the railroads are unreasonable and unfair."[6] When Stevens attempted to bring his bill to the floor, he was ruled out of order. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) at 9062. An even stronger amendment introduced by Representative Murdock of Kansas not only gave the commission power to halt "unfair or oppressive competition," but also provided a list of practices defining the term and authorized the commission, in some circumstances, to assume price-fixing power to halt monopoly. Id. at 9050–9051. This proposal, too, was rejected. Id. at 9055.

The question whether the commission should have power to define rules of business conduct through nonadjudicatory proceedings also surfaced, but proposals to give the commission such power were rejected.[7] The debate on such

[7] Congressman Morgan of Okla. proposed to amend the Covington bill to give the commission power to declare rules to prevent corporations subject to the commission's jurisdiction "from engaging in any practice or from using any method or system, or from pursuing any policy or from resorting to any device, scheme, or contrivance that constitutes unfair competition or unjust discrimination as between competitors, individuals, or communities." 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) at 9047. This amendment was quickly rejected. Id. at 9050. A similar proposal was made by Cong. Dillon of S. Dak., id. at 9056, but his plan would have specifically granted the commission adjudicatory power too. Ibid. It was rejected. Id. at 9057. This proposal, in turn, was similar to one made by Cong. Lafferty of Ore. in a report dissenting from the Commerce Committee's recommendation of the Covington bill. Lafferty's plan would have granted the commission adjudicatory and substantive rulemaking authority to prevent "unfair or oppressive competition or unfair trade practices," and authority once a violation had been found, not only to issue a restraining order, but also, in the event of a finding of substantial monopoly" and "exhorbitant prices," a

[700] plans was perfunctory, probably because it was clear that the majority of the House supported the concept of a weak commission without any enforcement or independent rule-making authority. At this early stage in the deliberations, it seemed to make little difference to the majority behind the Covington bill that some opponents, like Stevens, backed a commission with purely adjudicatory powers and others, principally Progressives like Murdock and Lafferty, preferred an agency relying on a combination of adjudication and substantive rule-making. Thus, while we occasionally give weight to positive rejections of amendments by Congress, see e.g., National Automatic Laundry & Cleaning Council v. Shultz, 143 U.S.App.D.C. 274, 291, 443 F.2d 689, 706 (1971), we believe we are justified here in concluding that the rejection of rule-making proposals did not necessarily represent a rejection of rule-making as a distinctive technique of agency regulation, but could just as easily, if not more persuasively, be interpreted as a broader rejection of a commission with any independent enforcement power. Cf. United States v. Wise, 370 U.S. 405, 411, 82 S.Ct. 1354, 8 L.Ed.2d 590 (1962).

For our purposes, it is enough to note that opponents of the President's initial plan who argued for a stronger commission agreed broadly that continued reliance on the courts for adjudication of cases involving anticompetitive practices was an inadequate solution. Representative Dillon of South Dakota, for example, proposed that a commission have power to make rules regulating "future conduct" and enforcement power to issue orders against breaches of such rules as well as breaches of a broad standard of "any misconduct, unfair methods, unfair competition, acts of oppression, or acts of deception." 51 Cong. Rec. (Part 9) at 9056. His proposal would seem on its face to contemplate a commission utilizing rule-making to specify standards of improper conduct under a broad standard and then adjudication as a mode of enforcing such standards in cases where they applied. He went so far as to reject almost all further judicial participation in the task of restoring free competition, arguing in accustomed terms:

> The attempt to control the corporations through the judiciary will fail. The judiciary with its delays, its technicalities, and uncertainties is wholly inadequate to regulate or control the trusts and combinations. The legislative department of government does not need the aid of the courts in regulating legislative or administrative matters. * * *

II. Consideration in the Senate of President Wilson's Revised Proposal.

After the Covington bill passed the House, it went to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce whose chairman, Senator Newlands, had been an original sponsor of the President's trade commission plan. Within a few days of the House vote, however, the President radically altered his view as to the proper extent of the commission's powers. No longer did he support the Covington bill's conception of a commission without [701] independent enforcement power. In a turnabout, he now backed legislation giving the agency power to limited price-fixing remedial power, as well as power to eliminate "substantial monopoly" by an "order * * * specifying such changes in the organization, conduct, or management of its property * * * as * * * will most effectively and promptly terminate such monopolistic power, while at the same time safeguarding property rights and business efficiency." H.R. Rep. No. 533, supra note 3, Part 3, 19–26. The final amendment to add significant powers to the Covington bill's commission was made, again, by Cong. Morgan. It provided for adjudicatory and price-fixing powers, 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) at 9066, and was quickly rejected, id. at 9067.

order a halt to unfair competition practices after holding a hearing and making findings.[8] Historians[9] are broadly agreed on the rationale for the President's switch of position. As part of his package of economic reform legislation, which included the plan for a weak trade commission, the President was supporting legislation to make more specific the antitrust laws' prohibitions. This latter bill was introduced by Congressman Clayton of Alabama and ultimately became the Clayton Act.[10] In its original form, the Clayton bill laid out a series of new prohibitions on anticompetitive behavior, provided for Justice Department enforcement of the new rules, and provided criminal penalties for violation.[11] This bill passed the House on June 5, the same day as the Covington bill providing for a new trade commission.[12] But the Clayton bill received widespread criticism, not only from businessmen and their legislative backers who resented the provisions for criminal penalties, but also from those supporting tightening of the rules of antitrust. The reformers' argument was that the task of defining in statutory terms all possible restraints of trade injurious to competition was essentially Sisyphean, that businessmen were sufficiently clever to invent new forms of trade restraint that would escape the coverage of the Clayton bill's provisions.[13] The President was appar[702]ently receptive to this criticism of the Clayton bill. Moreover, he was also apparently receptive to criticism of the traditional practice of relying exclusively on the Justice Department and the courts for antitrust enforcement. Thus he dealt with these two types of criticism by radically changing and expanding the role he had originally planned for the commission. Now it would be given independent authority to enforce through adjudicatory proceedings a broad standard of illegality that, unlike the specific terms of the Clayton bill, could be adapted to the variety of business practices with anticompetitive effects.[14]

As finally enacted, a few weeks after the Trade Commission Act was passed, the Clayton Act gave the FTC the power to enforce its substantive provisions aimed at price discrimination, § 2, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 13, exclusive dealing and tying arrangements, § 3, 15 U.S.C. § 14, anticompetitive mergers, § 7, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and interlocking directorates, § 8, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 19. [13] See sources cited in note 8 supra. The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce report endorsing the new version of the commission bill made this point explicitly:

"One of the most important provisions of the bill is that which declares unfair competition in commerce to be unlawful, and empowers the commission to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce by orders issued after hearing, restraining, and prohibiting unfair methods of competition, which orders are enforceable in the courts.

"The committee gave careful consideration to the question as to whether it would attempt to define the many and variable unfair practices which prevail in commerce and to forbid their continuance or whether it would, by a general declaration condemning unfair practices, leave it to the commission to determine what practices were unfair. It concluded that the latter course would be the better, for the reason, as stated by one of the representatives of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, that there were too many unfair practices to define, and after writing 20 of them into the law it would be quite possible to invent others.

"It may be stated that representatives of the National Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers' Association, the Ohio Manufacturers' Association, and the Illinois Manufacturers' Association approved the passage of a trade commission bill and a provision regarding the inquiry into and condemnation of unfair practices in trade.

"It is believed that the term 'unfair competition' has a legal significance which can be enforced by the commission and the courts, and that it is no more difficult to determine what is unfair competition than it is to determine what is a reasonable rate or what is an unjust discrimination. The committee was of the opinion that it would be better to put in a general provision condemning unfair competition than to attempt to define the numerous unfair practices, such as local price cutting, interlocking directorates, and holding companies intended to restrain substantial competition."

S.Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 13 (1914). See also 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 11) 11084 (Statement of Senator Newlands, chairman of the Commerce Committee).

The leadership of the Senate Commerce Committee was informed of the President's change of heart and promptly pushed through the Committee onto the floor legislation embodying the new plan. But the bill reported out clearly did not embrace the exercise of substantive rule-making power. The bill that passed the House had a separate section giving the commission power to make rules and regulations to define the scope of its investigatory authority.[15] But the new bill reported out of the Commerce Committee by Senator Newlands which gave the commission, at the behest of the President, new enforcement authority contained no grant of any rule-making power.[16] What the Committee apparently had in mind was a quasi-judicial agency, elaborating the Committee bill's statutory standard of illegality—"unfair competition"—on a purely case-by-case basis. This view of the bill that emerged on the Senate floor after the Administration decided to support a commission with expanded power is amply supported by statements by the bill's proponents on the Senate floor, see 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 11) 11178 (1914) (statement of Senator Hollis); 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 13) 12916–12917 (1914) (statement of Senator Cummins); 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 13) at 13317 (statement of Senator Walsh), as well as statements by critics of the bill, see 51 Cong.Rec. [703] (Part 11) at 11181 (statement of Senator Thomas). See also S. Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 13 (1914).

In other words, we believe the Commission's position can draw no support from the Senate's deliberations over the bill granting the Commission enforcement power that emerged from the Senate Commerce Committee following President Wilson's change of heart. The bill that emerged from the Committee contained no provision even remotely supporting the exercise of commission rule-making power to define the statutory standard of illegality contained in the section of the bill granting the agency adjudicatory authority. Moreover, during the debate over the Commerce Committee's bill Senator Newlands, Committee chairman and the bill's floor manager, argued that the legislation before the Senate encompassed "no powers except those conferred by this bill," 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 12) at 11602, further supporting our view of this aspect of the deliberations. To be sure, the bill that emerged from the Senate Commerce Committee was amended in a few respects on the Senate floor prior to passage and submission to a House-Senate conference committee. But none of these amendments can be read as supporting rule-making power.[17]

[15] See H.R. 15613, supra note 2, § 8. The House-passed bill is printed at H.R. Rep. No. 1142, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 10–13 (1914).

[16] There may be reason to believe that this deletion of rule-making authority in the Senate bill was merely a linguistic alteration of the Covington bill. The Covington bill's rule-making power was meant to permit the commission to designate which corporations with gross receipts of less than $5 million would be required to file annual reports. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 9) at 8845–8846. There was some dispute over whether this power extended to allow the commission to impose on corporations subject to its reporting requirements a uniform system of accounting and an amendment was offered by Cong. Towner of Iowa to grant the commission this power explicitly, id. at 9047, but it was quickly rejected, id. at 9049. The bill that emerged from the Senate Commerce Committee, see S. 4160, § 3(c), printed at S.Rep. No. 597, supra note 13, at 1–5, appeared to give the commission discretionary power, without terming this power rule-making authority, to require corporate reports from any firm as well as the power to require a uniform system of annual reports, which might be viewed as tantamount to a uniform accounting requirement. And this provision was unchanged in the bill that passed the Senate. See H.R. Rep. No. 1142, supra note 15, at 15. Thus it would seem that the discretion given the commission in the House bill in the exercise of its power to compel corporate reporting remained in the Senate bill, but was simply phrased differently and no longer termed the power to "make rules and regulations and classifications of corporations."

[17] The Senate did accept an important substitute proposed by Senator Cummins, 51 Cong. Rec. (Part 13) at 13109, for the version of § 5 reported out of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. This substitute, printed at 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 13) at 13045, gave defendants found liable in commission proceedings the explicit right to bring suit in the District Courts for review of the commission's orders. No such provision was contained in the bill reported by the Senate Committee. See S. 4160, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., § 5 (1914), printed in S.Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 3–4 (1914). Moreover, the Cummins substitute also made clear that the District Courts would apply the same standard of review to commission orders as was applied to orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at least in cases of review sought by defendants before the agency. The bill reported from the Commerce Committee did not make clear what standard of review the courts would apply to the commission's orders. It merely stated: "Whenever the commission, after the issuance of such order, shall find that such corporation has not complied therewith, the commission may petition the district court of the United States, within any district where the method in question was used or where such corporation is located or carries on business, praying the court to issue an injunction to enforce such order of the commission; and the court is hereby authorized to issue such injunction." See S.Rep. No. 597, supra, at 4. Because this provision suggested no actual standard of review, it was criticized by Senator Cummins on the ground that it might be construed so as to preclude any review of the commission's actions and to require the courts to issue rubber-stamp injunctions. As such, it was felt, the bill might be held unconstitutional for want of due process. See 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 13) at 13007; id. at 13049–13050. See also id. at 13053 (statement of Senator Walsh). Cummins' substitute also made a slight linguistic change in the first few sentences of § 5, sentences enunciating the commission's enforcement powers. The Committee's bill said:

> "Sec. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.
> "The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent corporations from using unfair methods of competition in commerce."

S.Rep. No. 597, supra note 13, at 3. The remainder of the section detailed the procedures by which the commission would act to prevent unfair competition and provided for judicial enforcement, as discussed above. In addition to altering the judicial review procedures, the first two sentences in his substitute revised the Committee's version slightly to read:

> "Sec. 5. That unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful.
> "The commission shall have authority to prevent such unfair competition in commerce in the manner following, to wit: * * *"

51 Cong.Rec. (Part 13) at 13045. (Emphasis added.) It is tempting, of course, to conclude that the addition of the italicized language in the substitute demonstrates a senatorial purpose to make clear, by the use of arguably limiting language, that only through adjudication would the standard of illegality be clarified to cover specific business practices. But this language was not discussed on the floor and it really adds nothing to our pre-existent view of the Senate deliberations on the bill that emerged from the Commerce Committee, since no provision granting rule-making power was inserted to start with. Of course, had this language stayed in the legislation as it was ultimately passed by both Houses and signed by the President, we would have to deal with its implications. But it was removed in the conference committee, again without any discussion.

Because the Senate bill lacked any rule-making provision and the House bill did not give the commission power to enforce a statutory standard of legality, the most important aspect of the legislative debate for our purposes occurred after the conference committee met and composed the differences between the two bills. It was only at this point that a rule-making provision was inserted which might justify the promulgation of rules defining the kinds of practices that breached the bill's standard of illegality. As we have pointed out, the House bill included a rule-making provision, but granted the commission no power to enforce a standard of legality. The Senate bill, by contrast, had no rule-making provision, but did include a standard of legality to be enforced by the commission. The conference bill put both types of provisions together in a single bill. We believe the rule-making provision, Section 6(g), justifies promulgation of standards defining with specificity the meaning of the statutory standard of legality in Section 5, a standard enforceable in subsequent agency adjudications.

Appellees insist that, since neither bill prior to conference granted the commission power to issue rules defining the statutory standard of illegality, the conference committee was barred by rules of congressional procedure from inserting this supplemental power. The leader of the House conferees, Congressman Covington, told the House that the bill produced by the conference was "within the limits of conference." 51 Cong. Rec. (Part 15) 14925 (1914). Senator Newlands, his Senate counterpart, pointed out, likewise, that the conference product was "entirely within the range of difference between the Senate and the House." Id. at 14769. Thus we have the leaders of the House and Senate conferees assuring the Congress that the conference bill complied with conference limitations and the Congress accepting that assurance. More important, the assurance given the Congress by Covington and Newlands appears well founded. The original House bill contained a rule-making provision granting authority roughly commensurate with the powers of investigations the commission was then designed to have. While the Senate bill deleted any such authority, we believe it can be persuasively argued that by reinserting a rule-making provision into the stronger commission bill all the conference did was reinstate the principle of the House bill as to rule-making—that is, permitting the commission to exercise authority roughly commensurate with its other powers, great or small. In this sense, the insertion of Section 6(g), as interpreted here, does no violence to the principle limiting the authority of the conference. Moreover, while this general principle of germaneness as to the powers of a conference may bind Congress, it has never bound the courts, which have frequently faced the problem of interpreting legislation in light of conference changes. Cf. St. Regis Paper Co. v. United States, 368 U.S. 208, 221–222, 82 S.Ct. 289, 7 L.Ed. 2d 240 (1961).

Unfortunately, the crucial debates and reports on the bill produced by the conference, passed by both Houses, signed into law by the President, and continuing as the agency's basic organic statute today do not illuminate the meaning of Section 6(g). The House conference committee report does not mention the provision. See H.R. Rep. No. 1142, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. (1914). It is true, as appellees suggest, that the statement of [705] the House managers in the conference report contains some remarks that might be interpreted to limit the commission to adjudication in working out the meaning and applicability of the statutory standard. But we do not read their comments involving application of the Section 5 prohibition against unfair competition to "particular business situations" or their comment that the unfairness of any particular practice "generally depends upon the surrounding circumstances of the particular case" as necessarily foreclosing the use of rulemaking to confine issues to be adjudicated and to give specificity to the standard of illegality. Id. at 19.

In our judgment, such comments should be interpreted in light of the managers' argument that, in framing a broad standard of unfairness rather than making an item-by-item listing of impermissible practices, the conference felt that such detailed legislative definitions would not "fit business of every sort in every part of this country." Ibid. To us, this means that Congress, at the time, felt that different practices in different industries or even similar practices in different industries would often warrant varying treatment by the commission. This is hardly tantamount to saying that practices of individual firms within the same industry necessarily warrant distinctive, individualized treatment, as appellees would have it. To say this, of course, is to suggest by implication that individual adjudications warrant only minimal precedential value and there is ample reason to believe that the legislators felt otherwise. As the bill's leading proponent, Senator Newlands, said: "We will build up through this commission a system of administrative law that will be as well and thoroughly accepted as to trade as are the decisions of our Interstate Commerce Commission regarding transportation, and we will bring peace and security to the business world." 51 Cong. Rec. (Part 11) at 11086.

In our view, the House managers' comments do not foreclose promulgation of substantive rules applicable to practices in a sector of an industry, throughout an industry, or in several industries at large. Rather, they suggest that the commission should administer any rules it might promulgate in much the same way that courts have ordinarily required other agencies to administer rules that operate to modify a regulated party's rights to a full hearing involving application of a statutory standard broader than the rule to his own particular circumstances. That is, some opportunity must be given for a defendant in a Section 5 proceeding to demonstrate that the special circumstances of his case warrant waiving the rule's applicability, as where the rationale of the rule does not appear to apply to his own situation or a compelling case of hardship can be made out. See text of the opinion at pages 691–692 supra and cases and materials cited therein. So long as the FTC makes available a "safety valve procedure" of this sort, in other words, we cannot see any conflict between the use of substantive rule-making and the concerns evidenced in the House managers' conference report that the commission should not treat varying business practices or defendants in a fashion that fails to appreciate relevant distinctions among them. This question of when waiver is appropriate or what procedures for waiver are required is not here before us. We have only the question of rule-making power vel non under the 1914 Act, but we do not believe the House managers' statements preclude the Commission's power to grant waivers of substantive rules under particularized circumstances.

The comparative print prepared by Senator Newlands to illustrate the differences and changes among the three bills—one passed in the House, one in the Senate, and one produced by the conference—is also cryptic on the rule-making question, but assuredly it does not support appellees' arguments. Indeed, it undercuts them seriously. First, the print suggests that the conference bill deleted the rule-making authority grant[706]ed in Section 8 of the House bill which, as we have seen, pertained to the characteristics of corporations that would be required to submit reports to the commission. S.Doc., Comparative Print, 63d Cong., 2d Sess., 15 (1914). This suggests that Section 6(g) was entirely new and thus can be assumed to have a different, broader scope than the House bill's provision, particularly since there is no cross reference from Section 6(g) to the authority granted in the House bill. Id. at 12. Support for giving Section 6(g) a broad reading may also be derived from the committee's deletion of the "to wit" language in Section 5 in the sentence immediately preceding specification of the hearing, findings, and cease and desist procedure. Since "to wit" came before the procedures spelled out and at the end of a sentence mandating the commission to prevent "unfair competition" in the Senate bill, it can be argued that, by deleting the phrase, the conferees meant that the task of elaborating the statutory standard might be accomplished by means other than adjudication alone.

But it would be a mistake to press these inferences too far. They show only that evidence of clear congressional rejection or approval of substantive rule-making is scanty on both sides and not compelling. The same conclusion applies to the paucity of comments arguably pertaining to the scope of the agency's rule-making power that occurred in the debates in both Houses prior to final passage. As we read the legislative record, including the comments cited to us by both parties, it seems clear to us that the question of promulgating rules to elaborate the statutory standard and then relying on them in subsequent adjudications was a practice that simply failed to preoccupy those engaging in the post-conference debates. The Senate debates were brief, largely focusing on the question whether the conference committee had made any serious changes in the Senate-passed bill. The floor managers, perhaps seeking to speed passage, argued that only two changes of any moment were made: first, altering the statutory standard from "unfair competition" to "unfair methods of competition," which was said by Senator Cummins of Iowa, a leading proponent of the bill and a member of the conference, to make no difference in the scope of the commission's authority; and second, expanding the scope of judicial review of agency orders from that contemplated in the Senate bill. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) at 14768. While such comments would obviously cut against the Commission's claim here, it is clear that the Senators did not entirely agree on this limited characterization of the conference's work. Indeed, Senator Thomas of Colorado argued that it "in many respects is an entirely new bill." Ibid. And one early commentator, a lawyer for the National Association of Manufacturers, suggested that Section 6(g) might well be viewed as a mandate for broad rule-making authority, commenting that while he felt the commission lacked power to "draft a code" of business behavior, there was a "prevalent notion to the contrary." J. Emery, A Handbook of the Federal Trade Commission Act (pamphlet, 1915, on file at FTC).

The District Court's opinion and appellees place considerable reliance on a series of comments made on the House floor during the final debate.[18] But we have examined these remarks carefully [707] and must reject the conclusion that they demonstrate a clear intent to preclude substantive rule-making. To us, they seem addressed to the issue whether the commission might have price-fixing power, a proposal that had been offered earlier in the initial House debates on the Covington bill and rejected. In the final debates Congressman Covington, the conference bill's floor manager, described "unfair methods of competition," the statutory standard, as a "vital, elastic principle," and suggested that it would be "expanded" much in the same manner as the law of negligence, fraud, and restraint of trade had been. However, he did not suggest that adjudication alone was the only means by which the commission would do so. See 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) at 14928.

[18] As do those commentators who have concluded that the Act's legislative history does not support an assertion of legislative type rule-making power. See Weston, Deceptive Advertising and the Federal Trade Commission: Decline of Caveat Emptor, 24 Fed.B.J. 548, 570 (1964); Shapiro, The Choice of Rulemaking or Adjudication in the Development of Administrative Policy, 78 Harv.L.Rev. 921, 960 (1965); Burrus & Teter, Antitrust: Rulemaking v. Adjudication in the FTC, 54 Geo.L.J. 1106, 1125 (1966); Robinson, The Making of Administrative Policy: Another Look at Rulemaking and Adjudication and Administrative Procedure Reform, 118 U.Pa.L.Rev. 485, 490 (1970). One commentator who endorses the FTC's claim finds the legislative history considerably more ambiguous. See Wegman, Cigarettes and Health: A Legal Analysis, 51 Corn.L.Q. 678, 742–746 (1966). See also Note, FTC Substantive Rulemaking: An Evaluation of Past Practice and Proposed Legislation, 48 N.Y.U.L.Rev. 135, 139–142 (1973).

But appellees argue that his subsequent comments demonstrate that this is clearly what he meant. True, in discussing the scope of judicial review of the commission's orders, he carefully differentiated the FTC's power to issue cease and desist orders from the ICC's power to order new railroad rates, suggesting that limited judicial review was appropriate in the latter case, but not in the former, since it was unquestioned at the time that the ICC, in prescribing rates, was performing an essentially "legislative" task, with immediate effect, while the FTC's essentially prohibitive orders followed adjudicatory proceedings and thus warranted more stringent review. In a quote relied upon by appellees, he went on to say:

> The Federal trade commission will have no power to prescribe the methods of competition to be used in future. In issuing its orders it will not be exercising power of a legislative nature. The basis, therefore, upon which the validity of the 'narrow' court review provided by the Hepburn Act rests will be lacking.
> The function of the Federal trade commission will be to determine whether an existing method of competition is unfair, and, if it finds it to be unfair, to order the discontinuance of its use. In doing this it will exercise power of a judicial nature. Under the Constitution power to act finally in a judicial capacity can be conferred only upon a court. * * *

Id at 14932.

We do not believe this quote forecloses the Commission's claim here. For the power to frame substantive rules, in the context of the FTC, is hardly tantamount to the ICC's power to issue orders specifying the prices railroads must thereafter charge. The rules the FTC proposes to issue are not ICC-type orders operating immediately on a designated class of parties at all. They are merely norms which, in the absence of agency-brought proceedings to enforce them, have no legal effect whatever. This is not even a case where the rule alone is determinative of a business' rights without more, as in United States v. Storer Broadcasting Co., 351 U.S. 192, 76 S.Ct. 763, 100 L.Ed. 108 (1956), where applicability of the rule meant that rights to a hearing on additional television licenses might well be cut off. Nor is this a case where a party is penalized in the event he loses at either the FTC or the appellate review level. At this point he may comply and avoid further liability. In other words, there is ample opportunity to test the rule in advance of penalty proceedings. Compare Oklahoma Operating Co. v. Love, 252 U.S. 331, 40 S.Ct. 338, 64 L.Ed. 596 (1920); Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714 (1908). Here, the practical efficacy of the rule depends on further Commission action through a complaint, hearing, findings, and order, and then judicial review. Thus, while the kind of rules the FTC may issue may properly be denominated "legislative" in the sense that once they are approved by reviewing courts they [708] state binding propositions of law, they are not exercises of "power of a legislative nature" in the ICC sense in which Congressman Covington was plainly speaking.

This view of Congressman Covington's remarks is buttressed by a reading of one of the cases on which he relied to rebut arguments that the grant of power to the commission to enforce and elaborate the standard of illegality was an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. United States v. Grimaud, 220 U.S. 506, 31 S.Ct. 480, 55 L.Ed. 563 (1911), upheld a criminal prosecution for a violation of regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture under the Forest Reserve Act. Entrusted with the duty under the statute of safeguarding the public forest reserves, the Secretary was empowered by the statute to make regulations controlling access to the reserves and activities carried on in them, violations of which were to be criminally punishable. Although the power to declare what amounted to substantive criminal law was plainly unusual, the Supreme Court upheld the regulations, pointedly arguing that they were to be considered "administrative" rather than "legislative" and thus lawful:

> That "Congress cannot delegate legislative power [to the President] is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution." Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649, 692 [12 S.Ct. 495, 36 L.Ed. 294, 309] But the authority to make administrative rules is not a delegation of legislative power, nor are such rules raised from an administrative to a legislative character because the violation thereof is punished as a public offense.
> The Secretary of Agriculture could not make rules and regulations for any and every purpose. * * * [A]ll relate to matters clearly indicated and authorized by Congress. The subjects as to which the Secretary can regulate are defined. * * *

220 U.S. at 521–522, 31 S.Ct. at 484–485. See also Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U.S. 364, 385–387, 27 S.Ct. 367, 51 L.Ed. 523 (1907) (upholding authorization to Secretary of War to order bridge improvements under the 1899 Rivers and Harbors Act and criminal prosecution for refusal to obey his order). These cases, on which Covington relied in his discussion distinguishing the FTC from the ICC, see 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) at 14932–14933, indicate clearly that, to the extent the FTC might have rule-making power, a specific question to which he did not address himself, this power would certainly be categorized in the parlance of the time as "administrative" rather than "legislative," a rubric whose meaning at the time was confined to the rate-making function. See Prentis v. Atlantic Coast Line Co., 211 U.S. 210, 226–227, 29 S.Ct. 67, 53 L.Ed. 15 (1908), another case noted in Covington's discussion. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) at 14932–14933. Thus we believe we are on solid ground in concluding that Covington's remarks, when understood in light of the legal assumptions that clearly bound him, should not be read as either an implicit or an explicit denial of the kind of substantive rule-making power at issue before us.

Appellees also rely heavily on a colloquy between Congressman Sherley of Kentucky and Congressman Stevens of Minnesota, reprinted in the footnote below.[19]

[19] Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. * * * The Supreme Court has held that the Interstate Commerce Commission does exercise the right of determining whether a rate in existence is unreasonable or unjust. That is a quasi-judicial act and the decision of the commission on that point is reviewable by the courts, because it is a review of a legal decision upon a given state of facts. But when the commission goes further and decides what must be a reasonable rate or practice for the future, of course that is a legislative act which must not and can not be reviewed by the courts any more than could an act of Congress be so reviewed. There is that distinction, and we have carried that distinction into this bill. Whenever the trade commission decides that a certain act is an act of unfair method of competition, the decision on that point as a question of law is, and ought to be, reviewable by the courts. The facts themselves are found by the commission. Its finding as to the facts is conclusive. Its opinion as to whether that state of facts constitutes an act violating the law is its

Their discussion seems most accurately interpreted much as we have interpreted Congressman Covington's. In both cases the reference point of comparison was the ICC's power to issue affirmative orders specifying future rates. [709] As we said earlier, substantive rules of the kind at issue here are not to be compared with definitely binding ICC rate orders. They are merely preliminary guidelines for business behavior on the basis of which, after the facts are found and no basis for waiver is established, the Commission may issue prohibitory cease and desist orders. While it is true that the Administrative Procedure Act today lumps together the kinds of rules the FTC proposes to issue and "the approval or prescription for the future of rates" under the denomination "rule," 5 U.S.C. § 551 (4) (1970), it is clear that the understanding of those who focused on the question in 1914 saw a clear distinction between them. Thus we decline to conclude that the clear references in the final House floor debate to the ICC's rate-making power should be extrapolated to cover the issuance of substantive rules enforceable only in agency adjudication. The utterly unhelpful quality of the floor comments is underscored by Congressman Stevens' remarks. If one ignores the "legislative"—"administrative" technical distinction which influenced Covington and utilizes a more practical, broader conception of "legislative" type activity prevalent today, they can be read to support substantive rule-making of the kind asserted by the agency:

> This measure, for the first time in this country, attempts an administrative regulation of commerce itself. We have regulated the instrumentalities such as transportation and finance, but here we attempt to rule and help commerce. An executive alone with power of enforcement merely, or even a wise discretion, could not do it. The courts under their ruling could not wisely and liberally accomplish the needed results. The legislative branch can only prescribe rules for the future. It requires a combination of all those powers in one organization, with the highest obtainable talent well and thoroughly to work out the difficult problems which will be met. Because it is in a sense permanent and without partisanship, and can lay down a policy which can be pursued or changed as may be wise and necessary, without the charge of personal or political advantage, must this important commission perform such work.

51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) at 14939. (Emphasis added.)

Thus the history of the pertinent 1914 debates leaves us with a few affirmative indications that Section 6(g) encompassed substantive rule-making and a few cryptic indications that this is not so. As a consequence, the need to rely on the section's language is obvious.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the Federal trade commission differs from the Interstate Commerce Commission in that it has no affirmative power to say what shall be done in the future?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. In other words, it exercises in no sense a legislative function such as is exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. The gentleman is entirely right. We desired clearly to exclude that authority from the power of the commission. We did not know as we could grant it anyway. But the time has not arrived to consider or discuss such a question. 51 Cong.Rec. (Part 15) 14938 (1914).

Civ. A. No. 73-640. F.T.C. Docket 8865

(United States District Court, Northern District of Alabama, Southern Division, July 9, 1973)

Before POINTER, District Judge.

ORDER ON MOTION TO STAY

This cause came on to be heard at 3:00 p.m. on July 9, 1973, on plaintiffs' motion for stay of an order issued in Federal Trade Commission v. Foucha, C.A. 72–1060 on March 16, 1973, requiring plaintiffs to comply with subpoenas returnable before the Federal Trade Commission on July 10, 1973. The cause of action in which this motion is made is under F.R.C.P. 60(b) and is in the nature of a proceeding in equity collateral to C.A. 72–1060. Upon due consideration of the complaint, the motion and the memorandums and arguments of counsel, the court concludes that there is no adequate basis shown for the relief sought for that there is no strong showing that the plaintiffs will likely succeed on the merits of their case. The court is of the opinion that there are three alternative barriers to plaintiffs' success on the merits, any one of which makes the granting of this motion improper:

(1) The cause of action stated is improperly brought under the F.R.C.P. 60(b) in that it fails to meet the criteria set out in that rule.

(2) The statutes on which plaintiffs rely to show that governmental immunity was not properly given in this case, 5 U.S.C. §§ 3346–3348, which limit certain temporary authority to 30 days, do not apply to the filling of a vacancy in an Assistant Attorney General's office in that he is not an "officer of a bureau of an Executive department."

(3) The Attorney General has been given authority to delegate his power to grant immunity under 18 U.S.C. § 6004 by 28 U.S.C. § 510 and under such authority need not have delegated the power to an Assistant Attorney General but might have delegated it to a Deputy Assistant Attorney General who need not have presidential appointment and senatorial approval. The chain of delegation set up by regulations promulgated by the Attorney General is not dependent on the officer's being appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and therefore the 30-day limitation in 5 U.S.C. § 3348 does not affect authority delegated through this chain.

Based on these conclusions, it is ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED that plaintiffs' motion for stay be, and the same hereby is denied.

SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS, INC., ET AL. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION*

No. 73-1037 F.T.C. Docket 8825

(United States Court of Appeals, First Circuit, July 23, 1973)

1. PETITIONERS WERE NOT DEPRIVED OF DUE PROCESS RIGHT TO BE INFORMED OF CHARGES, WHERE SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE IN RECORD AS A WHOLE JUSTIFIED F.T.C.'S TREATMENT OF PETITIONERS AS SINGLE ECONOMIC ENTITY.

[1171] Where substantial evidence in the record as a whole justified Federal Trade Commission's treatment of petitioners as a single economic entity and there was no indication in the record that form of complaint for unfair and deceptive practices precluded petitioners from understanding the charges or from preparing and presenting their defense, petitioners were not deprived of their due process right to be informed of the charges against them on claim that complaint, in spite of their individual identities, treated all of them as a single economic entity and failed to specify which was allegedly responsible for each of the alleged violations.

2. F.T.C.'S FINDING THAT ALL SHIPMENTS FOLLOWING THE INITIAL ONE CONSTITUTED UNORDERED MERCHANDISE WAS PROPER.

Based upon conclusion that ambiguous language of order coupons did not place customers on notice that they had ordered additional consignments, Federal Trade Commission's finding that all shipments following the initial one constituted unordered merchandise was proper in view of youthful and often inexperienced nature of the clientele and testimony of several dealers that they thought they were ordering a single shipment.

3. USE OF FICTITIOUS COLLECTION AGENCY TO COERCE PAYMENT IS AN UNFAIR AND DECEPTIVE PRACTICE.

Use of what is in effect a fictitious collection agency to coerce payment is an unfair and deceptive practice prohibited by provision of Federal Trade Commission Act.

4. F.T.C.'S FINDING AS TO FALSE REPRESENTATION THAT DELINQUENT ACCOUNTS WERE TRANSFERRED TO BONA FIDE INDEPENDENT COLLECTION AGENCY HAD SUBSTANTIAL RECORD SUPPORT.

[1172] Federal Trade Commission's finding as to false representation that delinquent accounts were transferred to bona fide independent collection agency had substantial record support, and mere fact that collection agency was separately incorporated and duly licensed as a collection agency under the laws of Massachusetts could not in the light of the evidence of its absolute domination, justify a different result.

*Reported in 481 F.2d 1171 (1973). For case before the Commission, see 81 F.T.C. 836

5. FINDING OF FAILURE TO OFFER REFUNDS FOR NONDELIVERY OF GOODS AS ORDERED WAS BASED ON UNDISPUTED EVIDENCE.

Finding of failure to offer refunds for nondelivery of goods as ordered was based upon undisputed evidence, and conclusion that caveat did not adequately apprise consumers of their rights regarding non-conforming merchandise was clearly within discretion of Federal Trade Commission.

6. F.T.C.'S CONCLUSION THAT CLAIM REPRESENTING "FREE" IMPRINTING OF NAME ON CARDS WAS MISLEADING WAS SUPPORTED BY RECORD AS A WHOLE.

Federal Trade Commission's conclusion, that representation that purchasers' names were imprinted "free" on cards they ordered was misleading, was supported by record as a whole.

7. IN FORMULATING REMEDIAL ORDERS, F.T.C. IS VESTED WITH BROAD DISCRETION.

Federal Trade Commission is vested with broad discretion in formulating remedial orders and, only where no reasonable relation between remedy selected and violations found exists, will an order be set aside.

8. F.T.C. DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION IN ISSUING AN ORDER RUNNING AGAINST ALL OF THE PETITIONERS UPON FINDING THAT THEY OPERATED AS A SINGLE ECONOMIC ENTITY.

In light of finding that petitioners operated as a single economic entity, Federal Trade Commission did not abuse its discretion on complaint for unfair and deceptive practices in issuing an order running against all of them, and inclusion of individual petitioner, a stockholder, officer and director of the corporation, was also appropriate and terms of order were sufficiently clear and appropriate to warrant enforcement.

On petition to review, court held that petitioners were not deprived of their due process rights, that F.T.C.'s findings were proper and that Commission's order was not erroneous or overbroad.

Petition to review denied and order enforced.

Edward J. Barry, Springfield, Mass., with whom Robinson, Donovan, Madden & Barry, Springfield, Mass., was on brief, for petitioners.

Vincent Tricarico, Atty., Federal Trade Commission, with whom Ronald M. Dietrich, Gen. Counsel, Harold D. Rhynedance, Jr., Asst. Gen. Counsel, and Miles J. Brown, Atty., Washington, D.C., were on brief, for respondent.

Before COFFIN, Chief Judge, MCENTEE and CAMPBELL, Circuit Judges.

MCENTEE, Circuit Judge.

This is a petition to review a cease and desist order issued by the Federal Trade Commission against Sunshine Art Studios, Inc. (Sunshine), Junior Sales Club of America, Inc. (J.S.C.), Sales Leadership Club, Inc. (S.L.C.), Guardian Collection Agency, Inc. (Guardian), and Ryland E. Robbins, as an individual and officer of these corporations. Three of the four corporate petitioners, Sunshine, J.S.C., and S.L.C., are engaged in the mail-order business of selling greeting cards to wholesalers, groups, and individuals, primarily housewives and children, on a national basis. Guardian acts as a collection agency for Sunshine and J.S.C. All four corporations are owned and controlled by the Robbins family and Ryland E. Robbins is described as the "general manager of the entire operation." Following an administrative hearing and review, the Commission found that petitioners had engaged in the following unfair and deceptive practices in violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1) (1970): (a) Sunshine sent out and attempted to obtain payment for unordered merchandise; (b) Sunshine and J.S.C. falsely represented that delinquent accounts were transferred to a [1173] bona fide independent collection agency; (c) S.L.C. failed to offer refunds for its non-delivery of merchandise as ordered; and (d) S.L.C. falsely represented that imprinting names of purchasers on cards was provided free of charge. In the instant proceeding petitioners challenge the validity of the Commission's complaint, the sufficiency of its proof, and the scope of its order.

[1] Turning first to the question of the validity of the pleadings, petitioners argue that they have been deprived of their due process right to be informed of the charges against them because the complaint, in spite to their individual identities, treats all of them as a single economic entity and fails to specify which is allegedly responsible for each of the alleged violations. This contention is not persuasive for at least two reasons. In the first place, substantial evidence in the record as a whole justifies the Commission's treatment of petitioners as a single economic entity. The record indicates, for example, that almost all of the officers and boards of directors of the corporate petitioners are identical, that corporate formalities are not observed, and that dealings between the various corporate petitioners are not conducted at arm's length.[1] Second, there is no indication in the record that the form of the complaint precluded petitioners from understanding the charges or from preparing and presenting their defense.

[1] By way of further example, the record shows that director and shareholder meetings were infrequently held and that corporate minutes were never kept; that individuals who were nominally employed by one corporation often performed work for others; that all employees were paid from a single consolidated account; that supplies were ordered on a consolidated basis; that Sunshine's trademark appeared on the back of J.S.C. and S.L.C. cards; that Sunshine paid the utilities and maintained separate general ledgers for the other corporations; and that all were located in the same building, used the same address, and were served by the same switchboard.

Since the complaint specifies in at least five instances which petitioner was involved with a particular charge and since evidence concerning all of the charges was presented during the Commission's case in chief, petitioners were unquestionably fully appraised of the nature and details of each allegation. See Golden Grain Macaroni v. FTC, 472 F.2d 882, 885–86 (7th Cir. 1972) and cases cited. Under these circumstances, no constitutional privation occurred.

[2] Petitioners' challenges to the Commission's unfair trade practice findings are similarly unavailing. First, the finding that Sunshine shipped unordered merchandise and made improper attempts to collect payment for these shipments is based upon undisputed evidence. Following receipt of one of its order coupons, Sunshine regularly sent shipments in addition to the initial selection of cards to the consumer. Based upon its conclusion that the ambiguous language of the order coupons did not place customers on notice that they had ordered these additional consignments,[2] the Commission held that all shipments following the initial one constituted unordered merchandise. In light of the youthful and often inexperienced nature of Sunshine's clientele and the testimony of several Sunshine dealers that they "thought they were ordering a single shipment and did not understand that they were committing themselves to re[1174]ceive successive shipments and to return or pay for them," this conclusion is unimpeachable. Cf. Independent Directory Corp. v. FTC, 188 F.2d 468 (2d Cir. 1951). Moreover, given the propriety of this holding, Sunshine's rejoinder that subsequent shipments were made pursuant to valid agreements which arose from the purchaser's submission of these order coupons is clearly wide of the mark.

[3, 4] The Commission's finding regarding Sunshine's and J.S.C.'s use of Guardian to pursue allegedly delinquent accounts also has substantial record support. While the letters sent out on Guardian stationery clearly created the impression that it was an independent collection agency, in point of fact Guardian had no employees of its own and was wholly owned, staffed, and controlled by Sunshine. Guardian's letters also intimated that if the amount due was not forthcoming, legal proceedings would be initiated. As is clear from the

[2] Prior to December 1968 the typical coupon in use stated:

"Rush my Free 'Nationally Famous' Christmas Card Assortment, Free Christmas Card Catalog, Free Personalized Card Album, and box assortments on approval."

After December 1968 the coupons were revised so that they typically read:

"I want to join the unbeatables. Please send me Free Pendant, Free Catalogue, Sales Kit and All-Occasion Sample Boxes on approval. Also other seasonal samples on approval, as they are available."

The Commission found the last clause and last sentence of these two forms, which petitioners relied upon to justify sending shipments in addition to the initial one, to be ambiguous.

record, however, no such action was ever taken. Since it is settled that the use of what is in effect a fictitious collection agency to coerce payment is an unfair and deceptive practice prohibited by § 5 of the Act, see Wm. H. Wise Company v. FTC, 101 U.S.App.D.C. 15, 246 F.2d 702 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied 355 U.S. 856, 78 S.Ct. 84, 2 L.Ed.2d 64 (1957), the appropriateness of the Commission's finding on this question is clear. The mere fact that Guardian is separately incorporated and duly licensed as a collection agency under the laws of Massachusetts cannot, in light of the evidence of its absolute domination, justify a different result.

[5] The Commission's further finding that S.L.C. failed to offer refunds for the non-delivery of goods are as ordered is also based upon undisputed evidence. In 1969, finding that it was unable to fulfill all of its orders for name imprinted cards, S.L.C. used nonimprinted shipments to fill between 15,000 and 30,000 orders. Rather than explicitly informing purchasers of their right to refuse these cards and to obtain a refund, however, S.L.C. urged customers to give these cards a personal touch by signing them and went on to state:

> we want to emphasize that we are sincere in our willingness to stand behind our guarantee to give you complete satisfaction.

The Commission's conclusion that this caveat did not adequately apprise consumers of their rights regarding this nonconforming merchandise was clearly within its discretion and seems appropriate. See Double Eagle Lubricants, Incorporated v. FTC, 360 F.2d 268, 270 (10th Cir. 1965). Moreover, petitioners' contention that those individuals who accepted these cards and did not seek refunds were not deceived by this statement is refuted by the testimony of three purchasers that neither they nor a substantial number of their customers understood that S.L.C. was offering to refund their money.

[6] Finally, the Commission's conclusion that S.L.C.'s representation that purchasers' names were imprinted "free" on the cards they ordered was misleading is also supported by the record as a whole. As is clear from S.L.C.'s sundry promotional materials, no real effort was made to merchandise nonimprinted cards. Rather, every advertisement and piece of promotional literature stressed the sale of imprinted cards and that this service would be rendered without charge. Additionally it is undisputed that S.L.C. always sold both imprinted and nonimprinted cards for the same price and never established a separate price for the nonimprinted variety. Under these circumstances, it seems clear that the Commission was justified in concluding that customers who bought nonimprinted cards received merchandise of a lesser value and that S.L.C. was not rendering the imprinting service free of charge but rather was marketing cards at a price which included the cost of adding this feature. Since similar misleading uses of the word "free" have been held to be violative of § 5 of the Act, see FTC v. Mary Carter Paint Co., 382 U.S. 46, 86 [1175] S.Ct. 219, 15 L.Ed.2d 128 (1972); FTC v. Standard Education Society, 302 U.S. 112, 115–117, 58 S.Ct. 113, 82 L.Ed 141 (1937), this finding may stand.

[7, 8] Petitioners' final contention is that the Commission's order is erroneous and overbroad because it prohibits each of them from engaging in conduct which only one of them may have performed, because it includes within its coverage the individual petitioner Robbins, and because it is cast in either vague or expansive language. As an initial matter, we note that the Commission is vested with broad discretion in formulating remedial orders. See FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 392, 85 S.Ct. 1035, 13 L.Ed.2d 904 (1965). Only where no reasonable relation between the remedy selected and the violations found exists will an order be set aside. See Jacob Siegel Co. v. FTC, 327 U.S. 608, 613, 66 S.Ct. 758, 90 L.Ed. 888 (1946). Mindful of these guidelines, we conclude, particularly in light of the finding that petitioners operate as a single economic entity, that the Commission did not abuse its discretion in issuing an order running against all of them. See, e.g., Delaware Watch Co. v. FTC, 332 F.2d 745 (2d Cir. 1964). The inclusion of Robbins was also appropriate given the hearing examiner's finding that as a stockholder, officer, and director, he was "deeply involved in the important business affairs of all the corporate [petitioners]." Finally, the wording of the order gives us little pause. Other than to note that paragraphs 6 and 8 [3] will not prohibit petitioners from engaging in lawful collection activities in the future, because, should they begin referring their delinquent accounts to an independent collection agency or to an attorney, a petition to amend or modify the order to reflect these changes would lie under 16 CFR § 3.72(b) (1973), we find the terms of the order to be sufficiently clear and appropriate to warrant enforcement.

The petition to review is denied and the order may be enforced.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. This Court is bound in this matter by Virginia Petroleum Jobbers Association v. F.P.C., 104 U.S. App. D.C. 106, 259 F.2d 921 (1958) which requires, before an injunction be issued staying administrative action, the following conditions be met: the petitioner indicates it is likely to prevail on the merits, that without a stay it will suffer irreparable harm, there will be no substantial harm to other persons and the public interest will not be harmed.

2. Plaintiffs herein have failed to meet a single condition established by Virginia Petroleum Jobbers, supra.

3. Plaintiffs are not entitled to a preliminary injunction.

ORDER

This matter having come before the Court on August 16, 1973 for hearing on the motion of plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction; upon consideration of the complaint; the motion of plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction; the memoranda of points and authorities and exhibits in support thereof and in opposition thereto; the arguments of counsel and upon the basis of the Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law filed herewith, it is by the Court this 24th day of August, 1973.

Ordered that the motion of plaintiffs for a preliminary injunction be, and the same is hereby, denied.

GENERAL FOODS CORP. v. F.T.C.*

Civ. A. A. No. K–1–73–CA. F.T.C. Docket 8883

(United States District Court, Western District of Michigan, Southern Division, August 31, 1973)

In an action for declaratory and injunctive relief in a collateral action, court held that it lacked jurisdiction over the subject matter. In so ruling, the court took the unusual step (and "not normally desirable practice") of expressly adopting by reference sixteen pages of the legal memorandum supporting the Commission's motion to dismiss.

Before ENGEL, District Judge.

OPINION AND ORDER

This matter has come on to be heard upon the motion of the defendant Federal Trade Commission to dismiss the action on the grounds that the court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter and for the further grounds that the complaint filed herein fails to state a claim on which relief can be granted.

The court has reviewed the entire file and all of the records submitted at the time of hearing, it being understood that the matter might be decided upon the merits in the event the court's ruling on defendant's motion was not dispositive of the case.

*Not otherwise reported. See also, p. 571 herein.

Upon careful consideration the court is of the opinion that the defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that the court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter is well taken. While recognizing that it is not normally a desirable practice, in the interests of time, and because it fairly and accurately describes both the facts and the issues before the court and their proper resolution, the court adopts by reference so much of the memorandum of the points and authorities filed by the defendant on February 5, 1973, being docket entry No. 6 in the file and records of this case as pertains to the defendant's motion to dismiss, that is, the first sixteen pages of the memorandum. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is unnecessary for the court to determine whether or not plaintiff's complaint, as claimed by the motion, fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted.

The court, in reaching the decision, has placed particular reliance upon Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, 303 U.S. 41 (1938), FCC v. Schreiber, 381 U.S. 279 (1965).

Accordingly, plaintiff's complaint herein is DISMISSED.

It is so ordered.

PUROLATOR PRODUCTS, INC. v. F.T.C.*

No. 14,704 F.T.C. Docket 7850

(United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, September 11, 1973)

In an action requesting the court to construe an FTC cease and desist order, court held that it lacked jurisdiction and dismissed plaintiff's motion. The court further dismissed Commission's petition for an order requiring plaintiff to report its compliance with the cease and desist order. Petitions dismissed.

Before FAIRCHILD, PELL, JR., and STEVENS, Circuit Judges.

ORDER

This case has been currently brought before the court on the motion of Purolator Products, Inc. (Purolator), seeking to have this court construe its earlier decree enforcing a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) and further to construe the cease and desist order itself. Prior to any ruling on the motion, the court has also been presented the following additional motions:

(a) Motion of Purolator for stay pending review; and

*Not otherwise reported. For case before the Commission, see 65 F.T.C. 8; aff'd: 352 F.2d 874 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied: 389 U.S. 1045 (1968); 7 S&D 1364.

(b) Petition of FTC for an order requiring Purolator to report its compliance with the court's decree of enforcement.

In Purolator Products, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 352 F.2d 874 (7th Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 389 U.S. (1968), this court affirmed and ordered enforced a cease and desist order of the FTC following administrative proceedings upon a complaint charging Purolator with violating Section 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a), price discrimination under the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526 (1936). The proceedings before the FTC and the opinion of this court enforcing the order dealt with Purolator's pricing in distributing replacement filters manufactured by it. That pricing system was found to be unacceptable under the statute.

However, in addition to denying that its pricing structure violated the Act, Purolator also contended that the Commission's order was too broad, vague and indefinite. Admittedly, the order paraphrases § 2(a) in that Purolator was ordered to cease and desist from:

> Discriminating, directly or indirectly, in the price of such products of like grade and quality: By selling to any direct or indirect purchaser at net prices higher than the net prices charged to any other purchaser, direct or indirect, who in fact competes with the purchaser paying the higher price in the resale and distribution of respondent's replacement filters.

This court rejected Purolator's contention that the order should be narrowed to the specific practice and price system found to be illegal. Noting that the order was quite similar to that upheld in Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470 (1952), Chief Judge Hastings speaking for the court quoted from E. Edelmann & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 239 F.2d 152, 156 (7th Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 941 (1958):

> The order encompasses only the specific means by which petitioner has discriminated in the past and is broad enough to prohibit variances which would accomplish the same result. The Commission is not required to confine its order to the narrow area transgressed by petitioner, it must be permitted sufficient leeway so that its order may not be reduced to a nullity by technical, but not actual, compliance.

Subsequent to the denial of certiorari in the case, Purolator filed a compliance report with the Compliance Division of the Commission's Bureau of Restraint of Trade. In the correspondence that followed it became clear that Purolator was manufacturing private-brand filters for various major oil companies and automobile manufacturers. These filters were sold at a price below that which Purolator charged its warehouse distributors for the purchase of its own advertised name-brand Purolator filters. The FTC took the position that this sort of price discrimination was potentially within the ambit of those activities forbidden under the cease and desist order. It, therefore, requested information relating to those private brand sales. Purolator, on the other hand, insisted that the order "could not be construed to apply to price differentials between Purolator brand and private-brand filters, since that subject would be completely foreign to anything dealt with in the complaint, hearings and findings." Purolator, according to the FTC has failed to supply the information requested. The FTC accordingly has rejected the compliance report.

In the light of this controversy and Purolator's desire not to be subject either to a contempt proceeding in this court or to a civil penalty suit, Purolator filed its motion to construe the prior opinion of this court. The FTC opposes the motion on the ground that there is no appropriate ground for the exercise of jurisdiction by this court.

Initially, we note that, insofar as the scope of the order is concerned, we decline any invitation in Purolator's motion and brief to change "the law of the case" and hold that the order originally entered by the FTC was overly broad. That issue was litigated to finality and is not subject to our review on this proceeding. We have not purported to review this issue but have merely adhered to the doctrine of res judicata. We are, thus, left with the question of whether or not we can or should participate in these preliminary joustings between Purolator and the FTC in the compliance proceedings.

Similar petitions have been rejected by other circuits. In Rettinger v. Federal Trade Commission, 392 F.2d 454 (2d Cir. 1968), the petitioner contended that the FTC had changed its interpretation of what constituted compliance with a prior consent order and that such a change constituted a reopening of prior proceedings before the Commission providing jurisdiction for review in the Court of Appeals. The court rejected the plea holding that the Commission's change of interpretation could not be characterized as a reopening under Section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(b). The court also rejected the ancillary claim that review was appropriate under the Administrative Procedure Act, holding that the APA did not contemplate review from the court of appeals in the first instance. Accordingly, the court dismissed the petition for review for lack of jurisdiction, without prejudice to the petitioner's seeking relief in the district court. We agree with the reasoning in Rettinger and hold that we have no jurisdiction under 15 U.S.C. § 45(b) to review the Commission's action at this time. Nor do we think, as Purolator has contended, that the APA is applicable as a jurisdictional basis for initial review in this court.

But even in the broader case in which the FTC's construction of a cease and desist order has not been changed, we would agree with the Fourth Circuit that the courts of appeals lack initial jurisdiction to entertain petitions for what amounts to intervention in incomplete compliance proceedings. The present proceedings have evolved almost no factual basis for decision. Robertson v. Federal Trade Commission, 415 F.2d 49 (7th Cir. 1969). Section 5 of the Act provides no such authority.

Moreover, in Red & White Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission, No. 15545 (7th Cir., filed April 12, 1966), this court was presented with a petition for an order clarifying and construing the final decree of this court, to review and set aside the ruling of the Federal Trade Commission. The case arose from Modern Marketing Service, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 149 F.2d 970 (7th Cir. 1945), where, as in the initial Purolator case, the court denied the petition to set aside and vacate the Commission's cease and desist order and granted the cross-petition for enforcement of an order concerning violations of the Robinson-Patman Act. When, some 20 years later, Red & White Corporation, a party to the original action, petitioned for an order construing the court's opinion, the petition was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Purolator attempts to distinguish this case on the ground that Red & White was asking the court to review an advisory opinion of the FTC relative to proposed future conduct. But the nature of the case makes it applicable here since it arose from the FTC's interpretation of its own cease and desist order, most likely under 16 CFR § 3.26, now 16 CFR § 3.61 (d) & (e). Red & White was in a position virtually indistinguishable from Purolator's since if it acted in a manner contrary to the advisory opinion, it would almost certainly subject itself to suit or contempt proceedings. We think that the lack of jurisdiction apparent to the court in Red & White is equally clear in the present case.

We also reject Purolator's contention that Circuit Rule 28, relating to the use as precedent of unpublished orders, has any impact on the validity of Red & White. Circuit Rule 28 was prospective only and has no effect on the use of orders handed down by this court prior to its effective date.

Purolator, in its reply brief relies heavily on Floersheim v. Weinberger, 346 F. Supp. 950 (D.D.C. 1972). In that case, the FTC had rejected the compliance report of Floersheim and had also given an advisory opinion under 16 CFR § 3.61(e) that the new forms there involved violated the cease and desist order. The court found that it had jurisdiction under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 704, to review the rejection of the compliance report, but not the advisory opinion. The court in dicta indicated that it felt that the preferable course for review of a rejection of a compliance report was in "the jurisdiction which originally reviewed the cease and desist order," i.e., the court of appeals. 346 F. Supp. at 956. However, despite the view expressed in the obiter it was the district court which proceeded to review the merits of the rejection and rule in favor of the FTC. Also, the district court's dicta makes no reference to the contrary views expressed in Rettinger v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, and Robertson v. Federal Trade Commission, supra.

But most significantly we feel that the reasoning of the Floersheim opinion itself would lead to the result of denying review in the present case. The court in that case held that the rejection of the compliance report constituted final agency action not subject to any other adequate review, thus allowing review under 5 U.S.C. § 704. It distinguished the advisory opinion issued pursuant to 16 CFR § 3.61(c) on the basis that "[i]t would be improper for this court to review advisory opinions in such a context [where there had been neither hearings nor more than written submissions of record] for it would be compelled to undertake the exhaustive efforts reserved for administrative energies and expertise." 346 F. Supp. at 956. In the present case, Purolator's compliance report was not rejected on its merits. The FTC asked for more information on which it could then make a decision as to whether the pricing policy violated the cease and desist order. At most, we have in the record before us some unsworn letters and an affidavit. Thus, even if we had some way to assert jurisdiction in the present petition, which has not been shown to us, we would still hold that the matter is not "ripe." We feel that the present case is closer to the type described in Toilet Goods Association, Inc. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158 (1967), than to Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136 (1967). As in Toilet Goods Association, although the rejection of the compliance report may be "final," it is unclear exactly how or if the FTC will act on its rejection of the compliance report. The specific factual situation is as yet undeveloped. The lack of a factual record is particularly troublesome for this court since we are ill-equipped to hear evidence as to the nature of the practice which the FTC seeks to investigate.

Purolator also relies on the inherent power of a court of equity to modify its own decrees. American Chain & Cable Co., Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 142 F. 2d 909, 912–13 (4th Cir. 1944); Century Metalcraft Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 112 F. 2d 443, 446–47 (7th Cir. 1940); Indiana Quartered Oak Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 58 F. 2d 182, 184 (2d Cir. 1932). All three cases dealt with the discretionary power of a court to modify its decree upon a showing of changed circumstances. Purolator has shown no such change. Rather the case is closer, factually, to Rettinger, supra, in which the Second Circuit said that the change in the FTC's interpretation of a cease and desist order was not a modification justifying a new review in the court of appeals. Similarly, the controversy in interpretation is not sufficient, we believe, to invoke our jurisdiction to modify the order enforcing the cease and desist order.

Finally, it seems highly inappropriate for this court to reach out for jurisdiction in these preliminary phases involving compliance with FTC cease and desist orders which have been ordered enforced. The presumptive administrative expertise to which we must show deference would indeed have difficulty in demonstrating its potential if piecemeal interlocutory judicial intervention is permitted. Without saying that circumstances could not exist for such intervention, we do not deem the present case to call for such action.

Purolator understandably is alarmed at the magnitude of possible civil penalties if ultimately it should be determined that its position on the merits of the issue of construction of the original enforced order should prove not to be correct. Every litigant, however, would doubtless be pleased to avoid the perils of litigation by asking for and receiving advisory judicial opinions prior to exposure to the risks of the courts.

The merits of this controversy may ultimately be before this court for decision. They are not here now.

For the reasons given hereinbefore, Purolator's motion to construe the cease and desist order and this court's decree of enforcement is dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.

The Commission's cease and desist order, inter alia, required Purolator to file a written report setting forth in detail the manner and form in which Purolator has complied with the order to cease and desist. This court affirmed and ordered enforced the Commission's order "in all respects." 352 F. 2d 886. Upon denial of certiorari, the Commission's order became final under the statute, 15 U.S.C. § 21(g).

The FTC concedes that it has available enforcement procedures but has requested this court to issue an order requiring Purolator to report its compliance, arguing that "[a]n order from this Court directing Purolator to file a compliance report would completely settle the matter." The matter could not be any more settled than it is without our construing the order which we have declined to do at Purolator's request. Such construction would, we think, be more appropriately made in an enforcement proceeding, testing whether the communications from Purolator to the FTC comply with the Commission's final order.

Accordingly, the FTC's petition for an order requiring respondent to report its compliance with the Commission's final order is dismissed.

PETITIONS DISMISSED.

UNITED STATES v. ITT CONTINENTAL BAKING COMPANY*

Nos. 72-1072, 72-1073. F.T.C. Docket 7880.

(United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, September 24, 1973)

1. Even Though Sales Agreement Did Not Involve Any "Loan," Option Agreement, or Outright Payment, There Was Violation of Commission Order Where First Baking Company and Second Baking Company Entered Into "Sales Agreement" Whereby Second Company Ceased Producing Bread Upon Becoming Distributor of First Company.

[17] Where first baking company and second baking company entered into a "sales agreement" with understanding that second company would cease production of bread upon becoming a distributor of first company, and thereafter second company stopped producing its own bread and began distributing that of first company over same routes, to same customers, and in substantially the same quantities, there was a violation of Federal Trade Commission order directing first company to cease and desist from acquiring bakeries for a ten-year period, even though sales agreement did not involve any "loan," nor option agreement, nor outright payment.

2. Scope of F.T.C. Cease and Desist Order Must Be Construed as Written and Discerned Within its "Four Corners."

Scope of a Federal Trade Commission consent cease and desist order must be discerned within its "four corners," and must be construed as it is written.

3. F.T.C. Cease and Desist Order Did Not Extend to Holding of Assets Acquired Contrary to Order, and Thus Each Violation Was Not a Continuing One Subject to Penalties for Daily Violation.

Federal Trade Commission order directing baking company for a ten-year period to cease and desist from acquiring the whole or any part of stock, share capital, or assets of any concern engaged in production or sale of bread except with permission of the commission did not extend to holding of assets acquired contrary to the order, or to the consequences thereof, and thus each violation was not a continuing one subject to penalties for daily violation.

4. Extent of Penalties Was Within Discretion of Trial Court.

Extent of penalties for violation of Federal Trade Commission consent cease and desist order relating to acquisition of bakeries was within discretion of trial court which had jurisdiction to order divestiture or equitable remedies generally.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, was taken from 485 F.2d 16)

On appeal, court held there was a violation of the F.T.C. order to cease acquiring bakeries for a ten-year period even though sales agreement did not involve any "loan," option agreement, or outright pay-

SETH, Circuit Judge.

[18] This is an appeal from the judgment of the District Court for the District of Colorado in a suit brought by the United States under the Clayton Act [15 U.S.C. § 21(l)], and the Federal Trade Commission Act [15 U.S.C. § 45(l)] against ITT Continental Baking Company. The Government sued to recover civil penalties and for injunctive relief for three asserted violations of a Federal Trade Commission consent cease and desist order relating to the acquisition of bakeries.

The case was tried on a stipulation of facts. The court ruled that two of the three challenged acquisitions were prohibited by the FTC's order, and the third was not. The court ruled also that each prohibited acquisition was a single violation of the order and did not commence a continuing violation. The maximum single penalty of $5,000.00 for each of the two violations was imposed. The court further held that the FTC's order, which had initially been applied to Continental Baking Company was also applicable to ITT Continental Baking Company and that ITT Continental was liable for the penalties. The court did not order ITT Continental to divest itself of the assets acquired in violation of the order, but did order ITT Continental to comply with the terms of the FTC order until that order expired.

The Government appeals from the court's judgment insofar as it held that the third transaction was not an "acquisition" in violation of the FTC order, that each violation was not a continuing one subject to penalties for daily violation, and insofar as the court did not order ITT Continental to divest itself of the three acquisitions. ITT Continental cross-appeals from the judgment, in its entirety, of the district court.

*Sitting by Designation.

In May 1960, the FTC issued a complaint against Continental Baking Company, charging that Continental's acquisition of several baking companies engaged in the production and sale of bread from 1952 through 1958 violated section 7 of the Clayton Act [15 U.S.C. § 18], and section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act [15 U.S.C. § 45]. While the administrative proceedings were still in the hearing stage on this complaint, the parties negotiated a consent cease and desist order. The relevant part of the order provided:

> IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that for a period of ten (10) years from the date of issuance of this order by the Federal Trade Commission respondent shall cease and desist from acquiring, directly or indirectly, through subsidiaries or otherwise, the whole or any part of the stock, share capital, or assets of any concern, corporate or non-corporate, engaged in any state of the United States in the production and sale of bread and bread-type rolls unless the Commission, on petition for modification of this Section III of this order, permits such an acquisition by respondent, said modification to be within the sole and final discretion of the Federal Trade Commission.

This consent order is the basis for this action, and must be construed as to the nature of several transactions asserted by the Government to be in violation of its provisions, and as to the imposition of penalties if a violation has taken place. This should be done in accordance with the standards laid down in United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 91 S.Ct. 1752, 29 L.Ed.2d 256, and in Hughes v. United States, 342 U.S. 353, 72 S.Ct. 306, 96 L.Ed. 394. In the Armour case the Court said, after mentioning the negotiation and reasons for a consent decree:

> For these reasons, the scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it, * * * the instrument must be construed as it is written, and not as it might have been written had the plaintiff established his factual claims and legal theories in litigation.

[19] The consent order here concerned originated in a situation similar to a consent decree, and the reasons exist for application of the method of construction used in Armour. The order here is somewhat different in that it expressly permits or suggests reference to the complaint as an aid in construction. The result reached by the trial court in construing the order is not too restrictive nor unreasonable. It is one which may be arrived at by reference to the complaint, and by use of the method indicated in the Armour case. We will follow such a construction under these circumstances.

To consider the consent order "within its four corners," the wording is directed to the acquisition of businesses engaged in bread making, directly or indirectly. The only reference in the order is to the "acquiring" of such businesses. The complaint refers to the acquisition of bakeries as a course of conduct by Continental Bakeries. The order prohibits acquisition for a ten-year period. It is apparent from the record that it is upon the event of acquisition by the defendant that the local bakery is out of the bread making business. The acquisition itself, and not the method of operation thereafter, is the critical factor, and this is the event or incident to which the complaint and the order were directed.

This consideration of the order leads us to agree with the trial court as to whether the violations found were continuing or not, and also to agree as to the two particular acquisitions found by the trial court to be violations of the order.

As to the violations the record shows that in 1965 Continental and Bon Ton, Inc., of Missoula, Montana, entered into a sales agreement. Bon Ton, Inc. was engaged in the production of bakery products, including bread. These were sold at wholesale over thirteen routes in western Montana. Under the agreement, Bon Ton became an exclusive distributor of bread produced by Continental. Also, in the language of the parties' stipulation of fact, the "* * * understanding was that Bon Ton would cease production of bread * * * before it became a distributor of Continental's bread." On July 10, 1965, Bon Ton stopped producing bread and on the following Monday, began to distribute bread produced by Continental over the same routes and to the same customers as theretofore. On July 12, 1965, Bon Ton's president and owner of the vast majority of its stock deposited in the Bon Ton bakery account a Continental check drawn in his favor in the amount of $37,500.00. ITT Continental has described this amount as a "loan" to enable Bon Ton to meet Continental's credit requirements. However, Bon Ton gave to Continental an option to purchase the distributorship for the same amount. Continental acquired Bon Ton's accounts receivable, route books, customer lists, trademarks, trucks, and all but approximately $1,800.00 of its bank account. At this time, Bon Ton's "president" and its drivers became employees, on a salaried basis, of Continental. In consideration of the transfer Continental cancelled all outstanding invoices for products sold to Bon Ton and also cancelled the $37,500.00 "loan."

In April 1966 Continental and the Wyoming Baking Company entered into a "sales agreement," which was, in all relevant aspects, the same as the agreement entered into between Continental and Bon Ton. The same "understanding" existed as to Wyoming Baking's discontinuance of its own production of bread. In accordance with this "understanding," Wyoming Baking had ceased its own production of bread and began distributing Continental's products over the same routes and to the same customers. The sales agreement also provided that Continental would have an option to purchase the distributorship under certain circumstances. Some disagreement arose and the distributorship was sold, through the assistance of Continental, to another distributor from Idaho. This new ownership lasted about a year, at which time Continental itself acquired [20] the ownership for a cancellation of its debts and $15,000.00.

What is herein considered the third incident concerned the Sheppard Baking Company. This arrangement was not considered by the trial court to be a violation of the order while the above two were held to be in violation.

In August 1966 Continental and Sheppard Baking Company, of Durango, Colorado, entered into a "sales agreement" which was in all relevant aspects, virtually identical to the agreements entered into between Continental, and Bon Ton and Wyoming Baking. Prior to this time Sheppard Baking had been engaged in the production and sale of bakery products, including bread and bread-type rolls, which were sold over routes in southwestern Colorado. As with Bon Ton and Wyoming Baking, the "understanding" between Continental and Sheppard Baking was that Sheppard would cease production of bread upon becoming a Continental distributor. In mid-October 1966, Sheppard stopped producing its own bread and began distributing that of Continental over the same routes, to the same customers, and in substantially the same quantities as it had formerly sold and distributed similar products produced at its own plant prior to that date. However, unlike the transactions concerning Bon Ton and Wyoming Baking, the sales agreement between Continental and Sheppard Baking did not involve any "loan," nor option agreement, nor an outright payment. The following specific covenant appears in the "sales agreement" between Continental and Sheppard Baking:

> Dealer covenants and agrees as follows:
> To keep and maintain route books containing the name, address, and weekly purchases of each account in Dealer's territory. These route books shall be deemed an asset of the dealership and shall be transferred with the dealership in accordance with the provisions of this agreement.

The same provision, in exactly the same language, also appears in the sales agreements that Continental entered into with Bon Ton and Wyoming Baking, respectively.

[1] Under these circumstances, we must hold that all three agreements accomplished the same purpose, which was to acquire indirectly such an interest or control in the business or the assets of the local baker so as to have him cease production. As to Sheppard Baking Company, there was no cash paid, and the dealership as such was not purchased, but the consideration for the exclusive arrangement was sufficient, and was effective to induce the owner to close the local bakery. This was an indirect acquisition prohibited by the order and a "payment" of money was not necessary to constitute a violation. The market and the volume was so acquired, and this was a principal asset of the bakery. There was a violation of the order in the arrangement with Sheppard Baking Company. See United States v. Columbia Pictures Corp., 189 F. Supp. 153 (S.D.N.Y.1960).

The trial court found that ITT Continental Baking Company "* * * is a successor of Continental Baking Company and that it assumed the liabilities of Continental Baking Company including the liabilities under the Federal Trade Commission consent order." ITT Continental concedes that it is liable for any violations of the FTC order that Continental incurred prior to the date of the merger between ITT and Continental, and the violations here concerned were such. Regal Knitwear Co. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 9, 65 S.Ct. 478, 89 L.Ed. 661, is sufficient authority for this position under the facts before us.

As to the issue of a continuing violation for penalty purposes, the trial court found that the terms of the consent order "proscribe only the act of acquisition and that the violations of the consent order found as to Bon Ton and Wy[21]oming Baking did not constitute a 'continuing failure or neglect to obey' said order. Accordingly the government's demand for imposition of daily penalties under 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l) is denied. Once these two acquisitions were accomplished, the violations were complete."

Counsel for both parties have cited no cases directly in point, nor has our own independent research disclosed any such cases, dealing with what constitutes a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" a consent order of the type here in question for the purposes of imposing daily penalties for violation. 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l), 45(l).

ITT Continental argues that the FTC order in this case does not proscribe the "holding of assets," but merely the acquisition thereof, and therefore there can be no continuing failure to obey the order by virtue of ITT Continental's holding of the dealership assets once they were initially acquired.

The Government, on the other hand, asserts that because a ban on acquisitions has been construed as a ban on the relationship such acquisitions create, see United States v. du Pont & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 77 S.Ct. 872, 1 L.Ed.2d 1057 (1957); Gottesman v. General Motors Corp., 414 F.2d 956 (2d Cir.), the parties in this case intended to prohibit, by the consent order, the relationship created by such acquisitions in the same or similar manner that section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, prohibits such relationship or effects. See United States v. du Pont & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 77 S.Ct. 872, 1 L.Ed.2d 1057 (1957).

[3] The "consequences" argument is significant as to penalties to be assessed for violation of the order; that is, whether the order was directed to the acquisition or to the acquisition and retention of assets or interests. We have indicated above that we agree with the determination of this issue by the trial court. This was an interpretation of the consent order, and the result is in accordance with the prevailing standards. This court has determined that the three acquisitions were in violation of the order. The imposition of the penalties does not insulate the consequences of the acquisition from further proceedings which remain available to the Government. The defendant has taken the position that the order did not extend to the holding of assets acquired contrary to the order, or to the consequences thereof. The trial court so held and we have affirmed on this point. Thus the consequences of holding have been held to be outside the order, and outside the penalties, and outside of this action.

[4] Divestiture as a remedy was advocated and advanced by the Government, but the trial court did not include it in its order. The extent of the penalties is within the discretion of the trial court. The trial court had jurisdiction to order divestiture or equitable remedies generally.

The case is remanded only for the imposition of a penalty by the trial court for the violation of the order in the Sheppard Baking Company acquisition as a single violation, in whatever amount the court sees fit within the statutory limits. Otherwise, the case is affirmed.

WILLIAM E. DOYLE, Circuit Judge, (concurring).

While I concur in the court's opinion, it is with reluctance that I approve of the remedy which has been imposed. Considering the frequency and magnitude of defendant-appellant's transgressions in this case, the mere imposition of a fine falls far short of a satisfactory outcome. Ordinarily a divestiture of the wrongfully acquired businesses would be the proper remedy, both to fulfill the objective of the antitrust laws, and to deter the defendant-appellant and other similarly-situated entities from commit[22]ting such abuses in the future. Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 405 U.S. 562, 573, 92 S.Ct. 1142, 31 L.Ed.2d 492 (1972); United States v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 376 U.S. 651, 84

S.Ct. 1044, 12 L.Ed.2d 12 (1964); United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 328–335, 81 S.Ct. 1243, 6 L.Ed. 2d 318 (1961); Schine Chain Theatres v. United States, 334 U.S. 110, 128, 68 S.Ct. 947, 92 L.Ed. 1245 (1948); United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U.S. 173, 189, 65 S.Ct. 254, 89 L.Ed. 160 (1944); United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 351 F. Supp. 969 (D.Minn.1972). However, I have concluded that because of deficiencies in the consent decree and other factual characteristics of this case, the result reached, while weak, is within the range of remedies the trial court may impose. On this basis I agree with the result.

Gallo Winery, to produce records and documents in compliance with a subpoena duces tecum issued by petitioner in the course of an investigation of respondent.

*Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 74,740, at 95,241 (1973-2 Trade Cases). See also p. 806, herein.

By resolution dated May 31, 1972 the FTC began an investigation to determine whether Gallo and other parties were engaged in unfair methods of competition and discriminatory acts and practices in violation of the laws administered by the Commission. Pursuant to the resolution a subpoena duces tecum was issued and served on respondent, and subsequent subpoenas were served on respondent's advertising agencies, Erwin Massey, Inc. and Young & Rubicam. Motions to quash these subpoenas were denied by the agency. A motion for a protective order filed by respondent to halt the issuance of any subpoenas to its distributors was similarly denied. Respondent thereupon advised the Commission that it considered the rulings on its motions to have been erroneous and would not produce the subpoenaed documents. This action was brought by the Commission pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 49 [1] to compel compliance with its subpoena.[2]

Respondent answered the FTC petition and included a counterclaim in which it attacked the legality of the Commission subpoenas and sought review and reversal of the denial by the Commission of its motions and of the motions filed by its advertising agencies. The counterclaim prayed for an order quashing the subpoena served on respondent and enjoining the enforcement of subpoenas served on its advertising agencies or any other persons in connection with the FTC investigation.

Of the several theories presented in support of the relief requested in the counterclaim,[3] the one which gives the Court concern is the allegation that members of the Commission staff engaged in deceit and harassment in order to obtain information from respondent, and used this information as a basis for issuing the resolution which authorized the instant investigation and subpoena. In order to prove the assertions of misconduct in its counterclaim respondent has attempted to use the discovery process and has served three commission staff attorneys with a notice of taking depositions and subpoenas duces tecum. The Commission has requested a protective order prohibiting all discovery in this proceeding, and moved for dismissal of respondent's counterclaim, or in the alternative, for summary judgment. The Commission urges that respondent's claim that information was improperly obtained is not material to the issue before the Court, which is whether to enforce subpoenas issued pursuant to a lawful FTC investigation. Rather, the Commission would have respondent raise its claim if and when the allegedly "tainted" information is ever sought to be used against respondent in an adjudicatory proceeding. And since the matters to which Gallo's discovery is directed are not material to this proceeding, the Commission argues that discovery should be denied.

"[I]n case of disobedience to a subpoena the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence.

"Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any corporation or other person, issue an order requiring such corporation or other person to appear before the Commission, or to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof."

[2] In a companion action, Federal Trade Commission v. Sidney Marshall, Civil Action No. 654–73, brought to enforce the subpoena duces tecum issued to Young & Rubicam, an order enforcing the subpoena was signed on May 11, 1973.

[3] Respondent also argues that the subpoena should be quashed because the matters sought to be investigated by the Commission are not within the scope of its authority, the subpoena was not issued in compliance with Section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the subpoena does not provide for sufficient confidentiality for the demanded documents. These contentions are found to be without merit. First, the Commission's power to investigate possible anti-competitive by Gallo is conferred by Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, and Sections 2, 3 and 10 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 13, 14 and 21. There is no authority which holds that the Commission is specifically preempted from investigating the alcoholic beverage industry. Second, although the subpoena in this instance was signed by a Commission staff attorney and not by a member of the Commission, the

It is clear that a proceeding to enforce an administrative subpoena, because of the important governmental interest in the expeditious investigation of possible unlawful activity, is summary in nature and that the scope of issues which may be aired in such a proceeding will be limited accordingly. United States v. Powell, 379 U.S. 48, 57–58 (1964); United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652–53 (1949); Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 216–18 (1946). The party on whom the subpeona is served is entitled to an adversary hearing at which he may challenge the subpeona on any appropriate ground. Reisman v. Caplin, 375 U.S. 440, 449. The focus of the enforcement proceedings generally will be on whether the inquiry is within the statutory authority of the agency, the demand not too indefinite, and the information sought reasonably relevant to the inquiry. Because the Courts are cautious to avoid undue and premature interference with administrative investigations, the subpoenaed party ordinarily will not be permitted to expand the scope of legitimate issues which may be raised in an enforcement proceeding, particularly where he is not immediately adversely affected and will have future avenues of administrative relief and judicial review open to him.

Court finds that this practice is in compliance with Section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 49, following the ruling in Federal Trade Commission v. Gibson, 460 F.2d 605 (5th Cir. 1972). Third, as to the confidentiality of the subpoenaed documents, respondent acknowledges that it is the policy of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the courts, and the Commission itself to provide for the confidentiality of subpoenaed information. It is presumed that information of this nature will not be disclosed. At such time as there is reason to believe otherwise, respondent then may seek additional protection.

But dispite the summary nature of the proceedings, the exercise of the judicial power to enforce an administrative subpoena is discretionary and may be withheld where enforcement would involve an abuse of the court's process. Powell, supra, at 58; Walling, supra, at 216; United States v. Newman, 441 F.2d 165, 169–170 (1971); United States v. Roundtree, 420 F.2d 845, 851 (1969).

> Such an abuse would take place if the summons had been issued for an improper purpose, such as to harass [the subpoenaed party] or to put pressure on him to settle a collateral dispute, or for any other purpose reflecting on the good faith of the particular investigation. Powell, supra, at 58.

Moreover, when a party seeks to invoke the equitable powers of the Court, inquiry may be made, upon proper cause shown, as to whether the party seeking relief has come into court with "clean hands."

Respondent raises three points which challenge the Commission's good faith in actions related to its request for enforcement of the subpoena. First, it is asserted that during the pendency before the Commission of respondent's motion to quash the subpoena, FTC staff attorneys demanded that respondent immediately begin producing the subpoenaed documents. The FTC attorneys allegedly threatened that if respondent did not comply, notwithstanding the pendency of the motion to quash, a new subpoena would be prepared which would be much broader than the one previously served; that the Commission would renege on an agreement entered into between counsel and the Commission staff concerning the filing of the motion to quash and the production of certain documents; that, contrary to prior representations by the Commission, Julio R. Gallo would be required to appear personally in Washington, D.C., on the return date of the subpoena; and that the Commission staff would begin to conduct expansive field investigations which the staff was certain Gallo would not like to have proceed.[4] Second, it is contended that the Commission deceived respondent into voluntarily supplying information upon an agreement that it would be used only in connection with an investigation of Gallo's competitors when in fact the Commission sought to use this data for an investigation of Gallo, which, unknown to respondent, was already in progress.[5] This action is claimed to have been in violation of an FTC rule [6] which requires that a person under investigation who is requested to furnish information be advised of the purpose and scope of the investigation. Finally, the Commission is charged with further violating its agreement with respondent by using the information furnished as a basis for its resolution initiating the formal investigation of Gallo. This belief is based on the allegations that an FTC attorney who was involved in the investigation of Gallo's competitors and who had access to the data supplied by Gallo for that purpose, was also involved in the formal investigation of Gallo; and that another FTC attorney who participated in the Gallo investigation made reference to the nature of the information which respondent furnished in confidence.

[6] Rule § 2.6 of the Federal Trade Commission Rules of Practice provides:

"Any person under investigation compelled or requested to furnish information or documentary evidence shall be advised with respect to the purpose and scope of the investigation."

The state of facts proposed by respondent, if true, would not establish a direct attempt by the Commission to misuse the Court's process, for it has not been shown that the subpoena itself was issued to harass respondent or that the investigation has been conducted for an improper purpose. The facts do tend to show, however, that the present investigation of Gallo is the product of conduct by the Commission which may be categorized as unfair and which raises a substantial question as to whether it would be equitable to grant the Commission the relief which it is seeking. Consequently, before proceeding any further in this case, the Court will require petitioner to prepare detailed affidavits, from those persons having personal and immediate knowledge, which address themselves to the questions of bad faith raised by respondent. Specifically, the affidavits should state whether any form of harassment was used to secure compliance with the subpoena issued to respondent, whether any information was improperly obtained from respondent, and whether such information was employed in the initiation of the investigation of respondent. The Court will defer determination of the sufficiency of respondent's counterclaim and the merits of its request for discovery until after receipt of the affidavits from the Commission.

Accordingly, it is, this 9th day of October, 1973,

Ordered that on or before October 31, 1973, petitioner will file affidavits in conformance with this opinion.

On application for an injunction to stop F.T.C. administrative hearings, the court held that the Bankruptcy Court lacks power to enjoin the F.T.C. because of the principle of sovereign immunity.

ORDER ON APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTION AGAINST THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

The matter under consideration presents a seemingly irreconcilable conflict between the purpose and the well established policy of a relief chapter of the Bankruptcy Act and the doctrine of sovereign immunity. The matter is brought before this Court by Koscot Interplanetary, hereinafter referred to as Koscot, the debtor involved in this arrangement proceeding. The particular relief sought by Koscot is a temporary injunction against the Federal Trade Commission, hereinafter referred to as FTC, an agency of the United States Government, which agency scheduled a hearing for October 16, 1973, a proceeding in which Koscot is one of the respondents.

The operating factors germane to this controversy are largely without dispute. Although the initial response filed by the FTC to the debtors application raised numerous issues, none of them are really relevant and the matter is controlled by the applicability vel non of the doctrine of sovereign immunity. Only the resolution of this question is determinative of the issues involved.

The power of the Bankruptcy Court to enjoin and restrain the Commission or the continuing of any action against the debtor involved in an arrangement proceeding is based on an express grant by Congress. Sections 2(a)(15); 11; 314; and 372 of the National Bankruptcy Act.

This injunctive power was obviously granted to the Bankruptcy Court in order to assure and extend the fullest and broadest possible protection to debtors and, or course, in order to effectuate the overall policy aims of the Chapter which is rehabilitation of financially embarrassed debtors. Since an arrangement proceeding is remedial in nature the protective measures available must be liberally construed in favor of the debtor and the injunctive relief sought here would ordinarily be granted without any further comment if sought against a private litigant. The fact of the matter is such a general restraining order and injunction has already been entered at the commencement of the proceeding. The difficulty of the matter under consideration stems from the undeniable fact that the relief sought by the debtor is not against a private litigant, but against a non-proprietary agency of the United States which is in fact the United States of America. Sprouse v. Federal Prison Industries, Inc., 480 F.2d 1 (1973). This fact immediately brings into play the doctrine of sovereign immunity which may or may not govern this controversy. Thus whether or not the injunction sought is against a commission qua commission or against the administrative judge in charge of the case pending before the Commission or against the prosecuting counsel, the injunction if issued would be in reality an injunction against the United States.

The proposition that the United States cannot be sued without its consent is so well established that it needs no elaborate discussion. Dugan v. Rank, 372 U.S. 609, 83 S.Ct. 999, 10 L.Ed.2d 15 (1963); State of Hawaii v. Gordon, 373 U.S. 57, 83 S.Ct. 1052, 10 L.Ed.2d 191 (1963); Robinson v. Parkhurst 289 F. Supp. 528 (1968). It is equally well established that the protection granted to the Government by the doctrine of sovereign immunity is not limited solely to suits which are either in personam or in rem but includes actions for injunctive relief. Federal Housing Administration v. Burr, 309 U.S. 242, 60 S.Ct. 488, 84 L.Ed. 724 (1940); in re Townsend 348 F. Supp. 1284 (1972).

Thus unless in this particular instance it appears that the Government waived its immunity either expressly or by implication the relief sought is clearly within the protective reach of the doctrine and cannot be granted.

It is now uniformly established that the "to sue or to be sued" clause frequently used by Congress in statutes creating the various government agencies is tantamount to a waiver of immunity unless the statute which created the agency in question limits the waiver by express language. For instance the Circuit Court in the case of United States v. Mel's Lockers, Inc., 326 F.2d 168 (10th Cir. 1965), expressly held that the Bankruptcy Court lacked jurisdiction to issue an injunction against the Small Business Administration because of the applicability of the doctrine of sovereign immunity. While it is true that in that case the statute which created the agency contained the clause "to sue or to be sued" 15 U.S.C. 634(b) it also expressly prohibited the issuance of any attachment, injunction or garnishment against the agency. Accordingly in absence of such restriction an agency could be sued if the statute which created it provides that it may sue or be sued and the Bankruptcy Court in such instances does possess the power to issue in an appropriate case an injunction against the agency. For instance, in the case of In re Townsend, supra, an injunction by the Bankruptcy Court was found to be proper against the Veteran's Administration since the statute which created that agency contained the clause "to sue or to be sued", 38 U.S.C. 1820, and unlike the statute which created the Small Business Administration did not limit the extent of the waiver, 15 U.S.C. 631(a) 634(b). See also Federal Housing Administration v. Burr, supra, a case which involved a suit against the F.H.A. where the injunction was found to be proper because of the "to sue or to be sued" clause in the statute. Act of August 23, 1935, c.614, 49 Stat. 684, 722. The statute which created the Federal Trade Commission, 15 U.S.C. para. 41 et seq. is totally silent in respect and has no provision for any suits either by or against the Commission. Accordingly the Commission is protected by the doctrine unless a consent to be sued could be found elsewhere by implication. This is precisely the position of the debtor who urges that inasmuch as there is no statute which expressly prohibits the issuance of an injunction against the Commssion, a prohibition which was the controlling factor in United States v. Mel's Lockers, Inc., supra, the injunctive provisions of the Bankruptcy Act are available and could be used against the Commission in order to carry out the purpose of this chapter. While this argument may appear to be persuasive at first blush, it does not bear a close analysis and is contrary to the controlling case laws as enunciated by the Courts. Sprouse v. Federal Prison Industries, Inc., supra. The proceeding now pending before the Commission no doubt seriously effects the debtor. To require the debtor to proceed to participate and to defend its interest before the Commission would certainly seriously hamper its efforts to obtain rehabilitation before this Court and may very well be instrumental in the ultimate demise of the debtor if the proceeding before the Commission will continue. The evidence presented indicates that there will be at least two weeks of additional hearings before the Commission concludes its presentation of its case in chief. If the debtor is compelled to proceed as scheduled before the Commission it will require the retention of counsel and it will incur a minimum of $30,000 in legal fees and expenses that the debtor can hardly afford at this time, when all its resources should be concentrated on matters which pertain to the arrangement proceeding. In this connection it should be pointed out that according to the evidence presented the chief executive of the debtor will have to actively participate in the proceeding before the Commission for the purpose of assisting counsel and his absence will certainly place an additional and heavy burden on the debtor. There were more than 450 law suits filed against the debtor prior to the institution of this proceeding by private litigants and by various attorney generals filed on behalf of their respective states. All those actions are restrained and enjoined. The conclusion and holding set forth herein shall no way be construed to effect those actions or to modify to any extent the general restraining order and injunction. This is so because the protection of the doctrine of sovereign immunity is limited in its application to the United States of America and this Court clearly does possess the power to restrain and enjoin pursuant to the specific grant by Congress any and all actions including actions filed by various states of the Union.

The nature of the proceeding before the Commission is primarily directed to establish that the debtor in selling distributorships was guilty of deceptive trade practices in violation of 15 U.S.C. Section 45, guilty of vertical price fixing and illegal restraint of trade, Robinson-Patman amendment to § 2(b) Clayton Act 15 U.S.C. § 13. Thus the primary if not the sole purpose of the proceedings before the Commission is to stop Koscot from continuing this allegedly fraudulent practice. To that extent the proceedings before the Commission are nothing but an exercise in futility since Koscot no longer sells distributorships. Koscot now operates under the aegis and control and supervision of this Court. The authority granted to Koscot to operate its business did not and does not include the authority to sell distributorships. On the contrary Koscot is expressly prohibited by this Court to engage any further sales of distributorships or pyramid sales. Koscot is permitted and engaged in the selling of cosmetics through its distributorships already established. Whether or not Koscot is in this activity violating any provisions of the law which prohibits vertical price fixing or illegal restraint of trade are matters properly within the jurisdiction of the Commission. It must be kept in mind, however, that the debtor merely seeks a temporary respite and does not contend that its entitled to a permanent injunction. The fact of the matter is that the debtor did agree to enter a consent decree and did sign such a consent decree prepared by the government which however was ultimately rejected. Thus the proceeding seems to serve no other purpose at this time except maybe to beat a dying horse. This is so because the alledged purpose of the Commission to proceed with the matter is to protect the interest of the public, an interest which is not threatened by the debtor at this time at all. As noted above the power of the Commission to issue a cease and desist order against Koscot is well established if the charges are proven. The Commission also has the statutory power to order a restitution. However to the extent such a relief is contemplated the decree of restitution will be meaningless unless the parties in whose favor of restitution is ordered properly filed a proof of claim with this Court within the time provided by the Act and further provided that the claims are ultimately allowed. This is so because the Bankruptcy Court is the only forum where claims may be presented against the debtor involved in an arrangement proceeding. It is also clear that claims not duly filed and allowed will be rendered unenforceable if the debtor obtains confirmation unless such claims are removed from the protective provisions of the discharge by a favorable consideration by this Court of a timely complaint filed pursuant to Section 17c of the Act.

It is unfortunate indeed that in light of the foregoing the Commission insists to proceed with the hearing as scheduled unless enjoined by this Court. Having considered the respective interests of the parties the nature and the purpose of the proceeding before the Commission, the respective benefits and detriments resulting from the proceeding this Court is satisfied that all equities are in favor of the debtor and the relief prayed for is badly needed and if granted would be well deserved. However, having considered the controlling authorities this Court is constrained to conclude that the Commission is protected by the doctrine of sovereign immunity and the injunctive power otherwise possessed by this Court cannot reach the Commission. For this reason the debtor's application for injunction must be denied.

In accordance with the foregoing it is ORDERED, ADJUDGED and DECREED:

That the debtors application for preliminary injunction be and the same is hereby denied.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. KOSCOT INTERPLANETARY, INC., ETC., ET AL.*

No. 73-71-Orl-Cr. FTC Docket 8888.

(United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, Orlando Division, October 17, 1973)

On the ground that the right of the defendants and the United States to receive a fair and impartial trial would be seriously jeopardized, the court issued an order preventing parties and witnesses in the criminal case from making statements in any other forum concerning the issues of the case.

ORDER

It is apparent to the Court that the right of the defendants and the United States to receive a fair and impartial trial in this case will be seriously jeopardized, if not foreclosed, if the parties and material witnesses are caused to appear in other forums or places and make statements or give testimony, which might reflect on any of the issues or parties here on trial.

The Court takes judicial notice that the trial of this case commenced in a background of publicity of such magnitude that the selection of a fair and impartial jury, free from the bias and influence of such publicity, was made difficult and painstaking. It required the summoning of approximately 225 veniremen to obtain what the Court deems a fair and impartial jury.

When the jury was sworn the Court and parties anticipated that the trial would be protracted because of the vast number of witnesses who would be called to testify and because the complex evidentiary issues involved in the case were expected to produce intermittent delays. For this reason it was decided that sequestration of the jury would work an undue hardship on the jurors and their families and would create an atmosphere in which justice would be difficult to accomplish. Thus the jury has been free during non-working hours under strict instructions to avoid news releases and other publicity about the case and the parties thereto.

The Court has now been made aware of litigation in various parts of the United States that may well be the subject of widespread publicity if the parties and material witnesses in this case are required to appear or testify in such causes. If past events are any indicator, it is expected that the publicity would be sufficiently intense and prolonged as to be likely to reach the jury in this case notwithstanding this Court's instructions to them and the caution they may exercise.

It is to avoid a mistrial that such publicity could produce and to insure the continued maintenance of a fair and impartial trial that the Court on its own initiative hereby ORDERS that the parties and witnesses under subpoena in this case shall make no statements whatever, in any form whether under process of law or otherwise, which might reflect on any of the issues or parties in this case.

LA SALLE EXTENSION UNIVERSITY v. F.T.C.*

(United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, October 23, 1973)

On petition to review, court held that Commission order requiring petitioner to disclose, in advertising, that its courses in law are not acceptable to qualify an individual for admission to practice law was not an abuse of Commission discretion. Affirmed and enforced.

Before FAIRCHILD, CUMMINGS and STEVENS, Circuit Judges.

ORDER

Petitioner, La Salle Extension University, is a proprietary institution, providing instruction by correspondence. In 1969, 10% of its 100,000 students were taking courses in the field of law. Its gross receipts were $50,000,000, those from sale of its complete law courses $3,300,000. In 1954 a Commission order had required petitioner to cease "representing, directly or by implication, that recipients of [petitioner's] purported academic degrees in law or others satisfactorily completing respondent's course of study through correspondence will be admitted to or are otherwise eligible to participate in bar examinations * * *" except for some four states where correspondence study was then acceptable.

The Commission reopened the proceeding in 1970. An examiner heard evidence tending to show that individuals who relied upon petitioner's advertising concluded that completion of petitioner's law course would be an acceptable educational prerequisite for admission to the bar. The examiner and subsequently the Commission (by a three to two vote) rejected the staff proposal that petitioner be prohibited from offering a law degree, but an order, unanimously adopted, entered June 24, 1971, required petitioner in substance, "clearly and conspicuously to disclose, in type the same size and appearance as the advertising claims appearing thereon: (a) in any advertisement of written offer to sell; (b) on the front page or cover of promotional material or descriptive brochure wherein respondent's law course or law degrees are mentioned and in said promotional material or descriptive brochure on each page on which respondent's law courses or law degrees are mentioned; (c) in each enrollment form, application form, sales contract or similar document; that said courses are not recognized or accepted as sufficient education or legal training to qualify the student to become a candidate for admission to the profession of law. * * *", except for appropriate qualification as to any state which will accept such courses. The disclosure in the form petitioner intends to use is: "No state accepts any law home study course, including La Salle's, as sufficient education to qualify for admission to practice law."

(1) Petitioner now says it is willing to abandon offering a law degree, takes the position that any possible misunderstanding which might require the disclosure results from the offering of a law degree, and proposes that we modify the order so as to require disclosure only so long as petitioner offers a law degree. Petitioner's material, however, repetitively emphasizes and promotes with seeming effectiveness the advantages of the "study of law" and "law training." Dropping the references to a law degree would, we think, change the tone very little. We are far from able to say, as a matter of law, that the probability of misunderstanding would be materially reduced if there were no promise of a degree. The two commissioners who felt that dropping the degree should be part of the solution, supported the requirement of disclosure in any event.

(2) Petitioner challenges the requirement that the disclosure appear on each page of promotional material or descriptive brochure on which law courses or law degrees are mentioned. It argues that such frequency is unreasonable. The Commission considered the argument and said that it "might be persuasive if we had reason to believe that prospective purchasers generally read each page of [petitioner's] promotional literature before purchasing." It concluded, however, that the each-page requirement was necessary to protect "the 'ignorant, the unthinking and the credulous,' who may base their decision to purchase on a cursory perusal of the literature at hand."

It is well-established that deference must be accorded to the expertise of an administrative agency, particularly with respect to the appropriateness of remedies.

The Supreme Court has stated "the Commission alone is empowered to develop that enforcement policy best calculated to achieve the ends contemplated by Congress and to allocate its available funds and personnel in such a way as to execute its policy efficiently and economically." Moog Industries Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 355 U.S. 411, 413 (1958). In each case, the court must determine whether the remedy bears "no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist," Jacob Siegal Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 327 U.S. 608, 613 (1946), or whether it is too restrictive, forbidding activities other than those "which if continued would directly aid in perpetuating the same old unlawful practices." Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 727 (1948). See L. G.

Balfour Company v. F.T.C., 442 F.2d 1 (7th Cir., 1971); Spiegel, Inc. v. F.T.C., 411 F.2d 481 (7th Cir., 1969). We are unable to say that the Commission's decision as to frequency of disclosure was outside the range of reasonableness.

(3) The most difficult problem is posed by the requirement that the disclosure must not only be clear and conspicuous, but "in type the same size and appearance as the advertising claims." Evidently this means the same size and appearance as the largest type used for any word of an advertising claim. The compliance staff so interprets it, and the Commission said, in its opinion, "We note that in certain promotional material, [petitioner's] practice is to use the word "LAW" in large letters with the text of the ad in much smaller letters. Surely a prospective purchaser is entitled to be informed that the course will not qualify him to take the bar examination in letters equally as large as the letters which we find, on the basis of the record, convey this meaning."

Although petitioner argues that the requirement that the disclosure be clear and conspicuous is enough, we have no doubt that the Commission may properly particularize that requirement as to size and appearance of type. See Parker Pen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 159 F.2d 509, 512 (7th Cir., 1946); and Gimbel Bros. v. Federal Trade Commission, 116 F.2d 578, 580 (2d Cir. 1941).

Petitioner points out that it would be impossible, in some instances, and extremely awkward in others, to print the 20 word disclosure in the same size type as the word "law" or other emphasized word as it appears in its present advertising. The solution offered in the Commission opinion was that petitioner could alter the layout of its material. So put, the requirement is that in laying out each page of material, the designer must select the largest size type he considers appropriate for the disclosure and then design the balance so that no word of an advertising claim will be in larger or more distinctive type than the disclosure.

It would seem possible to design a page of advertising so that the disclosure would attract attention even though larger type were used for some portion of the other material. On the other hand, testimony of record indicates that part of the problem before the Commission arose from deceptive oral promotional efforts by respondent's sales representatives. Bluntly obvious disclosure in the printed matter may be needed to render oral deception more difficult. On balance, a majority of this division of the court concludes that the Commission's choice was not outside the range of reasonableness.

(4) Another problem arises out of the fact that petitioner offers two types of course of study in law. The language of the order is broad enough to cover both.

One type of course of study in law results, when successfully completed, in conferral of an L.L.B. degree. Petitioner also offers specialized courses such as insurance law, claim adjusting law, law for trust officers, law for appellate conferees (I.R.S.), and law for police officers. The order applies "in connection with advertisements or promotion of respondent's courses of study in law or of its law degress [sic]."

Petitioner contends here that the problem before the Commission arose out of offerings of the general courses and that the disclosure will accomplish nothing when made in material concerning the offerings of the specialized courses. It does seem fair to say that the proceeding was mainly directed at promotion of the general courses, although counsel for the Commission points out the difficulty of making a distinction in the order, valid in the future as well as presently, between offerings where deception with respect to eligibility for bar admission will be a problem and those where it will not.

In any event petitioner raised no such question before the Commission, even incorporating the broad language in a form of order proposed by petitioner. Ordinarily a reviewing court should not set aside an administrative order upon a ground not raised before the agency. 3 Davis, Administrative Law § 20.06. The circumstances do not call for a departure from that principle.

The order of the Commission is affirmed and will be enforced.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

I. BACKGROUND

RICHEY, D. J.: This cause came before the Court for hearing on plaintiff Ash Grove Cement Company's Motion for Entry of a Third Memorandum Order, which would require defendant Federal Trade Commission to produce for in camera inspection and pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act certain documents in the FTC's possession, and for hearing on Defendants' Renewed Motion for Summary Judgment, which would have the effect of precluding the in camera inspection and production of said documents. Plaintiff is currently the respondent in an FTC adjudicative proceeding relating to Plaintiff's possible violation of the antitrust laws. In that proceeding, Plaintiff has asserted the defense that the Commission had illegally prejudged and decided in advance all of the allegations of the adjudicative complaint. Plaintiff further asserts that the documents sought in the instant lawsuit are necessary to substantiate that defense. This Court has already entered two Memorandum Orders directing that certain steps be taken by Defendants with regard to the documents in question.[1] Upon consideration of the instant Motion, the Court has determined that Defendants must be required to produce some but, not all, of the documents requested for the Court's in camera inspection.

II. ISSUES

There are four categories of documents being sought by the Plaintiff. These categories consist of: (1) internal memoranda of the FTC; (2) FTC investigative files; (3) directive-type minutes from members of the Commission to members of the Commission staff; and (4) "chronological minutes", which are essentially accounts of the Commission's executive meetings and the deliberations of the Commission. Defendants have identified and Plaintiff has specified with particularity 42 documents sought in the first category, 4 in the second and 17 in the third. The particular documents sought in the fourth category have not been delineated by either party. The sole issue with respect to all of these documents is whether they fall within one of the nine exemptions listed in the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b).

[1] Ash Grove Cement Company v. FTC, Civil Action No. 1298–71, Memorandum Order and Second Memorandum Order, both filed February 22, 1973.

III. DISCUSSION

A. The Commission Has Described Its Internal Memoranda With Sufficient Particularity To Demonstrate Exemption From Production Under The FOIA.

Under its prior Orders, the Court requested the Commission attempt a review, deletion and disclosure with respect to documents previously listed by the Commission as intra-agency memoranda for which it had claimed exemption under the FOIA, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).[2] Many of those documents were later released to the Plaintiff's counsel for their inspection. Those memoranda which the Commission still believes to be confidential under the fifth statutory exemption and relevant case law, and which the Commission has refused to produce, have been listed and described in an affidavit filed by Charles H. Koch, an attorney in the Commission's Office of General Counsel.[3] Out of this group, Plaintiff has narrowed its request to 42 documents.

Since the oral hearing, the Court has again carefully reviewed the affidavit containing the description of these documents. Both parties agree that the documents are correctly categorized as inter- or intra-agency memoranda, but Plaintiff contends that they must nonetheless be produced under the rationale that the Commission may have relied upon the documents in determining policies and interpretations which became in effect "secret law". Documents constituting such "secret law" must be produced under the case law developed by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.[4] Moreover, Plaintiff contends that the description of the documents contained in the Koch affidavit are so conclusory as to prevent the Court's accurate determination of their nature without first conducting an in camera inspection.

The Supreme Court in Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink held that in camera inspection of agency documents need not be automatic if the agency can demonstrate through affidavit that the documents sought are exempt under the FOIA.[5] In the instant case, the affidavit submitted on behalf of the Commission lists each document and describes in general terms its content. These descriptions are more than mere conclusions. They provide the Court with enough information to enable it to determine which division of the agency (and in many instances which individual within the agency) authored the memo, to which division (or individual) the memo was sent, and the particular areas of policy or other matters which were discussed. The Court is of the opinion that these descriptions are sufficiently detailed to demonstrate that the memos are in fact expressions of opinions and internal discussions of policy. It is exactly these types of memoranda which the fifth exemption was designed to protect from disclosure.[6] The Court believes that to require a more detailed affidavit from the Defendants would be tantamount to requiring full disclosure of the substance of the documents.[7] Therefore, unless these documents contain "secret law", they are exempt.

[2] 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5) provides that an agency is not required to make its records available for inspection if such records consist of "inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency".

[5] EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73 (1973)

As to whether the memos constitute the basis for or contain "secret law", the Court starts with the assertion in Mr. Koch's affidavit that "none of the documents reveal 'secret law' which is binding on the agency, and none of them constitutes the basis for Commission decisions".[8] While this assertion might not of itself be sufficient to preclude further examination, there are other factors which support the truth of this statement. The most important of these is that none of the memoranda sought under this category were issued by the Commission itself. Rather, the memos were for the most part communications between staff members, staff members and the Commission, and individual Commissioners and the Commission. There is no indication in the record that any one or more of the memos sought by Plaintiff were used to formulate or contain "secret law", and indeed, the Court discerns no likelihood that such is the case in view of the fact that none of these memoranda were issued by the Commission. If the Commission has in fact developed any "secret law", it would in all probability have been developed through study of a multitude of sources, no one of which would constitute an accurate picture of the final result. Moreover, in the event that an examination of other Commission documents reveals that the memos in this category do contain "secret law", the Court can at that time inspect the memo or memos to which reference has been made. This was the general procedure set forth by the Court of Appeals in the Sterling case, and the Court believes that such a procedure is both appropriate and applicable here.[9] Accordingly, the Court will not at this time require the production of documents listed in category one for in camera inspection.[10]

[7] In Vaughn v. Rosen, 42 U.S.L. Week 2137 (C.A.D.C. August 20, 1973), the Court stated: "An analysis sufficiently detailed would not have to contain factual descriptions that if made public would compromise the secret nature of the information but could ordinarily be composed without excessive reference to the actual language of the document."

B. The Court Will Require the FTC To Produce For In Camera Inspection Those Memoranda Which It Has Labelled As Investigatory Files.

The Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7), exempts from disclosure "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes except to the extent available by law to a party other than an agency". The Defendants claim that this portion of the statute creates a blanket exemption for all memoranda and documents listed as "investigatory files" in the Koch affidavit.

While there is no doubt that Plaintiff is currently the subject of a pending proceeding before the Commission, the Court is not content with the simple listing of documents under the heading of investigatory files, without a more thorough explanation of the substance of those documents. A more detailed examination is required in order to determine whether those documents contain any materials which might be discoverable by a person "charged with violations of federal criminal law".[11] The Court will accordingly conduct an in camera inspection of the four memoranda sought by Plaintiff and listed by the Defendants as investigatory files.

C. The Court Will Require The FTC To Produce For In Camera Inspection Those Commission Minutes Which Constitute Staff Directives.

In its Second Memorandum Order, the Court recognized two types of Commission minutes, both of which types were being sought by the Plaintiff. One of these types consists of "directives by the Commission and communications of policy between the Commission and its staff",[12] and may be named "blue minutes" because they are printed in blue mimeograph lettering. The Defendants contend that these memoranda are exempt under the fifth exemption of the FOIA. The Court requested review, deletion and disclosure similar to that to be conducted for other documents for which exemption was claimed under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).

[10] The Court notes that a very small proportion of the documents sought may contain factual and statistical data which may be separable from the opinions and discussions contained in such documents, although Defendants' affidavit asserts that this is not the case. While such factual information would normally be subject to disclosure. Plaintiff does not appear to be concerned with this type of information, and accordingly, the Court will not undertake the process of filtering it out of the documents.

While the Koch affidavit filed in response to the Court's request lists and describes in some detail those memoranda, the Court is nonetheless of the opinion that the 17 memos still being sought by Plaintiff should be produced for in camera inspection. The reason for this is obvious, for if any of the documents sought demonstrate the existence of "secret law", it would appear in the Commission's directives to its staff and/or communications of policy between the Commission and its staff.

D. The Commission's "Chronological Minutes" Are Exempt From Disclosure Under The Fifth Exemption Of The Freedom Of Information Act.

The second type of minutes sought by Plaintiff are called "chronological minutes" by the Commission. These minutes have been identified as: [13]

> [A]ccounts of the Commission's executive meetings and conferences * * * the deliberations of the Commission such as exchange of opinions between individual Commissioners, their recommendations, motions, discussions and statements. They also contain staff recommendations and involve pending cases, internal reorganization procedures, personnel actions, policy determinations and generally reflect the Commission's decision making process.

In its Second Memorandum Order, the Court requested Defendants to treat these chronological minutes in the same manner they were to treat other documents claimed to be exempt under 5 U.S.C. § 552 (b) (5). In response to this request, the Defendants, rather than listing and describing this group of documents, reasserted their contention that they are exempted pursuant to § 552(b) (5) without the necessity of in camera inspection or a description with particularity. Plaintiff, while apparently accepting the characterization of chronological minutes as set forth above, argues that these documents may contain evidence of "secret law" and as such must be produced, at least for in camera inspection.

Upon further consideration of this issue, the Court does not believe that Plaintiff's assertion that an examination of the Commission's chronological minutes will uncover evidence of "secret law" is sufficient in this case to overcome the need to preserve the free flow of ideas between Commissioners. In this regard, the Court is in full agreement with the majority in the Sterling Drug case, wherein the Court of Appeals stated: [14]

> In most agencies the exchange of views between Commissioners or Board members is considered perhaps the most essential element in the decisional process.

> Thus, continual expression of ideas and strong advocacy of positions are to be encouraged to the fullest at this level. In our opinion any attempt to separate a Commissiioner' statements as to the basis for a past decision from his views regarding the disposition of a current case and to disclose the former might well infringe upon these essential communications.

Accordingly, the Court will not require Defendants to do any more than has already been done with respect to the Commission's chronological minutes, and no in camera inspection will be required. In the event that an examination of the Commission's "blue minutes" reveals that its chronological minutes do contain evidence of "secret law", the Court can at that time inspect the memo or memos to which reference has been made.

IV. CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the Court will deny Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment pending an in camera inspection of those investigatory files and Commission staff directives specified by the plaintiff. No in camera inspection of those memoranda discussed in Section III. A. of this Opinion, or of those memoranda labelled as chronological minutes of the Commission will be required or undertaken at this time.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

This matter is before the Court on defendant's motion to dismiss Count II of the complaint.[1] The motion is granted.

The complaint alleges that the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") filed a complaint against Borden, Count III of which charges Borden and A&P with an illegal combination, the effect of which was price stabilization. It is further alleged that counsel for the FTC have chosen 1964 through 1968 as the relevant period of proof for purposes of its complaint against Borden. The issuance of the FTC's complaint was preceded by an FTC investigation of Borden's sale of private label fluid milk products to A&P stores in the Chicago area. This investigation was commenced some time prior to March 1967 and Borden was informed that the purpose and scope of this investigation was to determine whether Borden's sale of milk in Chicago involved illegal price discrimination in violation of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a), or sales at unreasonably low prices or at prices below costs for the purpose of eliminating or lessening competition in violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45. It is also alleged that in October 1969 Borden was informed that the FTC authorized by formal resolution an investigation of Borden with respect to possible discriminatory pricing practices.

Borden further alleges that it first received notice of the FTC's intent to charge it with illegal combination on June 1, 1971. It is also alleged that the private label negotiations between Borden and A&P allegedly occurred in 1964 and 1965 and that discovery conducted since the issuance of the FTC complaint has revealed that substantial information for the 1964–1968 period is no longer available.

The FTC's investigation of this matter and its failure to give timely notice allegedly breached the FTC's statutory duty of expeditious proceeding, as imposed by the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 551–559. It is also alleged that the FTC has been guilty of laches and has substantially impaired Borden's ability to present a full and adequate defense, in violation of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 556(d), and the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. Based on the foregoing, Borden contends that the FTC is without authority to proceed under its complaint and that any subsequent action thereon is null and void.

Borden raised these same contentions in a motion to dismiss filed before the FTC on October 26, 1972. On February 13, 1973, the motion was denied by an administrative law judge, who, on April 24, 1973, also denied Borden's motion for reconsideration or, in the alternative, certification to the FTC. The order dated April 24, 1973, was based in large part on the opinion expressed by the Commission when it denied A&P's motion to dismiss that raised these same contentions: the question of inability to defend the action could not be answered until the conclusion of the hearings.

Borden agrees that the question of the denial of an adequate opportunity to defend can be raised again at the conclusion of the hearings and that the issue here is whether it is required to exhaust administrative remedies. As noted in this Court's opinion dated June 7, 1973 at 6: "* * * the exhaustion doctrine relates to the timing of, rather than the power to, review, and rests, at least in part, on general equity principles. Bannercraft Clothing Co. v. Renegotiation Bd., 466 F.2d 345, 355–59 (D.C.Cir. 1972)."

One of the equitable principles to be considered is whether the party will experience irreparable injury. Borden naturally expresses confidence that it will prevail on the merits of its constitutional claims. The irreparable injury it alleges is that it will be subjected to the costs of the administrative proceedings. The general rule appears to be that unless the jurisdiction of the administrative agency is clearly lacking, the cost and inconvenience of defending against the agency action is not sufficient to invoke this Court's equitable powers. Petroleum Exploration, Inc. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 304 U.S. 209, 221 (1938); compare Public Utilities Comm'n v. United Fuel Gas Co., 317 U.S. 456, 469 (1943). This Court is not persuaded that the FTC's jurisdiction over this matter is so clearly lacking that Borden should not have to exhaust its administrative remedies.

It is so ordered.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION FOR JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL

On this 6th day of November, 1973, came on the above numbered and styled proceeding for hearing on motion of petitioners for civil and criminal contempt against the respondents. The Court, having heard the prima facie case of petitioner and the motion for judgment for corrected verdict and for judgment of acquittal orally entered by counsel for the respondent, finds that the respondent has abandoned its claim against the defendants for civil contempt, whereupon the Court carried respondent's motion for judgment of acquittal until completion of the case.

*Not otherwise reported. For case before the Commission, see 83 F.T.C. 676. See also p. 6[illegible] herein.

Upon close of the evidence the respondents reurged their motion for judgment of acquittal. The Court, having heard the remarks of counsel, found that the motion for judgment of acquittal for criminal contempt should be granted because the evidence was insufficient to support a judgment of guilty for criminal contempt whether the test used was proof by a preponderance of the evidence or by proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

It is, accordingly, the judgment of the Court that the defendants, jointly and severally, be acquitted of the charge for criminal contempt growing out of the Court's order of the injunction heretofore entered.

The within Order shall correct the oral statements of the Court entered into the record on November 6, 1973, at the close of the evidence, and the Clerk is directed to correct the clerical mistakes in the oral judgment order or other parts of the record resulting from the Court's oversight and ommissions as stand corrected by the within Order.

Order directing the Commission to submit, in camera, certain documents in response to a subpoena issued at the request of defendant, F. Lee Bailey, in a postal fraud case.

Before SIFLET, District Judge.

ORDER

The Court has before it a motion filed October 30, 1973 by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) and Charles O'Connell to quash a subpoena duces tecum issued against them by defendant Bailey. The cause came on for oral argument before the Court on October 31, 1973. Upon due consideration, it is the FTC shall have 30 days from the date hereof within which to submit to the Court in camera all correspondence and memoranda of communications occurring from January 1, 1971 to March 31, 1972 inclusive, between lawyers employed by the FTC and commissioners of the FTC concerning the proposed consent agreement between the FTC and Koscot Interplanetary, Inc. The FTC may indicate my memoranda attached to the submitted materials which items it contends defendants are not entitled to inspect and the reasons therefor.

2. In order for the Court to rule on specification #5 of the FTC subpoena, the FTC shall have 10 days from the date hereof within which to represent to the Court in camera what involvement, if any, it had in assisting, through investigation or otherwise, the prosecution in the preparation of this case.

3. Specification #4 of the FTC subpoena calling for its investigative file relating to certain defendants is quashed as being too broad.

4. The Court considers that the FTC has complied with specifications #2 and #3, and that, on the basis of his affidavit filed with the Court, Charles O'Connell has complied with the entire subpoena issued against him.

PARKER, D. J.: This Court issued a Memorandum Opinion and Order on October 9, 1973*, requiring the petitioner to file affidavits addressing themselves to particular questions of bad faith raised by the respondent in its counterclaim. A complete statement of the background of the controversy leading to the filing of the affidavits is contained in that opinion. The Court has received and reviewed the petitioner's affidavits, along with the response of the respondent and the prior submissions of the parties, and after careful consideration finds that the record does not raise a substantial question as to the good faith of the Commission in pursuing its investigation of the respondent. In particular, the Court finds that there is no substantial basis to support the respondent's contentions that: (1) the Commission or members of its staff deceived the respondent into supplying information with the intent to use the information against it; (2) information supplied by the respondent upon an agreement that it would be used only in connection with an investigation of other companies was knowingly used to initiate the formal investigation of, and subsequent compulsory process against, the respondent; and (3) the Commission or members of its staff intended to harass the respondent into supplying information.

It is not necessary to decide whether there was in fact a violation of an agreement restricting the use of information provided by the respondent to the Commission, or whether there was a failure to comply with Rule 2.6 of the Federal Trade Commission Rules of Practice because information was solicited from Gallo without it having been advised that it was the subject of an FTC investigation. Those questions are relevant to whether the information obtained by the Commission from Gallo is "tainted" by illegality, and would properly be raised at such time as the respondent is actually prejudiced by the attempted use of the information as evidence in an adjudicatory proceeding. The only material inquiry at this time is whether the record reasonably supports the allegation that the investigation of the respondent is the product of unfair or bad faith conduct by the Commission, so that it would be inequitable to grant it the relief which it is seeking. This inquiry has been answered in the negative. Thus the respondent is entitled to no relief, and its counterclaim will be dismissed and discovery denied. The respondent will be required to comply with the subpoena duces tecum issued by the petitioner.

*See p. 782 herein.

Accordingly, it is this 27th day of November, 1973,

Ordered that the motion of the petitioner to dismiss the respondent's counterclaim, or in the alternative, for summary judgment, be and hereby is granted, and the respondent's counterclaim is dismissed;

Further Ordered that discovery by the respondent be and hereby is denied; and it is Further Ordered that the respondent shall deliver to the offices of the Federal Trade Commission in Washington, D.C., the records and documents specified in the subpoena duces tecum issued by the Commission on June 5, 1972, at such time and to such persons as the Commission shall direct.

UNITED STATES v. ANCORP NATIONAL SERVICES, INC.*

No. 70 Civ. 5770. F.T.C. Docket 7396

(United States District Court, S.D. New York, November 30, 1973)

1. United States Barred by Statute of Limitations From Recovering Penalties for Violations Prior to December 31, 1965.

[1221] United States which brought action on December 31, 1970, to collect civil penalties from newsstand operator for violations of order of Federal Trade Commission prohibiting operator from receiving compensation from suppliers for services furnished in connection with sale of suppliers' products when operator knew the same compensation was not offered to its competitor was barred by statute of limitations from recovering penalties for payments received by newsstand operator prior to December 31, 1965.

2. Court Would Consider Wilfulness of Violations, Total Amount of Payments Received, Harm to Public From Violations and Financial Capacity to Pay Penalties Imposed in Assessing Amount of Penalties to be Imposed.

In assessing amount of penalties to be imposed for violation of order of Federal Trade Commission that newsstand operator cease and desist from receiving compensation from any supplier for services furnished in connection with sale of suppliers' products when operator knows or should know that such compensation is not affirmatively offered by suppliers on proportionately equal terms to all their other customers competing with newsstand operator, court would consider wilfulness of violations, total amounts of payments received by newsstand operator in violation of order, harm to public from the violations and financial capacity of operator to pay whatever penalties were imposed.

*Reported in 367 F. Supp. 1221 (1973). For case before the Commission, see In the Matter of American News Company, et al., 58 F.T.C. 10; modified, 65 F.T.C. 294.

3. $204,200 IN PENALTIES WOULD BE IMPOSED ON DEFENDANT WHERE DEFENDANT NEVER INFORMED SUPPLIERS OF TERMS OF FTC ORDER REQUIRING IT NOT TO ACCEPT COMPENSATION AND $192,762.40 WAS RECEIVED IN COMPENSATION FROM THREE SUPPLIERS AFTER ISSUANCE OF ORDER AND NO HARM RESULTED TO THE PUBLIC.

Where newsstand operator never informed any of its suppliers of terms of Federal Trade Commission order requiring it not to accept compensation from any supplier for services connected with sale of suppliers' products when operator knew such compensation was not offered to its competitors but ignored order and received payments totaling $192,762.40 from three suppliers and violations of order did not result in harm to public, penalties of $2,500 for each of 42 violations, $2,500 for each of 38 violations involving another supplier, and $100 for each of 42 violations involving a third supplier would be imposed on newsstand operator.

4. DEFENDANT WOULD BE ENJOINED FROM FURTHER VIOLATING F.T.C. ORDER.

[1222] Newsstand operator would be enjoined from further violating order of Federal Trade Commission requiring it to cease and desist from receiving compensation from suppliers for services rendered in connection with sale of suppliers' products when operator knew or should have known that same compensation had not been offered to its competitors.

In suit to collect civil penalties, court held that penalties in amount of $204,200 would be imposed on defendant and that defendant would be enjoined from further violations of F.T.C. order requiring it to cease receiving compensation from suppliers for services furnished when it knew that the same compensation was not offered to its competitors.

OPINION

BONSAL, District Judge.

This is a suit by the Untied States to collect civil penalties in the amount of $585,000 from the defendant Ancorp National Services, Inc. ("Ancorp") for allegedly violating a final Cease and Desist Order of the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") issued on April 13, 1964 ("the FTC Order"). The United States also seeks a permanent injunction. Jurisdiction is alleged under 15 U.S.C. §§ 45(l) and 56, and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1337, 1345, and 1355.

On February 5, 1959, the Federal Trade Commission filed an administrative complaint, charging respondents American News Company (now Ancorp) and Union News Company (now a subdivision of Ancorp) with unfair competitive practices. The complaint charged the respondents with having violated section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act by inducing and coercing suppliers to make payments or to grant allowances as compensation for services or facilities furnished in connection with the sale of such suppliers' products on respondents' newsstands when respondents knew or should have known that such payments were not being offered or made available on proportionally equal terms to all customers of such suppliers who were in competition with the respondents. On January 10, 1961, after an administrative hearing, the FTC issued a Cease and Desist Order. On February 7, 1962, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit modified the FTC Order and affirmed it as modified. American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F.2d 104 (2d Cir. 1962). On October 8, 1962, the Supreme Court denied respondent's petition for a writ of certiorari. 371 U.S. 824, 83 S.Ct. 44, 9 L.Ed.2d 64 (1962). The FTC Order of April 13, 1964 became final on May 13, 1964, 15 U.S.C. § 45(i), and has been in effect at all times relevant to this action.

The FTC Order as modified provided:

> IT IS ORDERED that the respondents, The American News Company and the Union News Company, corporations, their officers, employees, agents or representatives, directly or through any corporate or other device, in or in connection with the purchase in commerce, as "commerce" is defined in the Federal Trade Commission Act, of products for resale on newsstands operated by respondents, do forthwith cease and desist from:
>> Receiving, or inducing and receiving, or contracting for the receipt of, anything of value from any of their suppliers as compensation or in consideration for display or promotional services or facilities furnished by or through respondents in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of products purchased from any of their suppliers, when respondents know or should know that such compensation or consideration is not affirmatively offered or otherwise made available by such suppliers on proportionally equal terms to all their other customers competing with respondents in the sale and distribution of such suppliers' products.

[1223] This action was instituted on December 31, 1970.[1] The complaint alleges that the defendant received "compensation" in varying amounts from three newspapers in New York City (The New York Times, The Daily News, and The Post) in connection with promoting and displaying these newspapers on its newsstands; that the defendant knew or should have known that such compensation was not offered or otherwise made available by the three newspapers on proportionally equal terms to all of their newsstand customers; and that by receiving such compensation, the defendant violated the FTC Order quoted above. The complaint comprises three counts: count 1 relates to The New York Times; count 2, to The Daily News; and count 3, to The Post.

[1] The complaint alleges that these payments began at "some time prior to December 1965" and continued to shortly before the filing of the complaint. Payments allegedly received prior to December 31, 1965, however, are barred by the five-year statute of limitations which applies to civil penalty actions. 28 U.S.C. § 2462.

[1] There is no dispute that before initiation of this suit the facts which gave rise to it were properly certified by the FTC to the Attorney General of the United States as required by section 16 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 56.

On the basis of the testimony of Mr. Ivan Veit, Executive Vice President, and Mr. Thomas McVeigh, Corporate Controller of the Times, and the exhibits received during the trial, the Court finds that each month from January, 1961 to July, 1969 the Union News Company billed the Times for "Rental of Space in Newsstands for New York Times Advertising Signs" and that the Times paid these bills. The payments from January, 1961 to August, 1963 were in the amount of $2,000 per month; they were increased in August, 1963 to $2,587.20 per month ($4.90 per stand for 528 stands).

On the basis of the testimony of Mr. William Carey, Circulation Manager, and Mr. Jack Underwood, Vice President and Director of Sales of The Daily News, and the exhibits received during the trial, the Court finds that each week from June 1, 1964 to March 3, 1969, except for periods—prior to 1966—when the Daily News was not published as a result of a strike, the Union News Company billed the Daily News for "Advertising Service" and that the Daily News paid these bills. The payments were in the amount of $500 per week.

On the basis of the testimony of Mr. Byron Greenberg, Circulation Director of the Post, and the exhibits received during the trial, the Court finds that from July, 1964 to June, 1969 the Union News Company billed the Post for "Advertising Service" and that the Post paid these bills. The payments were in the amount of $50 per month.

On the issue of the defendant's knowledge and intent, the Court received evidence as to payments made by other New York City newspapers to the Union News Company. On the basis of the deposition of Mr. Roy I. Newborn, who was Circulation Director of the now defunct New York Herald Tribune from 1961 to 1964, the Court finds that the Herald Tribune paid fees for advertising services on a monthly basis totalling $12,000 to $15,000 a year. That arrangement lasted until the Herald Tribune ceased publication on April 24, 1966. On the basis of the testimony of Mr. John Potulny, Manager of the field operations group of Dow Jones and Company (which publishes the Wall Street Journal), the Court finds that from the fall of 1965 to January, 1968, the Wall Street Journal made payments to Union News as a "promotional allowance" in the amount of $500 per month.

On the basis of the testimony of Mr. Nathan Goldstein, Mr. Jack Underwood, Mr. William Carey, and Mr. Byron Greenberg, the Court finds that Union News never inquired of the Times, the Daily News, or the Post whether payments were being offered to other news-[1224] stand operators in competition with Union News on a proportionally equal basis.[2] And the testimony at trial shows that the three newspapers did not in fact offer to make such payments to competitors.

[2] Defendant contends that since its stands were better lit, more fully stocked, open for longer hours, staffed by unionized sales employees, occupied more desirable locations, and were subject to more stringent regulations by its landlords (railroads, airports, and bus terminals), it had no competitors to whom proportionally equal terms could have been offered. The evidence, however, established that defendant's stands competed with other retail newspaper dealers in that they purchased the same products from the same suppliers and resold these products unaltered in the same market.

Defendant contends on the basis of the testimony of Mr. William McCollough (President of Ancorp) that the payments received were not true advertising allowances, but rather price allowances, and that they were made as part of an effort to increase Ancorp's profits on the sale of newspapers. However, the invoices sent out to the three newspapers by Union News, which were received in evidence, themselves indicated that they were for advertising services. Moreover, Mr. McCollough acknowledged that the Union News Company received posters from the three newspapers to be displayed on its newsstands.[3]

The proof establishes and the Court finds that the following monthly payments were received by the Union News Company on or after January 1, 1966 in violation of the FTC Order:

From the New York Times (from January 1, 1966 to July 1, 1969)	42
From the Daily News (from January 1, 1966 to March 3, 1969)[4]	38
From the Post (from January 1, 1966 to July 1, 1969)	42
Total number of violations of the Order	[5] 122

Penalties

The United States is seeking to recover the maximum penalty of $5,000 for each violation of the Order (15 U.S.C. § 45(l)).

[2] In assessing the amount of penalties to be imposed for each violation, the relevant factors are: the wilfullness of the violations, the total amounts of the payments received by the defendant in violation of the FTC Order, the harm to the public from the violations, and the financial capacity of the defendant to pay whatever penalties are imposed. See United States v. J. B. Williams Co., 354 F. Supp. 521, 548 (S.D.N.Y. 1973); United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 351 F. Supp. 969 (D.Minn.1972); United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 234 F. Supp. 710 (S.D.N.Y.1964), aff'd, 352 F.2d 62 (2d Cir. 1965); United States v. American Greetings Corp., 168 F. Supp. 45 (N.D.Ohio 1958), aff'd 272 F.2d 935 (6th Cir. 1959).

The evidence at trial indicates that Mr. Henry Garfinkle, President of the Union News Company in 1963, sent a memorandum dated March 8, 1963 to the other officers and executives of Union News informing them of the FTC Order and Instructing them to familiarize themselves with it and to report promptly any information that might indicate a potential violation. There was no evidence, however, of any other action taken by any officer of Union News to assure compliance with the FTC Order. The payments for advertising services, which the evidence indicates that Mr. Garfinkle helped to negotiate with the three newspapers, continued without [1225] change from 1961 to 1969, when they were unilaterally cancelled by the newspapers. There was no evidence that Union News ever attempted to inform any of the newspapers from which it was receiving payments of the terms of the FTC Order or to inquire whether proportionally equal terms were offered by them to competitors of Union News. Rather, the evidence indicates that, with the exception of Mr. Garfinkle's memorandum, Union News ignored the FTC Order.[6]

[3] This issue was presented to the Court of Appeals, which said: "[E]ven if these payments were all no more than disguised price adjustments, as petitioners contend, they would nevertheless violate § 2(d) [of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(d), which] was aimed explicitly at promotional allowances which have the effect of price adjustments." 300 F.2d at 109.

[4] The evidence indicates that payments were made on a weekly basis. The complaint's prayer for relief, however, speaks only in terms of monthly violations. For consistency, the Court adopts the monthly basis for calculating the number of violations.

[5] The government's brief indicates that the total number of violations was 117. The Court's addition, however, is 122.

With respect to the total payments received, the evidence shows that during the period from January 1, 1966 to the termination of the arrangements with the three newspapers in 1969, Union News received payments in violation of the FTC Order totalling $108,662.40 from the Times, $82,000.00 from the Daily News, and $2,100.00 from the Post; combined, these payments total $192,762.40.[7]

There is no evidence that the payments had any effect on the amount of Union newsstands' business nor on the price of newspapers sold to the public. The testimony indicates that Union newsstands sell newspapers within the City of New York at the cover price, as do their competitors. The competition that does exist among newsstands is primarily on the basis of their location and the number of items they carry. Since the evidence is speculative and inconclusive, the Court finds that harm to the public has not been demonstrated.

Ancorp is a conglomerate owning restaurants, snack bars, cafeterias, vending machines, catering facilities, drug stores, tobacco shops, and general merchandise marts as well as newsstands. It also engages in the wholesaling of books, matches, tobacco products, candy, stationery, art supplies, office furniture and equipment, and background music systems. For 1968, its net income was $2,784,054; for 1969, $2,305,026; for 1970, $1,275,847; and for 1971, $83,506. The unaudited Consolidated Statement of Operations and Retained Earnings for the year ending December 29, 1972 shows an operating loss for the year in the amount of $13,672,953. The unaudited Consolidated Balance Sheet shows current liabilities of $51,943,210 against current assets of $27,682,578 and an earned deficit of −$4,576,648. On March 20, 1973, Chapter XI proceedings were instituted by Ancorp, seeking an arrangement with its creditors, which proceedings are presently pending in New York City.

[6] While defendant contends that it mistakenly believed the Order to apply only to the sale of magazines and not newspapers, the Order's language is inclusive, referring to "products purchased from any of [its] suppliers."

[7] The government contends that the total amount received by Union News from all its newspaper suppliers since January 1, 1966 was $237,094, though the complaint only alleged violations with respect to the Times, the Daily News, and the Post.

[3] On the basis of the factors discussed above, the Court imposes the following penalties on the defendant for the violations of the FTC Order found above:

On count 1: $2,500 for each of 42 violations	$105,000
On count 2: $2,500 for each of 38 violations	95,000
On count 3: $100 for each of 42 violations	4,200
Total penalties	204,200

[4] The United States is entitled to a judgment against the defendant in the amount of $204,200, and costs. In addition, a permanent injunction will be issued enjoining defendant Ancorp from further violations of the FTC Order.

The foregoing constitutes the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law. F.R.Civ.P. 52(a).

Settle judgment on notice.

Order

The Court has considered in camera the seventeen directive-type minutes and the investigatory files submitted for inspection by the Defendant. The Court finds that both are exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) 5 and 7 respectively. The minutes submitted do not contain private transmittals of binding agency opinions and interpretations constituting "secret law" but are solely intra-agency memos reflecting the Commission's decision-making processes. As such they are not discoverable. Sterling Drug, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 146 U.S. App. D.C. 237, 450 F.2d 698, 708, 709 (1971). The investigatory files are beyond a doubt correctly classified as such. Under Weissberg v. U.S. Department of Justice, D.C. Cir. No. 71–1026, October 24, 1973, slip. op. at 14–15, such documents are also non-discoverable.

The Court finds that the Defendant has, therefore, complied with the Court's memorandum orders and the Freedom of Information Act, and it is this 22nd day of December, 1973, Decreed, Ordered and Adjudged that the Defendant's Renewed Motion for Summary Judgment be and is hereby granted.

73 Civ. 3406. F.T.C. Docket 8899.

(United States District Court, Southern District of New York, December 26, 1973)

On request for stay of proceedings, court held that allegations by plaintiff that it would have been irremedially deprived of property rights if proceedings were not stayed and that F.T.C. was acting outside its statutory authority were not reasons for the court to make exception to the general rule requiring exhaustion of administrative remedies before review by court. Fact that another government agency had approved, as true, a statement appearing on plaintiff's product label did not preclude F.T.C. from alleging that plaintiff deceptively misused a scientifically correct statement. Request denied.

Memorandum Opinion and Order

Motley, D. J.: Plaintiff, Sterling Drug Inc., manufacturers of Lysol Brand Disinfectants, asserting jurisdiction under the United States Constitution, Amendment V, the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C., § 551 et seq., and 28 U.S.C., §§ 1331, 1337, 1651 and 2201, asked this court to stay certain proceedings of defendant Federal Trade Commission (F.T.C.), scheduled to commence on December 3, 1973, and for other declaratory and injunctive relief. Plaintiff claimed that it would have been irreparably harmed by appearing at the F.T.C. proceedings investigating possibly deceptive advertising of plaintiff's product. Plaintiff further claimed that the F.T.C. was acting ultra vires in that the statement in question, to wit Lysol "kills * * * germs on environmental surfaces", having been approved by the Environmental Protection Agency (E.P.A.) as scientifically correct could not thereafter be challenged by the F.T.C.

In response to plaintiff's complaint, defendants moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Upon plaintiff's filing of its motion to stay, defendant renewed its motion to dismiss.

[*] Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. ¶74,846, at 95,779 (1973-2 Trade Cases). Notice of appeal filed on February 22, 1974, with the 2nd Cir. from so much of the order as dismisses the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. For case before the Commission, see 84 F.T.C. 547.

Defendant argued that while the accuracy of the package statement was a matter for the E.P.A., the advertising use to which an approved statement is put remains the concern of the F.T.C. Here, the F.T.C. objects to the use of the statement in advertisements which claim that utilizing plaintiff's product will prevent colds, since the current state of the medical art is that colds are generally caused by air borne germs. In addition, defendant points out that plaintiff's resort to the court is premature. Defendant notes that plaintiff can challenge the jurisdiction of the F.T.C. hearing to the F.T.C., that plaintiff would not be harmed by proceeding, and that jurisdictional objections are reviewable after final agency action.

The court grants defendant's motion and denies plaintiff's motion for the reasons which follow.

Under federal statute and established cases, a party invoking the authority of a district court to challenge the proceedings of a federal agency will ordinarily be required to exhaust the available administrative remedies. After exhaustion, interlocutory as well as final determinations are subject to court review. 5 U.S.C., § 704 (formerly Section 10(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act) provides in part that any "preliminary, procedural, or intermediate agency action or ruling not directly reviewable is subject to review on the review of the final agency action." More specifically, the Federal Trade Commission Act provides that a party dissatisfied with the results of a F.T.C. determination shall petition the appropriate Circuit Court to "affirm, enforce, modify or set aside orders of the Commission [and that jurisdiction in the Circuit Court] shall be exclusive." 15 U.S.C. 45(d). Furthermore, recent Second Circuit cases have demonstrated the inappropriateness of seeking equitable relief in the district court prior to the completion of the administrative process. Pepsico, Inc. v. FTC, 472 F. 2d 179, 185 (2d Cir. 1972); Bristol-Myers Company v. FTC, 469 F. 2d 1116, 1117 (2d Cir. 1972). Thus, under the statutory scheme, plaintiff may object to the jurisdiction of the F.T.C. in this matter before the Commission itself and, if unsuccessful, appeal that decision to the Court of Appeals at the conclusion of Commission proceedings.

The court recognizes the existence of certain narrowly defined exceptions to the exhaustion and ripeness principles outlined above. In particular, plaintiff asks the court to enjoin the F.T.C. hearings on the authority of Fay v. Dowds, 172 F. 2d 720 (2d Cir. 1949), wherein the irremedial deprivation of property rights was made the basis for permitting injunctive relief. Here plaintiff has failed to demonstrate what harm, if any, it may suffer by complying with the F.T.C.'s directive to proceed to the hearing. Plaintiff's assertion that its good will and market position would be injured by the mere commencement of proceedings was unpersuasive. Since the challenged advertisements had not been used in the last two years, plaintiff could not be heard to complain of damages to its current advertising compaign. Where the only harm to plaintiff is the inconvenience of attending the hearing, the court is without power to grant the extraordinary relief demanded by plaintiff. (Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 51–52 [1938].) Indeed, the public interest requires an investigation into allegations, made in good faith, of deceptive advertising. Such hearings may result in favor of plaintiff. If they do not, plaintiff may appeal the unfavorable findings as to jurisdiction and substance to the Commission and then, if necessary, to the Court of Appeals.

Plaintiff further sought to bring itself within a second exception to the exhaustion requirement which permits judicial intervention when an agency has acted in a manner clearly contrary to the governing statute. See, Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184 (1958); Oestereich v. Selective Service Local Board No. 16, 396 U.S. 460 (1970). By alleging that the proposed F.T.C. action overlapped with the authority of the E.P.A., plaintiff attempted to convince the court that the F.T.C. was acting beyond its jurisdiction and that the proposed F.T.C. action was properly a matter for the E.P.A.. However, no such overlap exists. The record indicates that the E.P.A. has made no order respecting the disease prevention claims challenged by theF.T.C. The E.P.A. merely approved a label statement, which while true, the F.T.C. now claims was used in a deceptive manner. The E.P.A. is within its proper authority to investigate performance claims of the plaintiff's product, "Lysol", 7 U.S.C., § 135a(a)(1), § 135b(a)(1)(4), and the F.T.C. is apparently within its authority in this case which authority includes the power to investigate deceptive advertising, which by definition includes the misleading use of an approved scientifically correct statement, 15 U.S.C. 45(a) and (b).

The plaintiff having failed to demonstrate its inclusion in either of the recognized exceptions to the exhaustion requirement discussed above, the court finds the invocation of judicial authority premature and hereby denies plaintiff's motion to stay the scheduled F.T.C. hearings, and grants defendant's motion, thereby dismissing the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

So Ordered.

SYDNEY N. FLOERSHEIM v. LEWIS A. ENGMAN, ET AL.*

No. 72-1622. F.T.C. Docket 8721.

(United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, December 26, 1973)

1. COMPLAINT SEEKING DECLARATION THAT REVISED FORMS CONFORMED TO REQUIREMENTS OF F.T.C. CEASE AND DESIST ORDER FAILED TO RAISE ISSUE APPROPRIATE FOR JUDICIAL REVIEW AND HAD TO BE DISMISSED FOR LACK OF SUBJECT-MATTER JURISDICTION IN THE DISTRICT COURT, THE APPELLATE COURT ORIGINALLY AFFIRMING CEASE AND DESIST ORDER BEING UNIQUELY QUALIFIED TO INTERPRET ITS OWN ORDER.

[950] Complaint of forms seller, which had been ordered by the Federal Trade Commission to cease and desist from certain deceptive practices and to file a report of compliance, seeking a declaration that its revised forms, despite F.T.C.'s determination to the contrary, did conform to the requirements of the cease and desist order failed to raise an issue appropriate for judicial review and had to be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction in the district court for the District of Columbia, as judicial consideration in advance of an enforcement sanction is reserved only for a case of exceptional need and unfairness, and as the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which originally affirmed the cease and desist order, was the court uniquely qualified to interpret its own order.

2. SECTION OF F.T.C. ACT PROVIDING FOR REVIEW OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS BY THE COURTS OF APPEALS DOES NOT CONTEMPLATE REVIEW OF F.T.C. DETERMINATION THAT A PROPOSED COURSE OF ACTION WILL VIOLATE A CEASE AND DESIST ORDER.

Federal Trade Commission Act section providing for review by the Courts of Appeals of cease and desist orders does not contemplate review of a determination by the FTC that a proposed course of action will violate an outstanding cease and desist order.

3. CRIMINAL CONTEMPT IS ESSENTIALLY RESERVED FOR WILLFUL CONTUMACY.

Criminal contempt is essentially reserved for willful contumacy and not good faith disagreement.

4. EQUITABLE LIMITATIONS INHERENT IN GOVERNMENT'S REMEDIES ARE A SUBSTANTIAL PROTECTION FOR A RESPONDENT WITH REASONABLE AND BONA FIDE CLAIM AS TO UNREASONABLENESS OF THE ORDER.

Equitable limitations inherent in the government's remedies for noncompliance with an order of the Federal Trade Commission are a substantial protection for a respondent with a reasonable and bona fide claim as to the unreasonableness of the order.

*Reported in 494 F.2d 949 (1973). For case before the Commission, see 73 F.T.C. 134; see also p. 220 herein.

5. A CEASE AND DESIST ORDER OF F.T.C., AS AFFIRMED, IS IN ESSENCE A JUDICIAL DECREE.

A cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission, as affirmed, is in essence a judical decree, although the statute grants the major role in enforcement to the FTC.

6. COURT'S INHERENT AUTHORITY TO CONSTRUE ITS MANDATE APPLIES TO JUDGMENT OF FEDERAL COURT OF APPEALS OF THE ORDER OF A FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY.

A court's inherent authority to construe its mandate applies to the judgment of a federal Court of Appeals entered upon review of the order of a federal administrative agency.

7. SCOPE OF ORDER IS A MATTER TO BE TAKEN UP WITH THE AGENCY BEFORE ANY APPLICATION IS MADE TO THE COURT.

Where court's mandate is entered on the basis of an agency's cease and desist order, the scope of the order is a matter to be taken up with the agency before any application is made to the court.

8. JUDICIAL CLARIFICATION IS APPROPRIATE ONLY IF MANDATE OF AGENCY AND COURT IS GENUINELY UNCLEAR.

Business of supervising compliance with cease and desist orders under the Federal Trade Commission Act is that of the FTC, and only if the mandate of the agency and court is genuinely unclear may judicial clarification be appropriate.

9. DECISION TO ENTERTAIN A PETITION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDER OF FTC RESTS IN THE SOUND DISCRETION OF THE COURT.

Decision to entertain a petition for construction of a cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission rests in the sound discretion of the court and will be permitted only to effectuate the purposes of the Federal Trade Commission Act; and such is a possibility for only the rare and exceptional case.

10. CLAIM THAT F.T.C. WAS TAKING A MORE RIGOROUS VIEW OF THE REQUIREMENTS OF ORDER THAN RESPONDENT CONSIDERED SOUND WAS NOT BASIS FOR ADVANCE JUDICIAL CONSIDERATION FOR SCOPE OF ORDER.

[951] Claim that the Federal Trade Commission was taking a more rigorous view of the requirements of cease and desist order than respondent considered sound was not a basis for advance judicial consideration of the scope of the order.

11. CLARIFICATION OF AN EQUITABLE DECREE IS OBTAINABLE ONLY FROM THE COURT GRANTING IT.

Clarification of an equitable decree can be obtained only from the court granting it.

12. F.T.C. ACT DOES NOT AUTHORIZE ANY DISTRICT COURT ACTION FOR DECLARATORY JUDGMENT.

No district court action for declaratory judgment is authorized by the Federal Trade Commission Act.

13. WHERE RISK OF PENALTIES IS SO COERCIVE AS TO DENY DUE PROCESS, PERSON MAY HAVE RELIEF IN EQUITY TO AVOID INVALID OFFICIAL ACTION.

Person may have relief in equity to avoid invalid official action where the risks of penalties, if he is remitted to defense of enforcement actions, is so coercive as to be a denial of due process.

14. IN SEEKING DECLARATION OF CONFORMITY TO F.T.C. ORDER, EVEN IF PLAINTIFF'S CASE FALLS WITHIN RARE SITUATION OF REQUIRING JUDICIAL INTERPOSITION, COURT WHERE MANDATE WAS ENTERED, i.e., NINTH CIRCUIT, NOT DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DISTRICT COURT HAD JURISDICTION.

Even if plaintiff's case, seeking a declaration that it had conformed to the requirements of cease and desist order issued by the Federal Trade Commission, did fall within the rare situation of one that calls for judicial interposition before any enforcement action is begun by the FTC, plaintiff would have to obtain his relief from the ninth circuit whose mandate had been entered on plaintiff's petition for review of the cease and desist order; that court, not the District of Columbia district court, had jurisdiction to grant the relief sought.

On appeal, the court held that complaint failed to raise an issue appropriate for judicial review and had to be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction in the District Court, as advance judicial consideration of enforcement sanction is reserved for case of exceptional need and unfairness, and as the court affirming the cease and desist order was uniquely qualified to interpret its own order.

Before WRIGHT, LEVENTHAL, and ROBB, Circuit Judges.

LEVENTHAL, Circuit Judge:

Appellant sells to creditors and debt-collection agencies certain forms used to trace allegedly delinquent debtors ("skip-tracer forms") and to induce them to pay their debts ("payment demand" forms). The Federal Trade Commission's order of February 5, 1968, required appellant (1) to cease and desist from certain deceptive and misleading practices with respect to the appearance and content of these forms and (2) to file a report of compliance as required by 16 C.F.R. § 3.61. The order was affirmed by the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. Floersheim v. FTC, 411 F.2d 874 (9th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1002, 90 S.Ct. 551, 24 L.Ed.2d 494 (1970).

[1] Responding to the direction to file a compliance report, appellant submitted a set of revised forms to the Commission on February

10, 1970. On April 10, the FTC determined that the forms did not conform to the terms of the cease and desist order, and consequently rejected them. Appellant then brought an action in the District Court for the District of Columbia, seeking (a) a declaration that the forms did indeed conform to the requirements of the cease and desist order and (b) an injunction restraining the FTC from seeking civil penalties for non-compliance with its order, as provided by 15 U.S.C. §§ 45(l) and 56. The District Court granted the FTC's motion for summary judgment on the merits, and Floersheim appealed. We conclude that appellant's complaint fails to raise an issue appropriate for judicial review and must be dismissed for lack of subject-matter ju [952] risdiction in the District Court.[1] Such jurisdiction must be based either on the Federal Trade Commission Act itself or the Administrative Procedure Act, and neither law permits this kind of action.

I. REVIEW UNDER THE FTC ACT

[2] The Federal Trade Commission Act does not in terms authorize review of Commission interpretations of cease and desist orders. The only section of the Act that provides for judicial review is section 5(c), 5 U.S.C. § 45(c), providing for review by the courts of appeals of cease and desist orders. Appellant however does not seek review of the FTC's cease and desist order; that order has already been reviewed and held valid, Floersheim v. FTC, supra. He asks the court to review the Commission's determination that his proposed course of action would violate the outstanding order. Such review is not contemplated by section 5. Section 5 deals with judicial review of the cease and desist order; it is not until that review has been completed (or waived) that the order becomes final, see 15 U.S.C. § 45(g), and it is only then that the respondent has the duty of compliance.

Our conclusion in this regard is in accord with the decisions of other courts. In Robertson v. FTC, 415 F.2d 49 (4th Cir. 1969), petitioner, a member of a board of trade subject to a cease and desist order, sought review of a mode of compliance accepted by the FTC that worked to petitioner's individual detriment. The court dismissed the petition for review for lack of jurisdiction.

In Rettinger v. FTC, 392 F.2d 454 (2d Cir. 1968), the Commission changed its interpretation of an order ten years after it became final. Petitioner, who had been acting in reliance on the earlier interpretation during the intervening years, sought to reopen the proceedings. The court declined to treat petitioner's action as one to reopen and modify an earlier cease and desist order, as provided by section 5(b) of the FTC Act. Rather, the court held that petitioner was actually seeking review of a changed Commission interpretation of the earlier order. Noting that the equities of petitioner's position were "appealing," the court nonetheless held that it had "no jurisdiction to review under the Federal Trade Commission Act." 392 F.2d at 457.[2]

[1] FTC failed to file a cross-appeal. However, the question of jurisdiction is one "the court is bound to ask and answer for itself, even when not otherwise suggested, and without respect to the relation of the parties to it." Mansfield, Coldwater & Lake Michigan Ry. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 382, 4 S.Ct. 510, 511, 28 L.Ed. 462 (1884). See also State Farm Fire & Cas. Co. v. Tashire, 386 U.S. 523, 87 S.Ct. 1199, 18 L.Ed.2d 270 (1967); American Fire & Cas. Co. v. Finn, 341 U.S. 6, 71 S.Ct. 534, 95 L.Ed. 702 (1951).

Petitioner complains that inability to obtain expeditious consideration of an unlawful FTC view of the requirements of a cease and desist order places him in an intolerable position. Either he acquiesces in an erroneous and hence unlawful position by the Commission or he faces the prospect of civil penalties of up to $5000 a day, recovered in an action brought by the United States for violation of a cease and desist order of the Commission after it has become final, if he should use the proposed forms. 15 U.S.C. § 45(l). Indeed, he is also exposed to criminal contempt for willful disobedience of the court's mandate. 18 U.S.C. § 401.

[3] Petitioner's sketch of an unfairly onerous choice is too darkly drawn by far. Criminal contempt is essentially reserved for willful contumacy and not good faith disagreement, see In re Floersheim, 316 F.2d 423 (9th Cir. 1963). And the statutory provision for [953] civil recovery of penalties of $5000 a day refers to a maximum, not a minimum. There is room for leniency by the court, if petitioner's view of the meaning of the order is plausible and not defiant.

[4, 5] The equitable limitations inherent in the Government's remedies are a substantial protection for a respondent with a reasonable and bona fide claim. Moreover, that person has some right of access, albeit narrow, to an equitable remedy under the FTC Act. A cease and desist order, as affirmed, is in essence a judicial decree, although the statute grants the major role in enforcement to the FTC, United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 643, 70 S.Ct. 357, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950). We do not think that Congress intended to deny the right generally available to those subject to court order to petition the court for clarification of a genuinely ambiguous decree, under the procedure invoked in New York v. New Jersey, 296 U.S. 259, 56 S.Ct. 188, 80 L.Ed. 214 (1935).[3]

[6] A court's inherent authority to construe its mandate applies to the judgment of a Federal court of appeals entered upon review of the order of a Federal administrative agency. This was established in Regal Knitwear Co. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 9, 65 S.Ct. 478, 89 L.Ed. 661 (1945). The Supreme Court had before it the issue whether an appellate court's judgment enforcing an NLRB cease and desist order could extend to the petitioner's "successors and assigns." Since no successor or assign was before the Court, it decided not to decide the question in the abstract. It noted, however, that rather than run the risk of contempt of court, parties could > petition the court granting it [the enforcement order] for a modification or construction of the order. Cf. New Jersey v. New York City, 296 U.S. 259 [56 S.Ct. 188, 80 L.Ed. 214]. While such relief would be in the sound discretion of the court, we think courts would not be apt to withhold a clarification in the light of a concrete situation that left parties or "successors and assigns" in the dark as to their duty toward the court. Enforcement orders are issued to effectuate the purposes of the Act, not for the entrapment of parties, and courts no less than parties desire to avoid unwitting contempts as well as to punish deliberate ones.

[2] In Vulcanizd Rubber & Plastics Co. v. FTC, 103 U.S.App.D.C. 384, 258 F.2d 684 (1958), petitioner urged that an FTC cease and desist order, as interpreted, was unlawful. Observing that "this interpretation may be changed or it may never be enforced," we held that there was "no controversy calling for judicial review of the interpretation at the present time."

[3] The Court had enjoined New York City from dumping "any garbage or refuse" into waters off the coast of New Jersey. Failure to comply would have subjected the city to penalties of up to $5000 a day. A dispute arose as to whether "garbage" included sedimentation. New York City petitioned the Court for a clarification of its decree. The Supreme Court granted the petition and held that New York's proposed course of action did not violate the injunction.

[7] These standards should govern the availability of judicial construction of the terms of a cease and desist order, with one modification: Where the court's mandate is entered on the basis of an agency's cease and desist order, the scope of the order is a matter to be taken up with the agency before any application is made to the court.

[8–10] The business of supervising compliance with cease and desist orders under § 5 of the Act is that of the FTC, United States v. Morton Salt, supra. Only if the mandate of the agency and court is genuinely unclear may judicial clarification be appropriate. And as stated in Regal Knitwear, supra, the decision to entertain a petition for construction of an order rests "in the sound discretion of the court" and would be permitted only to "effectuate the purposes of the Act." This is a possibility for the rare and exceptional case. We do not anticipate a procedure whereby every rejection of proferred compliance would constitute an occasion for review; such an approach would not effectuate the purpose of the Act but confound it, [954] for it would provide a technique for delaying indefinitely the enforcement of cease and desist orders[5] and for clogging the courts whose review of orders is part of the statutory scheme. The claim that FTC is taking a more rigorous view of the requirement of the order than the respondent considers sound is not a basis for advance judicial consideration. This is the kind of point that can be raised when an enforcement sanction is pursued (civil penalty or criminal contempt), for there is opportunity there to obtain a softening of penalty for a construction that is bona fide and reasonable even though ultimately rejected. Advance judicial consideration under the doctrine of Regal Knitwear is reserved for the case of exceptional need and unfairness.

[4] Accord, Empire National Bank of Clarksburg v. Penfield Coal & Coke Co., 354 F.2d 873 (3d Cir. 1966).

[5] We note also that the policy behind § 5(g) of the Act, setting the time at which the order becomes final, is to "enforce obedience to the Commission's orders to cease and desist. * * *" H.Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., at 4 (1937). Such a policy would be ill-served by introducing into the process an occasion for delay.

[11, 12] Most important for present purposes, clarification of an equitable decree can be obtained only from "the court granting it." Regal Knitwear v. NLRB, supra, 324 U.S. at 15, 65 S.Ct. 478, 89 L.Ed. 661. The court of appeals that originally affirmed the cease and desist order has had the parties and issues before it. It is palpably the court uniquely qualified to interpret its own order, and judicial economy requires that it be the only forum before which questions of interpretation be raised. Appellant's proper course, then, would have been to petition the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit for a clarification of its decree. No district court action for a declaratory judgment is authorized by the Federal Trade Commission Act.

II. REVIEW IN DISTRICT COURT

[13] Appellant has in this case brought an action in district court to review the error of the FTC—naturally, assailed as arbitrary and capricous action—in setting forth the scope of the cease and desist order. It is by now settled doctrine that a person may have relief in equity to avoid invalid official action where the risk of penalties, if he is remitted to defense of enforcement actions, is so coercive as to be a denial of due process. Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 28 S.Ct. 441, 52 L.Ed. 714 (1908). Equitable doctrine has been advanced with the presumptions of reviewability in the Administrative Procedure Act as to agency regulations or orders that have presently compulsive and coercive effects. Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967). The doctrine has been extended, with certain limitations, to an agency action that constitutes a general interpretation on the highest level, presenting a controversy fully ripe for review. National Automatic Laundry & Cleaning Council v. Schultz, 143 U.S.App.D.C. 274, 443 F.2d 689 (1971). The circumstances and equities presented by appellant are of an entirely different, and lesser, order of magnitude, and appellant makes no comparable case for judicial interposition.

[14] If appellant's case does fall within the rare situation of one that calls for judicial interposition before any enforcement action is begun, he must obtain his relief from the Ninth Circuit whose mandate was entered on appellant's petition for review. That court has jurisdiction. Regal Knitwear v. NLRB, supra. It may be unlikely to give relief, but it is open. There is no jurisdiction in the District Court to give the relief sought.

The appeal, which seeks to resist a judgment dismissing the complaint, cannot be sustained. The case is remanded to the District Court with instructions to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction.

So ordered.

UNITED STATES v. SWINGLINE, INC.*

No. 71-C-1236. F.T.C. Docket No. 8759.

(United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, January 17, 1974)

1. IN CIVIL PENALTY PROCEEDING EVIDENCE DID NOT ESTABLISH IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE; IT MERELY ESTABLISHED THAT COMPLIANCE WOULD HAVE REQUIRED MORE INTENSIVE EFFORT THAN DEFENDANT WAS WILLING TO MAKE

   In Federal Trade Commission's proceeding for civil penalty for failure to comply with divestiture order, evidence at most established that compliance would have been difficult and would have required more intensive effort than defendant was willing to make, and did not establish impossibility of performance.

2. LACK OF DILIGENCE IN ATTEMPTING TO COMPLY WITH DIVESTITURE ORDER, NOT WILLFUL DELAY, PREVENTED AFFIRMATIVE FINDING OF GOOD FAITH

   In Federal Trade Commission's proceeding for civil penalty for failure to comply with divestiture order, evidence permitted finding that delay was not willful, but lack of diligence in attempting to comply prevented affirmative finding of good faith.

3. IMPOSITION OF CIVIL PENALTY DOES NOT DEPEND ON WILLFULNESS

   Civil penalty is somewhat like punishment for civil contempt, in that its imposition does not depend on willfulness.

4. IN SUPPORTING A FINDING OF CIVIL CONTEMPT, LACK OF DILIGENT EFFORT TO COMPLY WITH ORDER IS SIGNIFICANT

   Disobedience of court order need not be willful in order to support finding of civil contempt; while mere negligence may not be enough, lack of diligent effort to comply with order is significant.

5. IF DEFENDANT DOES NOT CREATE HIS OWN INABILITY, THEN INABILITY TO COMPLY WITH COURT ORDER MAY BE DEFENSE TO JUDGMENT OF CONTEMPT

   Inability to comply with court order may be a defense to judgment of contempt, but not if defendant creates his own inability.

6. ARGUMENTS THAT COMPLIANCE WITH DIVESTITURE ORDER WOULD BE DIFFICULT OR IMPOSSIBLE MAY HAVE BEARING ON EXTENT OF PENALTY, BUT ARE NO DEFENSE TO ACTION FOR CIVIL PENALTY

   Arguments that divestiture pursuant to Federal Trade Commission order would be difficult or even impossible are not defense to action for civil penalty, but may have bearing on extent of penalty.

7. LACK OF INTENT TO VIOLATE ORDER IS NOT A DEFENSE TO LIABILITY, ONLY SOMETHING TO BE CONSIDERED IN MITIGATION OF PENALTY

   Lack of intent to violate Federal Trade Commission divestiture order is not [38] defense to liability, but only factor to be considered in mitigation of penalty.

8. FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH F.T.C. ORDER AS WELL AS AFFIRMATIVE ACTS IN VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ORDER MAY SUBJECT DEFENDANT TO IMPOSITION OF PENALTIES

Penalties may be imposed for failure to comply with Federal Trade Commission divestiture order as well as for affirmative acts in violation of an F.T.C. order.

9. COMMISSION HAS DISCRETION IN MATTERS RELATING TO THE GRANTING OF EXTENSION OF TIME TO COMPLY WITH ITS ORDER

Extension of time to comply with order of Federal Trade Commission rests in discretion of Commission.

10. DENIAL OF EXTENSION OF TIME TO COMPLY WITH ORDER WAS NOT ARBITRARY, AND COMMISSION WAS NOT REQUIRED TO SPELL OUT ITS REASONING, WHERE DEFENDANT WAS SLOW TO START COMPLIANCE, FAILED TO RESPOND TO F.T.C. COMMENTS TO ITS QUARTERLY COMPLIANCE REPORTS AND WARNINGS GIVEN BY THE COMMISSION

In view of defendant's slow start, failure to respond effectively to Federal Trade Commission's comments on defendant's quarterly compliance reports, warning given to defendant and Commission's acceptance of defendant's excuse that it thought it was entitled to count 60-day appeal period in determining when order became final, denial of extension of time to comply with divestiture order was not arbitrary, and there was no need for Commission to spell out reasons for denying extension.

11. THERE IS NOT STATUTORY OR REGULATORY REQUIREMENT THAT COMMISSION GIVE NOTICE TO DEFENDANT BEFORE CERTIFYING A CASE TO ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR ENFORCEMENT

There was no requirement by statute or regulation that Federal Trade Commission give notice before certifying case to Attorney General for proceeding to enforce divestiture order, and where Commission on acquiescing in later deadline than previously imposed stated only that it would not claim penalty if eligible company was presented by December 15, 1970, no further notice of intention to seek penalty was necessary.

12. NOT TO ENCUMBER WITH OBSTACLES, BUT TO EXPEDITE ENFORCEMENT OF THE CLAYTON ACT IS THE PURPOSE OF THE FINALITY ACT OF 1959

Purpose of Finality Act of 1959 was to expedite enforcement of Clayton Act, not to cumber it with obstacles.

13. CERTIFICATION OF FACTS TO ATTORNEY GENERAL TO COMMENCE ENFORCEMENT ACTION IS NECESSARY ONLY TO PROVIDE ATTORNEY GENERAL AUTHORITY TO BRING THE ACTION

Under statute providing for Federal Trade Commission's certification of facts to Attorney General whenever Commission has reason to believe that any person, partnership or corporation is liable to penalty under certain statutory provisions, certification was necessary only to provide authority for Attorney General to bring the action.

14. FACTS OF THE CASE DETERMINE AMOUNT OF PENALTIES

Amount of penalty for failure to comply with order of Federal Trade Commission depends on facts of case.

15. FINANCIAL ABILITY TO PAY PENALTY, DEGREE OF HARM CAUSED BY DEFENDANT, DEFENDANT'S GOOD OR BAD FAITH, NATURE OF EXCUSES FOR DELAY, AND

Extent Defendant Had Profited From Failure To Comply Are Factors Considered in Determining Amount of Penalties

Among factors which may be considered in determining amount of civil penalty for failure of compliance with Federal Trade Commission order are financial ability to pay penalty demanded, degree of harm caused by defendant and its good or bad faith, nature of excuses for delay and extent to which defendant has profited by failing or delaying to comply.

16. Penalty of $150,000 Was Appropriate Under Evidence

Under evidence, penalty of $150,000 was appropriate for failure of compliance with Federal Trade Commission order of divestiture.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 371 F. Supp. 37)

In action for civil penalties for failure to comply with F.T.C. divestiture order, court held that lack of diligence in attempting to comply with the order, not willful delay, prevented a finding of good faith. A penalty of $150,000 was appropriate under the evidence.

DECISION AND ORDER

[39] This case requires a decision, after a non-jury trial, on the government's right to a civil penalty for delay in complying with a Federal Trade Commission (FTC) divestiture order, and a determination of the amount of any penalty.

Facts

Proceedings were begun in the Federal Trade Commission by the issuance of a complaint against Swingline, Inc. on April 1, 1968 charging violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. 15 U.S.C. § 18. The alleged violation resulted from its acquisition in 1965 of Spotnails, Inc. and Speedfast Corporation, both of which had been engaged in manufacture and sale of heavy duty industrial staplers and fasteners and had been in competition with each other.

Swingline paid approximately $3,100,000 for Spotnails and $2,500,000 for Speedfast. The evidence did not disclose how much of the prices was attributable to plants, inventory and physical assets, and how much to good will or other factors.

Swingline manufactures personal and commercial stapling devices, fasteners, and other office equipment, and sells its products throughout the United States. In 1965, Spotnails and Speedfast were two of about seven domestic producers of heavy-duty portable industrial staplers and nailers. This is a field in which Swingline had not been engaged before its acquisition of Spotnails and Speedfast.

After the acquisition of Spotnails and Speedfast, Swingline made many changes in the supervisory personnel of the two corporations; Swingline took over the performance of many important corporate functions, and closed some of the plants which the two companies had operated; there was virtually a complete integration of the assets, operating personnel, and sales facilities of the two corporations, and the Speedfast name was dropped. Thus competition between Speedfast and Spotnails was effectively eliminated.

Swingline filed an answer to the FTC complaint, admitting certain allegations, but denying that it had violated the Clayton Act. After proceedings before a hearing examiner, and lengthy negotiations, the parties agreed on a stipulation of facts, a proposed consent order, and a joint memorandum in support of the order.

Since it would have been extremely difficult to restore competition between Speedfast and Spotnails by requiring Swingline to divest itself of one of the corporations, the FTC directed, in the consent order, that Swingline divest itself of a portion of its business, by disposing of some of the assets it had acquired, and providing knowhow and some assured orders to the company acquiring the divested assets.

The Initial Decision of the Hearing Examiner, dated July 30, 1969, recommended entry of an order that would require Swingline to present to the FTC as soon as practicable, but in no event later than one year after the date the order became final, "a financially sound and eligible company" and a contract with such company. The recommended order required Swingline to assure by such contract that "the eligible company" have adequate manufacturing space, machinery, and working capital, that it have royalty free licenses on Spotnails' knowhow and patent rights, and that Swingline would assign specified amounts of customers' orders to "the eligible company" for a three-year period, and furnish technical assistance and other aid to assure that "the eligible company" would be a viable concern.

The order of the FTC adopting the initial decision of the hearing examiner was issued on October 9, 1969 and served on Swingline on October 17, 1969. In a letter addressed to Swingline on November 7, 1969, the Chief of the Compliance Division described this as a final order and directed that detailed compliance reports be filed within sixty days from the effective date of the order, (Oc[40]tober 17, 1969) and every ninety days thereafter, and described the detailed information which should be included.

When compliance efforts lagged, counsel for Swingline wrote the Commission, on September 15, 1970, that he regarded the effective date of the order as being December 15, 1969 instead of October 17, 1969, on the theory that a sixty day appeal period was allowed after the service of the order, even though the order was uncontested. The Secretary of the Commission responded on October 15, 1970 that no action would be taken to enforce compliance, provided that an eligible company was presented to the Commission for approval on or before December 15, 1970, but warned that

> This letter is not to be construed as acceptance of Swingline's compliance efforts to date. . . .
> In the event that compliance with the applicable order requirements is not effected on or before December 15, 1970, the Commission specifically preserves its right to seek civil penalties. . . .

Pleadings in This Action

The complaint in this court, filed September 20, 1971, recites the FTC order and defendant's failure to comply with its requirements before September 1, 1971, and asks for a penalty of $5,000 per day until compliance and a mandatory injunction for the accomplishment of compliance.

Defendant's answer asserts that it made good faith efforts to comply, but was defeated by circumstances beyond its control. Specifically, it asserts that Swingline's business in heavy duty industrial staplers became unprofitable because of changed economic conditions, that it suffered operating losses during 1970, and the first three months of 1971, and that it was therefore impossible to sell the Speedfast assets and impracticable to establish a viable independent business. The answer also asserts that the FTC's denial of an extension of time to comply was arbitrary and capricious, and that the suit was improperly brought because Swingline was given no opportunity to be heard by the FTC before the case was certified to the Attorney General for prosecution.

Assembly of Data

Swingline did not utilize the time between July 30, and October 17, 1969 to assemble the data necessary to permit divestiture in compliance with the FTC order, and it proceeded after October 17th in a routine manner. Benjamin Hampton, the Executive Vice President of Swingline, asked Sandor Schweiger, the corporate counsel, in October 1969 to prepare a selling document. This was not completed until March 1970. Jack Linsky, President of Swingline, had become seriously ill in September 1969, taking away leadership at an important time.

The Commission wrote to Swingline's counsel on January 13, 1970 requesting additional details concerning compliance, to be submitted not later than January 26, 1970, and asking for a copy of the selling brochure.

Preparation of the selling document involved determining the type of presentation, getting a number of persons to work on various aspects, updating a 1965 report compiled by Booz, Allen and Hamilton, management consultants, and making an inventory of the materials on hand. Many portions of the ultimate brochure were substantially identical with the Booz, Allen and Hamilton report. The Booz, Allen and Hamilton report had been prepared to justify the purchase price of Speedfast, because Jack Linsky, the major stockholder of Swingline, also owned all the stock of Speedfast.

The court finds that there was substantial work required in preparing the selling document, but that the work was done with no sense of urgency on the part of the Swingline staff.

The government criticizes the selling brochure for not listing the right to licenses under the Spotnails patents as [41] part of the assets to be sold. Swingline counters by saying that the Spotnails patents were to be available only if the new company requested them, and that they were mentioned in an annexed copy of the FTC order. The court regards the omission as significant, in view of the fact that the Spotnails licenses and Spotnails customer list were separately listed in an earlier memorandum from counsel to the officers of Swingline and Spotnails summarizing the FTC order. The "Memorandum in Support of Agreed Upon Order," signed by both parties in the FTC proceeding, had mentioned the existence of patent protection as "The paramount obstacle to new entry in this industry * * *." Sales of Speedfast products having been abandoned, and Spotnails having developed new patents after the Speedfast acquisition, the court regards the omission of reference to Spotnails in the brochure as an effort to get by with the minimum measure of compliance with the FTC order, at risk of not being able to dispose of the assets "as soon as practicable." This omission cannot be attributed solely to Swingline's lackadaisical attitude toward the divestiture.

Negotiations With Prospective Buyers

There were news articles about the FTC proceedings in August and October 1969 in the Wall Street Journal and other publications. Inquiries about the acquisition of the Spotnails-Speedfast assets began to come to Swingline shortly after the announcement of the consent decree, and even before it became final.

Swingline responded to each inquiry but not with any degree of diligence.

DESA Industries Inc. wrote to Swingline on September 9, 1969, even before the FTC order became final, but the brochure outlining the items that it might acquire was not forwarded until March 5, 1970. Negotiations with DESA continued until August 6, 1970, when Swingline was informed that the corporation had no further interest in the matter.

Omark Industries, Inc. wrote on October 27, 1969 about its interest in acquiring the Speedfast assets. Again Swingline delayed until March 5, 1970 before sending a brochure and was slow in its response to inquiries after that date. Negotiations with Omark terminated on September 29, 1970. Omark learned enough from its negotiations to enter the fastener industry itself in 1972.

Discussions with Waldman Corporation were begun in about October 1969. Representatives visited Swingline's Long Island City plant in December 1969, but no offer was obtained.

There were contacts with several other companies.

Swingline did not put a price on its package until about September 1970, and then its figure of $1,250,000 proved to be considerably too high. Swingline states that it was afraid that any price it fixed might be so high as to repel the buyer or so low as to invite a stockholders' suit. It seems to have been more concerned about its relation with stockholders than about its obligation to the FTC. There had been a stockholder suit in 1966 attacking the purchase of Speedfast.

The FTC, in mid-1970, when it noted no progress in divestiture, stated that Swingline should have consulted an investment banking firm. Swingline had considered this unnecessary, but in the summer of 1970 consulted Laidlaw & Co., which wrote to 121 prospects, with no results.

Hilti International, S.A., a Swiss (Liechtenstein) company, began negotiations with plaintiff in September 1970, but did not conclude any arrangement. Swingline had asked Hilti for $1,500,000, including foreign patents. Hilti has also entered the fastener field in competition with plaintiff.

Creation of a New Company

Laidlaw & Co. advised against trying to set up a new company, because it would not have sufficient breadth of product to be viable. Nevertheless, this [42] is the route which Swingline had to follow in order to accomplish the divestiture which the FTC ordered. Negotiations with Lloyd Singer, a former director of Swingline, began in April 1971, and concluded on or about September 3, 1971, when Swingline was finally able to submit an eligible company to the FTC. Singer's connection with Swingline had terminated when American Brands acquired Swingline, as described below.

The price to Singer's new company was only $250,000, payable over a term of years and not in cash. The terms were complicated and presented a different package from what the FTC order contemplated. Swingline had to promise additional support beyond the requirements of the FTC order. Mr. Blakeman, President of Spotnails, Inc., indicates costs of $240,000 over a two-year period to meet Swingline's obligations to the new company.

Compliance Reports

Swingline's first quarterly compliance report dated December 15, 1969 stated in general terms that it was making efforts to divest itself of the Speedfast assets. It asserted that Swingline had completed its work on a selling brochure, which was being reviewed and edited by a professional public relations firm. It described various efforts to dispose of the Speedfast assets and listed some of the people with whom the company had been in contact, but it did not include either DESA or Omark, in spite of the fact that testimony at the trial indicated that both of them had communicated with Swingline during September or October. The Commission expressed dissatisfaction with the general nature of the report and asked for copies of all correspondence, a list of assets to be included in the divestiture, the price established for the divestiture, and a list of all customers to whom Spotnails was selling on October 17, 1969.

The second quarterly compliance report dated March 17, 1970 listed Omark and DESA among several companies with whom contact had been made, but it did not supply all the information requested by the FTC after the first report. The attached correspondence indicated that Omark had been informed on October 28, 1969 that it was premature to make contact. A subsequent letter from Omark dated December 8, 1969 asking for the terms and conditions of sale had apparently gone unanswered. The Commission replied under date of March 24, 1970,

> It is apparent that Swingline has not taken affirmative steps to locate and develop an eligible company but has relied solely upon requests made to it * * *. We find wholly unacceptable both the failure of Swingline to establish an asking price for the to-be divested assets as well as requiring interested parties to take the initiative and submit a bid.

Swingline's third quarterly report dated June 16, 1970 described discussions with DESA, Omark and others and notified the Commission of the acquisition by Spotnails, Inc. of Western Machine & Welding Corp. The Commission's response on July 14, 1970 noted that written communications evidencing negotiations had not been furnished as required by the FTC and that five of the questions put to Swingline in the Commission's letter of January 13, 1970 had not yet been answered.

After receiving Swingline's fourth quarterly report dated August 11, 1970, the Commission called attention to the October 17, 1970 deadline for presenting an eligible company to the Commission and stated that "this request is absolute." This comment resulted in the correspondence described above, in which the Commission agreed not to claim any penalty if an eligible company was presented by December 15, 1970.

Swingline's fifth quarterly report dated October 8, 1970 described further efforts to dispose of the Speedfast business, and attached copies of correspondence with various prospects. The Commission's comment, in a letter of October 16, 1970, called attention to the fact that a list of Spotnails' customers which [43] had been requested by the Commission on January 13, March 24, and July 14, 1970 had not yet been provided, that financial statements for Spotnails had not been submitted as requested, that there was no evidence of any correction of the selling brochure to include a reference to Spotnails patents, and that the Commission's request of March 24, 1970 for monthly reports of compliance had not been satisfied. A list of five specific sets of documents and information was requested.

Financial Effects of Delay in Compliance

The Comptroller of Spotnails testified concerning the revenue and expenses allocable to the assets to be divested and stated that they reflected a loss of $1,470 during the period in which compliance with the FTC order was delayed. His figures, however, involved so many questionable assumptions and so many uncertainties that they are not a satisfactory basis for any finding. The pretax profit of Spotnails as a whole was $170,332 for the period from December 16, 1970 to August 31, 1971. This represented a substantial decline from pretax profits of $664,016 for the fiscal year ended August 31, 1969.

The parties stipulated that Swingline was financially able to pay the maximum penalty of $1,300,000.

During the period after the issuance of the FTC order, Spotnails' share in the market in industrial staplers and fasteners dropped slightly, a circumstance which Swingline cites as evidence that the public interest in preventing monopoly did not suffer during the delay in compliance with the FTC order.

Impossibility

Swingline asserts that it was impossible to comply with the FTC order within the time limit because of the business recession of 1969–

70. It points out that there was a substantial decline in the number of mergers which took place during that period. This evidence cuts both ways, for it shows that mergers were still possible if people would adjust their terms to the realities of the situation.

In fact, Swingline itself acquired a small tool and die shop early in 1970. During the same year, it also acquired Western Machine Co., a fabricator of machinery. Swingline in turn was acquired by American Brands, Inc. in May 1970. The Treasurer of American Brands, in recommending the purchase to the Chairman of the Board in January 1970, said,

> The company has an excellent growth record and is predicting a 20% increase in both sales and earnings for the current fiscal year.

Swingline's evidence on national economic statistics shows a drop of 0.5% for 1970 in gross national product in constant dollars, and a slump in growth of sales of heavy-duty industrial stapling. Such sales were $56.7 million in 1969, $56.9 million in 1970, and $66.9 million in 1971. The opinion expressed by Swingline's expert is not that it would have been impossible to sell Speedfast assets in 1970, but that it would have been "very difficult to find a qualified buyer." There was no evidence that the renewed growth in sales of industrial stapling in 1971 came as a surprise to people in the industry.

Swingline's pricing of the Speedfast package, asking over $1,000,000 in 1970, shows that the failure to comply with the FTC order was attributable more to Swingline's desire to get a good price than to the state of the nation's economy.

Denial of Extension

In August 1970, the FTC had informed Swingline that its time to submit an eligible company would expire on October 17, 1970, Swingline responded by letter already described, that the nature of the FTC proceeding had been such that the FTC order did not become final until December 16, 1969, and therefore December 15, 1970 was the effective date for compliance, and the FTC agreed to seek no penalty before that date.

[44] Swingline applied on December 14, 1970 for an extension until April 1, 1971 of the time within which to comply with the FTC order. This request was denied without any specific statement of reasons on January 8, 1971. The FTC expressly referred to its right to seek civil penalties.

Certification to the Attorney General

On June 14, 1971, the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission wrote to Attorney General John N. Mitchell certifying that Swingline, Inc. and American Brands, Inc. had violated the divestiture provisions of the Commission's order and transmitting copies of a proposed complaint and a memorandum in support of the complaint.

The Applicable Law

The statute providing for a civil penalty in this case is Section 11 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), which provides:

> Any person who violates any order issued by the commission or board under subsection (b) of this section after such order has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of any such order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the commission of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.

There are relatively few reported cases concerning the determination of the amount of a civil penalty. Both decided cases and reported settlements appear generally to fix a round figure rather than to compute the amount on the basis of a specific daily penalty.

The provision for institution of an action for a civil penalty is in Section 16 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, now 15 U.S.C. § 56, which reads:

> Whenever the Federal Trade Commission has reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is liable to a penalty under section 54 of this title or under subsection (l) of section 45 of this title, it shall certify the facts to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause appropriate proceedings to be brought for the enforcement of the provisions of such section or subsection.

The Defense of Impossibility

[1] There is no need to determine whether impossibility of performance is a defense to failure to obey a FTC order. The proof here falls far short of showing impossibility. The most it shows is that performance was difficult and that it would have required more intensive effort than Swingline was willing to devote to the task.

[2] Swingline's argument boils down to the double contention (a) that its delay in compliance was not wilful and (b) that it acted in good faith. The court finds that the delay was not wilful, but the lack of diligence in attempting to comply prevents an affirmative finding of good faith.

[3] A civil penalty is somewhat like a punishment for civil contempt, in that its imposition does not depend on wilfulness.

[4] Disobedience of a court order need not be wilful in order to support a finding of civil contempt. McComb v. Jacksonville Paper Co., 336 U.S. 187, 69 S. Ct. 497, 93 L. Ed. 599 (1949) (violation of Fair Labor Standards Act); National Labor Relations Board v. Local 282, 428 F. 2d 994, 1000–1001 (2d Cir. 1970). While mere negligence may not be enough to support a finding of contempt, a lack of diligent effort to comply with the order is significant. As was stated in a trademark case, Babee-Tenda [45] Corp. v. Scharco Mfg. Co., 156 F. Supp. 582, 587 (S.D.N.Y. 1957):

> They were required to take energetic steps to see that the orders of the court were carried out.

[5] Inability to comply with a court order may be a defense to a charge of contempt, United States ex rel. Emanuel v. Jaeger, 117 F. 2d 483, 488 (2d Cir. 1941), but not if the defendant created his own inability. In re D. I. Operating Co., 240 F. Supp. 672, 677 (D. Nev. 1965).

[6, 7] Similar rules apply to FTC orders. Arguments that divestiture would be difficult or even impossible are not a defense to an action for civil penalty, although they may have a bearing on the extent of the penalty. United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F. Supp. 104, 116 (D. Minn. 1972). Lack of intent to violate the order is not a defense to liability, but only a factor to be considered in mitigation of the penalty. United States v. H. M. Prince Textiles, Inc., 262 F. Supp. 383, 389 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 212 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1962).

This case is not like United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 285 F. 2d 607, 614 (2d Cir. 1960), aff'd, 368 U.S. 208, 82 S.Ct. 289, 7 L.Ed. 2d 240 (1961), where the court recognized that a claim of "an honest mistake in a good-faith attempt to comply" might be raised in mitigation of the penalty. Nor is it like Kerr Steamship Co. v. United States, 284 F. 2d 61 (2d Cir. 1960), cert. granted, case vacated and remanded with instruction to dismiss appeal as moot, 369 U.S. 422, 82 S.Ct. 974, 7 L.Ed. 2d 847 (1962), where there was a question of the intent and meaning of a Federal Maritime Board order.

[8] Moreover, as the court held in United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., supra, 344 F. Supp. 104, penalties may be imposed for a failure to comply with a divestiture order as well as for affirmative acts in violation of an FTC order.

Extension of Time

[9, 10] The right to an extension of time to comply with an order rests in the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission. 16 C.F.R. § 4.3(b). The denial of an extension of time cannot be criticized as arbitrary in this case, in view of Swingline's slow start, its failure to respond effectively to the Commission's comments on its quarterly compliance reports, the warning of the compliance date that was given it in August, and the acceptance by the Commission in October 1970 of Swingline's excuse that it thought it was entitled to count the sixty-day appeal period in determining when the order became final. There was no need for the FTC to spell out the reasons for denying an extension of time.

Certification

[11] Neither the statute nor the regulations require that the FTC give notice to a party before certifying a case to the Attorney General for an enforcement proceeding. The fact of violation being clear, the only reasons a respondent could give to persuade the Attorney General not to proceed would be the same reasons that are appropriate to present to a court in mitigation of the amount of the penalty.

The FTC told Swingline on August 11, 1970 that it should present an eligible company by October 17, 1970 and that "this request is absolute." When it acquiesced in a later deadline, the Commission stated only that it would not claim a penalty if an eligible company was presented by December 15, 1970. No further notice of an intention to seek a penalty was necessary.

[12] Even if these notices were not in the case, the assertion that in some cases respondents have been permitted to submit memoranda prior to certification does not make such a submission a condition precedent to an action. The purpose of the "Finality Act" was to expedite enforcement, not to cumber it with the sort of obstacles which Swingline would interpose. Federal Trade Commission v. Jantzen, 386 U.S. 228, 231, 87 S. Ct. 998, 1000, 18 L. Ed. 2d 11 (1967); Federal Trade Commission v. [46] Henry Broch & Co., 368 U.S. 360, 365, 82 S. Ct. 431, 7 L. Ed. 2d 353 (1962).

[13] Certification was necessary only to provide authority for the Attorney General to bring the action. United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d 688 (2d Cir. 1966). There is nothing in 15 U.S.C. § 56 to indicate that Congress intended to require an adversary proceeding between the violation of an order and the institution of an action.

Defendant refers to an amendment of 16 C.F.R. § 3.61(a) on March 17, 1972 which expressly referred to certification of facts to the Attorney General "without advising a respondent whether the actions set forth in a report of compliance evidence compliance with the Commission's order." This language may properly be treated as declaratory of proper procedure rather than as eliminating a step previously required. In any event, Swingline could not have been under any misapprehension that it had complied with the order in this case. It had been clearly informed that its reports did not show compliance.

The Amount of Penalty

[14] The amount of penalty depends on the facts of each case. There are relatively few reported decisions on violations of FTC orders.

In the Beatrice Foods case, supra, it appears from information in the parties' memoranda that the penalty was fixed at $9,800 or only $200 a day. On the other hand, in United States v. ABC Consolidated Corp., 1968 Trade Cas. ¶ 72,621 (E.D.N.Y. 1968), where the government asked for $319,000 on the basis of $1,000 per day, the penalty was fixed by agreement at $200,000 for a delay of about eleven months in complying with a divestiture order. (The amount appears in the trial memorandum here, although not in the reported opinion.)

In the Vitasafe case, the government asked for a penalty of $50,000 and was granted $18,000 (see 352 F. 2d at 62 (2d Cir. 1965)). In the Prince Textiles case, the penalty was fixed at only $250 for each violation, whereas the government had asked for the maximum ($5,000). 262 F. Supp. at 387, 389.

In other types of cases, civil penalties have been relatively modest. The Civil Aeronautics Board imposed a fine of only $65,000 upon the Penn Central Company for devious, flagrant and persistent violation of the statutes against a common carrier by rail having an interest in an air carrier. See Daughen & Binzen, The Wreck of the Penn Central (Signet ed. 1973), pp. 166–67. The maximum potential penalty in the Penn Central-Executive Jet case might have amounted to $7,000,000; but the venture had caused severe losses to Penn Central, and the violation did not involve disobedience of an order previously entered.

In the Alitalia case, where this court had found that Alitalia was selling tickets at an illegal discount, Civil Aeronautics Board v. Alitalia-Lines Aeree Italiane, 328 F. Supp. 759 (1971), the Board rejected a $30,000 settlement offer and ultimately settled the case for $50,000, although potential penalties were over $2,000,000. CAB Order 72–8–3, Aug. 1, 1972. Again, this involved violation of a statute whose application was contested and not of a specific Board order.

[15] Among the factors recently listed by Judge Motley in United States v. J. B. Williams Co., Inc., 354 F. Supp. 521, 548 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), to be considered in determining the amount of civil penalties in an FTC action are > their financial ability to pay the penalties demanded, the degree of harm which defendants may have caused . . . and their good or bad faith . . . .

Other factors may include the nature of the excuses for delay and the extent to which defendant has profited by failing or delaying to comply.

[16] In this case, financial ability is not a primary factor. Swingline has the ability to pay the full penalties demanded. However, the amount asked is substantial in relation to its total assets and its annual profits.

[47] The harm caused by Swingline's delay is difficult to assess. The harm may have been less serious than the harm caused in the Williams case, where the respondents continued publishing misleading advertisements after an order to cease publishing them; but Swingline's delay had a significant effect on the public interest. The suppression of competition, initiated in 1965, continued until September 1971, at least nine months beyond the time when the FTC said that competition should have been restored. The restoration of competition was made more difficult and precarious because it required revival of the Speedfast goodwill, which had grown more stale with each day's delay.

The degree of good faith was rather low in this case. There was no excuse for the delay from July 30, 1969, when the form of order was agreed on, or at least from October 17, 1969, when the order was certified by the FTC, until March 1970, when a selling brochure was finally developed; there were long delays in following up expressions of interest which had been received as early as September and October 1969; Swingline endeavored to avoid giving a license for Spotnails patents by excluding any reference to them in the brochure and leaving it to the purchaser to dig the information out of the annexed FTC report; there was a long failure to put a price on the package; and there were continued failures to furnish information requested by the FTC.

Swingline's default in this case is not comparable to that in United States v. Northern Pacific Ry., 242 U.S. 190, 37 S. Ct. 22, 61 L. Ed. 240 (1916), where the Supreme Court referred to an "unintentional omission or mistake."

There was no real excuse for the delay. Swingline refers to difficult economic conditions during 1970. These conditions did not, however, prevent it from being involved in two acquisitions and one merger during 1970. The conditions simply called for "energetic steps" (see Babee-Tenda v. Scharco Mfg. Co., supra, 156 F. Supp. at 587), which Swingline did not take.

The benefit Swingline received from its delayed compliance was minimal, even if half of the $170,000 profits of Spotnails could be attributed to the retention of the assets which should have been divested. On the other hand, the costs of its ultimate compliance have turned out to be very large. The price promised it by the new company was a mere fraction of the evaluation which Swingline originally put on the assets. The amount which Swingline has spent on special services to comply with the order is almost equal to the total consideration of $250,000 which it was promised. Swingline thus has suffered substantial loss through being forced to divest in haste after a further extension of time was denied and through having to assume onerous obligations to the new company beyond the requirements of the FTC order.

In this case, the penalty should not approach the maximum, but should be large enough to hurt, and to deter anyone in the future from showing as little concern as Swingline did for the need to meet an FTC time-table.

A penalty of $150,000 is determined to represent fair consideration of all the factors listed.

Injunction

Swingline has now divested itself of the assets described in the FTC order and complied with its obligations to the new company. There is no showing of particularized need for injunctive relief against any future obligations under the FTC order.

This decision is intended to comply with the requirements of F.R. Civ. P. 52 concerning findings of fact and conclusions of law.

It is ordered that the amount of the civil penalty payable to the United States by Swingline, Inc. be fixed at $150,000, that the prayer for injunctive relief be denied, and that the Clerk of Court enter judgment for plaintiff as set forth above.

F.T.C. v. RICHARD JACKSON, ET AL.*

(United States District Court, Western District of Washington, February 15, 1974)

On petition for enforcement of subpoena duces tecum issued by the F.T.C., court held that the subpoena should be enforced in part. The sections of the subpoena requesting certain economic information were outside the resolution on the basis that the information would have to have been reasonably relevant to some other valid subject of inquiry and the F.T.C. had not informed respondents or the court of any alternative subjects of inquiry. A recitation of the statutory authority under section 5 of the F.T.C. Act alone, is insufficient under the regulations and the cases to give notice of a subject of investigation other than those set out in the resolution.

Before SHAW, District Judge.

*Not otherwise reported. Motion to reconsider denied, May 21, 1974. For case before the Commission, see Mayday Company, Inc., et al., 88 F.T.C. 775.

This matter comes before the Court on the petition of the Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter FTC) for an order requiring the respondents Richard Jackson and Ward Keller, officers of Mayday Co., Inc. (hereinafter Mayday), to appear and produce documentary evidence in an investigation being conducted by the FTC. By resolution dated June 13, 1973, the FTC indicated the scope of its investigation to be as follows:

> To determine whether or not Mayday Company, Inc., and Ricks-Ehrig, Inc., and others may be engaged in unfair or deceptive acts or practices in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. 45, including but not limited to misrepresentations of career opportunities in investigation and security and the necessity for and quality of the training provided by Mayday Co., Inc., in Washington and other states.

On June 19, 1973, the FTC issued to respondents subpoenas duces tecum. Respondents indicated by letter dated July 6, 1973 that they would comply in part but refused to submit certain of the documents called for in the specifications to the subpoenas. The documents refused concern (1) the total amount of compensation of each Mayday employee who exercises supervisory functions over other employees; (2) the breakdown into major categories of the gross revenues of Mayday over the four-year period 1970–1973; (3) the totals and the breakdown into major categories of the expenditures of Mayday over the same four-year period; (4) the before-tax profits of Mayday over the same four-year period; (5) dividends and payments with respect to ownership interests paid to owners of Mayday over the same four-year period; (6) other payments to Mayday owners over the same four-year period; (7) payments to respondents other than their compensation as officers and directors over the same four-year period; (8) the cost of providing Mayday's course of instruction to one student; (9) names, addresses, and current employment of all persons who graduated from Mayday's course of instruction in 1972 and 1973; (10) names and addresses of all persons who agreed to subscribe to Mayday's course of instruction, paid money, and did not begin the course of instruction in 1971, 1972, and 1973; (11) names, addresses, and length of employment of all persons who sell Mayday courses to prospective students and the total compensation of each; (12) copies or photocopies of all financial statements prepared for Mayday which show the amounts and sources of revenues or expenditures; (13) the names and addresses of all employers who have hired Mayday graduates and the number of persons hired; (14) correspondence and other writings which deal in whole or in part with contacts between Mayday and employers of security and investigative personnel other than that dealing with availability of jobs, existence of placement services, design of course materials, complaints of lack of training, and evaluations of Mayday training; (15) copies of all materials relied upon by Mayday in the preparation of its course materials which are not in its possession, custody, and control; (16) all materials prepared for and correspondence with the National Home Study Council other than those submitted to the National Home Study Council to obtain and maintain accreditation by that organization; (17) all writings concerning contacts of Mayday personnel with local, state, or federal agencies (other than the FTC) concerning the quality or content of Mayday's advertising or course material other than complaints by such agencies; and all correspondence with or materials prepared for the Veterans Administration or state accrediting agency other than documents submitted to the Veterans Administration or any agency of the State of Washington which accredits courses on behalf of the Veterans Administration to obtain and maintain Veterans Administration approval. Respondents resist surrendering some items altogether and resist surrendering others without a suitable protective order.

The Court having considered the petition, its attachments, and the memoranda in support and in opposition filed herein, and having heard oral argument in open court, finds that certain of the items refused are reasonably relevant to the investigation proposed in the FTC resolution and should be produced and that certain other of the items are not reasonably relevant and need not be produced. The Court also finds no necessity for a protective order for the items found to be reasonably relevant.

Items (9), (10), (13), (16) and (17) are reasonably relevant to the purposes of the FTC investigation as set forth in the resolution dated June 13, 1973. Also, item (11) is reasonably relevant except that the total compensation of each such person need not be supplied and item (14) is reasonably relevant except that only those parts of the correspondence and other writings which deal with the specified contacts need be supplied.

The Court has the power to qualify an order for production to protect confidential business information. FTC v. Bowman, 149 F. Supp. 624 (D. Ill. 1957), affirmed 248 F. 2d 456 (7th Cir. 1957). Respondents argue that such qualification on FTC contacts with past graduates and employers of past graduates is necessary in this case because Mayday depends upon past graduates and their employers to recommend future students and to help in placement of students as they graduate. Although information on past graduates and their employers is important to Mayday and should be protected by the FTC to the extent possible under its regulations, the Court finds that this information is of the type which the FTC must investigate under its statutory responsibility and therefore concludes that a protective order is not proper in this case.

The Court finds that the remaining items are not reasonably relevant to the purposes of the FTC investigation as set forth in the resolution dated June 13, 1973. In the present case, the resolution recited the broad statutory authority of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, and then added language indicating that the principal focus of the investigation would be on misrepresentations by Mayday. The specifications in the subpoena duces tecum called for considerable information about the economic operations of Mayday.

The FTC argues that the economic information is reasonably relevant to an investigation of misrepresentation because that information could yield evidence of unconscionable pricing. The only case cited in support of the proposition that unconscionable pricing is a valid subject for investigation in a misrepresentation case is Tashof v. FTC, 437 F. 2d 707 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

In that case the Court of Appeals reviewed an order of the FTC filed against appellant. The FTC findings in support of its order covered four areas of deceptive advertising and misrepresentation, one of which was misrepresentation of easy credit terms. That specific finding was supported by two further findings: (1) that appellant's collection policy was extremely rigorous, counter to the suggestion of the term "easy credit" and (2) that unconscionably high prices inflated the total cost to purchaser and made the term "easy credit" misleading. The Court of Appeals decided the finding of the rigorous collection policy was valid and was sufficient to support the finding that there had been a misrepresentation of easy credit terms. The court chose not to decide whether unconscionable prices would be a valid subject of investigation in a misrepresentation case. In addition, the present case is distinguishable from Tashof on its facts since the alleged misrepresentation has no relation to representations of credit terms. Thus, although the finding of relevance by the FTC in Tashof has certain weight, it has not been decided by the courts and should be limited to its specific facts. This Court finds that there has been no showing that the economic information sought in this case is reasonably relevant to an investigation of alleged misrepresentations by Mayday, particularly at this pre-adjudicatory stage of the proceedings.

The FTC also places emphasis on the language of the resolution stating that the investigation need not be limited to the possible misrepresentations described therein. However, even if this argument were accepted, the information would have to be reasonably relevant to some other valid subject of inquiry and the FTC has not informed respondents or the Court of any alternative subjects of inquiry. In addition, there is a requirement in the FTC regulations, 16 C.F.R. § 2.6, that a person under investigation be informed of the purpose of that investigation. If the subject of the present investigation is other than misrepresentations by Mayday, the FTC must so inform the respondents. The first part of the resolution, reciting the broad statutory authority of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, would not be sufficient notice of alternative subjects of inquiry. The resolutions in the cases cited by the FTC contained the broad statutory authority of § 5 in conjunction with the statutory language of § 2 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, which, together with the specifications of the subpoenas duces tecum, supplied the specificity of notice required by due process and warranted the upholding of the subpoenas. FTC v. Green, 252 F. Supp. 153 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); FTC v. Gibson, 460 F. 2d 605 (5th Cir. 1972). A recitation of the statutory authority of § 5 alone, particularly with the addition of language indicating that the primary subject of investigation would be misrepresentations, would be insufficient under the regulations and the cases to give notice of a subject of investigation other than misrepresentations. FTC v. American Tobacco Co., 44 S. Ct. 336 (1924).

In Summary, the respondents are to supply the material offered in their letter dated July 6, 1973, and, in addition, the material called for above.

Appropriate order should be submitted to the Court for entry.

(United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, February 25, 1974)

1. LACKING CHARGES OF VOTER INTERFERENCE OR ELECTION CALCULATION INFIRMITIES, PROSCRIPTIONS OF F.T.C. ACT WERE NOT APPLICABLE TO CAMPAIGN ACTIVITIES IN STATE OF WASHINGTON

   Proscriptions of Federal Trade Commission Act were not applicable to campaign activities of opponents to "anti-litter" measure in State of Washington at least insofar as such activities mainly sought to influence the electorate at large where no charge was made of interference with voters at the polls or any infirmity in the election calculation.

On action for declaratory judgment, court held that F.T.C. Act proscriptions were not applicable to campaign activities in the State

Before KOELSCH and TRASK, Circuit Judges, and JAMESON†, District Judge.

PER CURIAM:

William H. Rodgers, Jr., an assistant professor of law at the University of Washington School of Law, appeals from a final judgment of the United States District Court that dismissed his complaint for a declaratory judgment and equitable relief in a proceeding which had originated before the Federal Trade Commission (Commission). The judgment was pursuant to a motion to dismiss filed by the Commission.

This litigation is an outgrowth of a proposal which was taken to the voters [229] of the State of Washington as Initiative 256, an "anti-litter" measure. If adopted, it would have forbidden the sale in Washington of beer and soft drinks in containers not having a refund value of at least five cents. It was rejected by the voters on November 3, 1970, by margin of 51 percent to 49 percent. By letter dated December 11, 1970, appellant wrote to the Secretary of appellee Federal Trade Commission, and requested that the Commission investigate what appellant described as "unfair and deceptive practices in commerce" arising out of that campaign.

The letter with documentation attached set forth the "facts upon which allegations are based."[1] Appellant's letter then concluded that on the basis of those alleged facts the Commission could find that the opponents of the initiative measure had combined "in both vertical and horizontal agreements, to make price representations to the public that constituted unfair and deceptive trade practices."

†Honorable William J. Jameson, Senior United States District Judge, from the District of Montana, sitting by designation.

[1] "Simply stated, the illegality here alleged is that the grocery chain stores and the manufacturers of beer and soft drink combined, in both vertical and horizontal agreements, to make price representations to the public that constituted unfair and deceptive trade practices. At times these representations were made through the coordinating medium of Citizens Committee Against 256, at times they were made directly—for example, through the use of the stickers promising price increases. No doubt exists that if these dire threats to raise prices were implemented in a joint move by the affected industries after passage of the initiative a prima facie case of price fixing would be established. No less a violation has occurred when the industries join together with a threat of price increases to coerce the consumer to reject a ballot proposition. What happened was that the manufacturers and chains, in the course of the campaign, announced a joint price move to take effect after the election and upon the condition of the passage of 256. Saying that there is an agreement to fix prices established the violation. If there was no agreement, then the representation was false and unlawful on that separate ground. My own view is that the agreement was proven by the concerted, massive and planned move to threaten the consumer with a . . . 48 cent increase for each six-pack of a number of different products." C.T. at 35.

On January 26, 1971, Mr. Charles A. Tobin, the Secretary of the Commission, responded to appellant's letter and stated that the Commission found no actionable violation "even assuming a wrongful motive, for purposes of consideration of your complaint, and the willful use of distortion or deception."

With administrative relief denied, the appellant, repeating and embellishing the allegations in his earlier letter,[2] filed an action against the Commission in the District Court on April 8, 1971.

The complaint requested a judgment ordering the Commission to undertake an investigation under what it alleged was a correct interpretation of the law and asked for a declaration that the practices which the plaintiff described were violations of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, and of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. After oral argument upon the memoranda filed, the District Court denied appellant's motion for summary judgment and granted the Commission's motion to dismiss upon the grounds (1) that it was a matter committed to the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission; and (2) that the action was barred by the Supreme Court's decision in Eastern R. R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961).

Assuming without deciding that the decision of the Commission in this case is reviewable under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 701–706, we go directly to the merits of appellant's claim. The Federal Trade Commission, in rejecting his contentions, pointed out that although this was not activity de[230]signed to influence a legislative body, the people, acting directly through either the initiative or referendum, are exercising the same power of sovereignty as that exercised by the legislature in passing laws. The Washington courts have so held:

> In this case we have, instead of statute, an initiative measure limiting the taxing power. That, however, can make no difference, for the latter is as much a legislative act as is the former. By Article 2, § 1, Amendment 7 to the state Constitution, it is provided that the legislative authority of the state shall be vested in the Legislature, with an express reservation in the people of the power to > propose bills and laws and to enact or reject the same at the polls. The first power so reserved is the initiative. The passage of an initiative measure as a law is the exercise of the same power of sovereignty as that exercised by the Legislature in the passage of a statute. Love v. King County, 181 Wash. 462, 44 P. 2d 175, 178 (1935).

[2] Appellant in his brief stated that in making his allegations in his complaint he had "repeated and refined" the allegations that were made to the Federal Trade Commission. Among the "refinements" was an allegation not made to the Federal Trade Commission that the conspiracy "was accomplished in part in violation of Washington State law which forbids corporations with a majority of out-of-state shareholders from making contributions in local initiative campaigns."

The Commission noted:

> The proscriptions of Section 5 of the FTC Act, as we view them, like the proscriptions of the Sherman Act, are tailored for the business world, not for the political arena. We fail to perceive in the allegations any situation involving unfair methods of competition or business combination characterized by express or implied agreement or understanding that the participants will jointly give up their trade freedom, or undertake to take away the trade freedom of others. The cited representations, even if jointly made, alluding to higher prices, increased costs, economic hardships, and the like, which would assertedly be occasioned by passage of the subject legislative measure, appear to us to have been, at most, joint efforts to influence legislation.
> Even assuming a wrongful motive, for purposes of consideration of your complaint, and the willful use of distortion or deception, it is our view that actionable violation of Section 5 of the FTC Act is not indicated due to the overriding public interest in preservation of uninhibited communication in connection with political activity, particularly in connection with legislative processes. Nor would illegality attach because joint action may have been here undertaken on the premise of economic advantage, not merely political interest. Letter of Charles A. Tobin, Secretary, Federal Trade Commission, to William H. Rodgers, Jr., Jan. 26, 1971, in Brief of Appellant, Appendix at 10, 11–12.

The Commission then decided that action on the complaint of appellant under the Federal Trade Commission Act was not warranted. It relied upon Eastern R. R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 139, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961).

Appellant strenuously argues that the Commission and the District Court which reviewed the Commission's order incorrectly construed the reach of the Noerr doctrine. He places the issue which he raises in perspective by stating in his opening brief:

> [I]t is urged on this appeal that the allegations to the FTC make out a case of overwhelming political influence in bringing about anti-competitive results from governmental action so complete and so thorough as to constitute an illegal instance of monopolization under the antitrust laws. Insofar as appellant is aware, this issue is being presented to an appellate court for the first time. The case presents an appealing occasion for application of the laws against monopoly to political campaigns. Brief of Appellant at 6.

Whatever appeal the facts of this case hold out to appellant, we have neither the inclination nor the authority to discard the rationale and the decision of the Supreme Court in Noerr. That case, upon which the Federal Trade Commission and the District Court principally relied, was a private antitrust action by the motor truck operators against the [231] railroads. The substance of the Sherman Act violation charged was that the rail carriers had mounted a far reaching and "vicious, corrupt and fraudulent" publicity campaign against the truckers which was designed to foster the adoption and retention of laws and law enforcement practices intended to damage and destroy the truckers as competitors. The Court held that the Sherman Act did not apply to the activities of the railroads at least insofar as those activities comprised mere solicitation of governmental action with respect to the passage and enforcement of laws. A contrary holding, said the Court, would impute to the Sherman Act a purpose to regulate not business activity but political activity, a purpose which would have no basis in its legislative history. Such a construction would also interfere with the right to petition.

Said the Court:

> Indeed, it is quite probably people with just such a hope of personal advantage who provide much of the information upon which governments must act. A construction of the Sherman Act that would disqualify people from taking a public position on matters in which they are financially interested would thus deprive the government of a valuable source of information and, at the same time, deprive the people of their right to petition in the very instances in which that right may be of the most importance to them. We reject such a construction of the Act and hold that, at least insofar as the railroads' campaign was directed toward obtaining governmental action, its legality was not at all affected by any anticompetitive purpose it may have had. 365 U.S. at 139–140, 81 S. Ct. at 530–531.

Noerr was followed a few years later by United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965). There the unlawful conspiracy alleged was one between mine owners and unions to cause the Secretary of Labor to establish unreasonably high wages to force the complainant out of business. Thus the improper influence was not to cause passage of legislation but to cause executive action. The Court upheld the position it had announced in Noerr:

> Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition. Such conduct is not illegal, either standing alone or as part of a broader scheme itself violative of the Sherman Act. 381 U.S. at 670, 85 S. Ct. at 1593.

More recently California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 92 S. Ct. 609, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642 (1972), reaffirmed the rationale of Noerr and of Pennington. That case, however, involved allegations that the conspiracy was to deter the competitors in their use of administrative and judicial proceedings so as to deny them the right to free and unlimited access to those tribunals. The result would be to discourage and ultimately prevent the competitors from invoking the processes of the administrative and judicial tribunals. This, the Court said, could bring the situation within the "sham" exception of Noerr which would apply where the activity complained about is a mere screen for what in fact is an attempt to interfere with the business relationships of a competitor. Eastern R. R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 144, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961).

Neither Trucking Unlimited nor Pennington lends support to appellant's arguments here. Both the supporters of Initiative 256 and its opponents had equal right to submit their arguments to the electorate at large. No charge is made of interference with voters at the polls or any infirmity in the election tabulation. The arguments of appellant fall directly within the rule of Noerr and the cases following it. Cases relied upon by appellant such as Sun Valley Disposal Co. v. Silver State Disposal Co., 420 F. 2d 341 (9th Cir. 1969), and Harman v. Valley [232] National Bank, 339 F. 2d 564 (9th Cir. 1964), are not apposite.[3]

One other argument that appellant made orally was that Washington State law was violated because that law "forbids corporations with a majority of out-of-state shareholders from making contributions in local initiative campaigns." No such charge was made in the complaint to the Federal Trade Commission except as it was referred to in "an unpublished draft of a paper describing the initiative campaign which I have prepared for possible publication." An examination of this document fails to disclose any direct charge of violation of Washington State law[4] and no facts were submitted to the Commission which would support any charge of illegality.

An examination of the complaint filed indicates that there was nothing before the trial court which would require it to engage in a substantial inquiry. Taking the letter presented to it and the exhibits attached, the issue was whether Noerr controlled or, at the most, whether the allegations presented a matter within the Noerr exception. We believe that the Commission acted within the scope of its authority and that its action was not "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. §§ 706(2) (A), (C); see Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 415–416, 91 S. Ct. 814, 28 L. Ed. 2d 136 (1971). The trial court correctly decided the issue and its decision is affirmed.

[3] Sun Valley and Harman involved the possible loss of antitrust immunity, relative to a concerted attempt to influence executive action, since the official whose favorable decision was sought was himself alleged to be acting unlawfully i.e., as a member of the conspiracy. Similarly, the result in this case is not controlled by Sacramento Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. Chauffeurs Local 150, 440 F. 2d 1096 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 826, 92 S. Ct. 57, 30 L. Ed. 2d 54 (1971). In that case, which also involved administrative decisionmaking, the Noerr exemption was held inapplicable because the defendants sought to influence "public officials engaged in purely commercial dealings" and employed tactics including "threats and other coercive measures." 440 F. 2d at 1099. Neither condition is satisfied here.

Appellant's reliance upon Israel v. Baxter Labs, Inc., 151 U.S. App. D.C. 101, 466 F. 2d 272 (1972), and Semke v. Enid Automobile Dealers Ass'n, 456 F. 2d 1361 (10th Cir. 1972), is also misplaced. Each of these cases involved alleged attempts to misuse administrative processes in order to further primary anticompetitive objectives. Such activity, if proved, would fall within the "sham" exception of Noerr as interpreted by the Court in Trucking Unlimited. 404 U.S. at 515–516, 92 S. Ct. 609. The case before us here, however, is distinguishable in two respects. First, the allegedly unethical conduct of the "conspirators" herein occurred solely within the "political arena," not within an administrative or judicial context. See Trucking Unlimited supra, at 513, 516, 92 S. Ct. 609. Secondly, the materials brought to the attention of the Commission did not indicate that the opponents of Initiative 256 had acted primarily to attain anticompetitive goals or that their actions had resulted in an abuse of the initiative proceedings.

Civ. A. No. 4–74–Civ. 25 F.T.C. Docket No. 8940.

(United States District Court, District of Minnesota, February 28, 1974)

On motion for temporary relief and preliminary injunction, court held that it has jurisdiction only with respect to the dispute arising out of documents requested by plaintiffs under the Freedom of Information Act. The court lacks jurisdiction to intercede into Commission proceedings already in progress on the grounds that plaintiffs have failed to exhaust their administrative remedies. Therefore, the court denies plaintiffs' motion for temporary relief and for preliminary injunction and also denies defendants' motion to dismiss and for summary judgment. Further, the court ordered in camera inspection of the disputed documents falling under the Freedom of Information Act.

ORDER

Plaintiffs have moved for declaratory relief pertaining to production of certain documents demanded from defendants pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, for declaratory relief concerning the Federal Trade Commission's Procedures and Rules of Practice, and for a permanent injunction enjoining defendants from violating their rights to a fair hearing before the Commission and staying all further proceedings pending against them until such documents are produced and the Administrative Law Judge takes them into account in reconsidering plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the Commission's pending complaint against them, or in the alternative, for a preliminary injunction until the Court determines the issues involved herein.

*Not otherwise reported. See also pp. 1002, 1107, 1449, 1500 herein.

Defendants oppose these motions and have moved to dismiss the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Rule 12(b)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and for summary judgment under Rule 56.

Oral argument was heard on February 4, 1974.

The Court has considered the briefs, affidavits, and arguments of counsel.

On all of the files and proceedings herein,

IT IS ORDERED:

1. That plaintiffs' motion for declaratory relief pertaining to the Commission's Procedures and Rules of Practice be, and it hereby is, denied.

2. That plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary or a permanent injunction staying the further proceedings of the Commission and compelling reconsideration of their motion to dismiss be, and it hereby is, denied.

3. That defendants' motion to dismiss the action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction be, and it hereby is, denied.

4. That defendants' motion for summary judgment be, and it hereby is, denied.

5. That defendants submit to the Court for in camera inspection within ten (10) days of the entry of this Order the two documents requested by plaintiffs that defendants contend are exempt from disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. During this same time period, plaintiffs and defendants shall be entitled to file with the Court any supporting memoranda regarding exemption of these documents and whether there exist other documents demanded by plaintiffs under the Freedom of Information Act.

MEMORANDUM

This is an action challenging certain procedures and pending administrative proceedings of the Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter FTC or the Commission).

The plaintiffs are Control Data Corporation (hereinafter CDC) and Automation Institute of America, Inc. (hereinafter AIA). CDC is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in Bloomington, Minnesota, AIA, a wholly owned subsidiary of CDC, is a California corporation with its principal place of business also in Bloomington, Minnesota. CDC engages in electronic data processing vocational educational programs through its Control Data Institutes division, and AIA franchises private vocational schools giving instruction in this subject. The plaintiffs currently are respondents in proceedings before the FTC for alleged violations of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, in the conduct of their respective programs or franchising.

The defendants are the FTC, its chairman, its four individual commissioners,[1] and the administrative law judge who has been appointed by the Commission to make an initial determination in the above mentioned proceedings.

In March 1971 the Commission served CDC and AIA with subpoenas for the production of various documents covering a period in excess of two years. Following production of the material, hearings were conducted in the summer of 1971. On May 1, 1972, the FTC informed plaintiffs of its intention to institute formal proceedings against them that ultimately could lead to issuance of a cease and desist order regarding specified conduct allegedly in violation of § 5. CDC and AIA were then given an option to enter into a proposed consent order to obviate the impending administrative proceedings.

The following day the FTC circulated a press release explaining its action and charging, inter alia, that the vocational education programs in which CDC and AIA were involved were "virtually worthless" for purposes of future employment.

CDC and AIA filed a proposed consent decree with the Commission on September 5, 1972. Thirteen months passed before they next heard from the Commission. On October 3, 1973, the Commission informed them that their proposal was unacceptable. On that same date a formal complaint was filed by the FTC against CDC and AIA, commencing administrative proceedings for the alleged violations of § 5.

On October 22, 1973, CDC and AIA made a motion to the administrative law judge to dismiss the complaint. They maintained that the 13 month lapse between their submission of the proposed consent decree and the ultimate filing of the complaint against them constituted prejudicial delay in violation of §§ 6(b) and (e) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 555(b) and (e).[2] They simultaneously moved the administrative law judge under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3) (1970) (hereinafter FOIA), to produce and identify documents in the possession of the Commission falling within four specified categories.

[1] Commissioner David S. Dennison, Jr., one of the defendants, resigned his position with the Commission prior to the filing of the instant complaint. His resignation has left a vacancy on the Commission. He is being deleted as a defendant in this action pursuant to Rule 25(d)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[2] Section 555(b) provides for rights of appearances before administrative agencies by interested persons or counsel representing persons compelled to appear before such agencies. It also provides that "[w]ith due regard for the convenience and necessity of their parties or their representatives and within a reasonable time, each agency shall proceed to conclude a matter presented to it."

Section 555(e) provides, in pertinent part, for "[p]rompt notice" to be given of denials of written applications, petitions, or other requests of "an interested party made in connection with any agency proceeding."

In particular, they sought documents regarding the Commission's practice or policy of preparedness for litigation at the time the Commission's staff first recommends issuance of a notice of proposed complaint, documents regarding time consumed by the Commission in evaluating and passing upon proposed consent decrees, documents relating to the 12 month period between submission of their proposal and the FTC's rejection of it, and documents regarding the effects of this time lapse. All of these materials purportedly would have a bearing on the prejudice issue.

CDC and AIA followed up this request with a motion on November 5, 1973, for a subpoena duces tecum, seeking the same documents as were demanded under the FOIA.

Under the Commission's Procedures and Rules of Practice, all motions for subpoenas must be made to the administrative law judge, 16 C.F.R. § 3.36; all requests for materials under the Freedom of Information Act must be directed to the Commission itself. 16 C.F.R. § 4.8–.11.

All of the motions were denied by the administrative law judge on November 13, 1973. He ruled that non-adjudicative consent decree procedures prefatory to the filing of a complaint by the Commission were not governed by §§ 6 (b) and (e) of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Evidently believing that he was not authorized to pass upon the FOIA request in light of the FTC's procedural regulations, he ignored this motion. He did hold that it was premature to raise the prejudice issue and that its resolution should await further developments during the upcoming administrative hearing. The documents sought by the subpoena, therefore, were not considered to be relevant at this stage of the proceedings.

The denial of the motion to dismiss was made without prejudice to its renewal subsequently in the proceedings. The administrative law judge also declared that the request for documents should be made to the Commission, pursuant to its regulations implementing the FOIA.

On November 16, 1973, CDC and AIA made an independent demand upon the Secretary of the Commission for the documents they had unsuccessfully sought from the administrative law judge and simultaneously petitioned the Commission for production of these materials. On that same day they also applied to the administrative law judge for a stay of his rulings and the taking of an interlocutory appeal to the Commission. This motion was denied on December 3, 1973.

Since the administrative law judge's denials of the various motions do not constitute final agency action, they are not subject to judicial review. 5 U.S.C. § 704. They also are not now reviewable by the Commission. 16 C.F.R. § 3.23. A hearing on the merits of the complaint is scheduled before the administrative law judge this August. Once he makes his "initial decision" in the matter, that ruling may be appealed to the Commission. 16 C.F.R. §§ 3.51, 3.52. The Commission's determination will then constitute "final agency action," which may be reviewed by the appropriate appellate court. 15 U.S.C. § 45(c). Under 15 U.S.C. § 45(d) exclusive jurisdiction lies with the appellate court to affirm, enforce, modify, or set aside the Commission's actions. Review by the Supreme Court may then be obtained by a petition for a writ of certiorari. 15 U.S.C. § 45(g)–(i).

This action was brought January 16, 1974. Plaintiffs seek declaratory relief as well as a permanent injunction staying all further FTC proceedings against them until the documents they desire have been produced by the Commission and the administrative law judge takes them into account in reconsideration of his previous denial of their motion to dismiss. Alternatively, they seek a preliminary injunction while the Court considers the issues they have raised. Jurisdiction is alleged under the FOIA,[3] certain provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act, the declaratory judgment statutes, other jurisdictional statutes, and the general equity jurisdiction of the Court.

"(3) . . . [E]ach agency, on request for identifiable records made in accordance with published rules stating the time, place, fees to the extent authorized by statute, and procedure to be followed, shall make the records promptly available to any person. On complaint, the district court of the United States in the district in which the complainant resides, or has his principal place of business, or in which the agency records are situated, has jurisdiction to enjoin the agency from withholding agency records and to order the production of any agency records improperly withheld from the complainant. In such a case the court shall determine the matter de novo and the burden is on the agency to sustain its action. In the event of noncompliance with the order of the court, the district court may punish for contempt the responsible employee, and in the case of a uniformed service, the responsible member. Except as to causes the court considers of greater importance, proceedings before the district court, as authorized by this paragraph, take precedence on the docket over all other causes and shall be assigned for hearing and trial at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way.

(4) Each agency having more than one member shall maintain and make available for public inspection a record of the final votes of each member in every agency proceeding.

(b) This section does not apply to matters that are—

* * * * * * *

(2) related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency;

* * * * * * *

(5) inter-agency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency;

* * * * * * *

(7) investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes except to the extent available by law to a party other than an agency;

* * * * * * *

(c) This section does not authorize withholding of information or limit the availability of records to the public, except as specifically stated in this section. This section is not authority to withhold information from Congress. . . ."

Defendants have moved for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure on the grounds of lack of subject matter jurisdiction and also for summary judgment under Rule 56.

On January 31, 1974, four days prior to the Court's scheduled hearing on the motions, the Commission responded to the earlier requests by CDC and AIA under the FOIA.

The Commission has provided CDC and AIA with a copy of Chapter 3.21 of its Operating Manual. It claims that two other documents exist pertinent to their demands: a memorandum concerning the FTC's readiness for litigation and a document regarding the passage of time between submission of the proposed consent decree and the issuance of the complaint in the instant matter. The Commission claims that these documents are exempt from disclosure under (b)(2) and (b)(5) and (b)(5) and (b)(7), respectively. It has declined to exercise its discretion in granting access to them.

Plaintiffs first seek declaratory relief regarding what they term the FTC's "bi-furcated" system of requiring motions to dismiss and for discovery to be addressed to and ruled upon by the administrative law judge and FOIA demands to be presented to and passed upon separately by the Commission. They seek to have the Court render a declaratory judgment under 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201, 2202 that all motions for dismissal and for requests under the FOIA be submitted to the administrative law judge.

The essence of their claim is that under the "bi-furcated" procedures competent, relevant evidence was withheld from the administrative law judge. They say these regulations denied them the intended benefits of the FOIA and deprived them of a full and fair hearing in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 41, et seq., the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 555, et seq., and the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution.

Because CDC and AIA have not exhausted their administrative remedies on the fair hearing issue, the Court cannot grant the relief they seek. Sterling Drug Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 450 F. 2d 698 (D.C. Cir. 1971). The issue is "not such a strictly legal question that it can be properly decided on the incomplete facts and arguments now before [the court]." Ibid., 711. Because the Commission itself or an appellate court reviewing the final order of the Commission may correct any errors, the Court should stay its hand in interfering with the administrative process at this early stage of the proceedings.

Plaintiffs also request the Court to enjoin the pending FTC proceedings against them until the Commission discloses the documents they seek under the FOIA, they have an opportunity to present these documents to the administrative law judge, and he takes them into account in reconsideration of his previous denial of their motion to dismiss the complaint. Because the Commission has now responded to their FOIA request—divulging one document, denying two others under specified statutory exemptions—this motion must be recast in the form of a request to stay FTC proceedings until final determination of the status of the documents demanded by the plaintiffs.

This raises a threshold question of the Court's jurisdiction to grant such relief. Under the FOIA this Court is empowered "to enjoin the agency from withholding agency records and to order the production of any agency records improperly withheld from the complainant[s]."

But the pendency of the FTC proceedings poses an obstacle: the general rule proscribing the enjoining of administrative proceedings. Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41 (1938); Adams v. Federal Trade Commission, 296 F. 2d 861, 864 (8th Cir. 1950); Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis v. Federal Trade Commission, 280 F. 2d 45, 48 (8th Cir. 1922). These cases essentially stand for the proposition that plaintiffs must first "run the gamut of administrative proceedings" before seeking judicial relief. Adams v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, 865. The administrative proceedings are not to be interfered with, as a general rule, until judicial review of the final order of the agency. Jurisdiction for review here lies exclusively with the appropriate Court of Appeals, 15 U.S.C. § 45(d), and by writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court, 15 U.S.C. § 45(g)–(i).

Recent cases under the FOIA, however, have substantially eroded the Myers rule against enjoining pending administrative proceedings. Shortly after the instant action was taken under advisement the Supreme Court addressed the issue in Renegotiation Board v. Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc., 42 L.W. 4203 (No. 72–822, Feb. 19, 1974). In that case three litigants before the Renegotiation Board brought suit in the District Court to stay pending agency proceedings until resolution of their claims for production of certain documents under the FOIA.

The question of whether to compel production of the disputed documents was sub judice. At issue was the equitable jurisdiction of the Court to stay the pending administrative proceedings. The lower court had granted injunctive relief, and this decision was affirmed by the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia in a 2-to-1 decision. Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc. v. Renegotiation Board, 466 F. 2d 345 (1972).

In a 5-to-4 decision the Supreme Court first agreed with the lower courts that the FOIA was applicable to litigants currently engaged in proceedings before the Renegotiation Board. 42 L.W. at 4208.

Although the Supreme Court's opinion dealt narrowly with Renegotiation Board proceedings, the broader reasoning of the Circuit Court's decision supports application of the FOIA to litigants engaged in administrative proceedings with other Federal agencies, including the FTC. 466 F. 2d at 351–352. A subsequent decision by that Court, decided prior to the Supreme Court's opinion in Bannercraft, reaffirmed the broad applicability of the FOIA to proceedings before other administrative agencies. Sears, Roebuck and Company v. NLRB, 473 F. 2d 91, 93 (1972), cert. pending, 42 L.W. 3038 (No. 72–1503, July 10, 1973). See also Sterling Drug Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra, 703 (ruling sub silento that the FOIA applies for purposes of discovery by FTC litigants although upholding the lower court's determination that the documents sought there were exempt from disclosure).

Pursuant to these decisions, the Court must reject defendants' assertion that the FOIA is inapplicable to requests by the litigants engaged in pending FTC proceedings. In any event, the Commission apparently has retreated from this position since it has responded to the instant demand, granting disclosure in part, denying it in part.

Not only does the FOIA apply, but it does not limit the inherent equitable powers of the Court. Under the Supreme Court's decision in Bannercraft, the Court does have equitable jurisdiction to entertain this action by CDC and AIA. 42 L.W. at 4206. Consequently, defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction must be denied.

But this only goes to the Court's jurisdiction in the broad sense of competency to act on the matter before it. See Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc. v. Renegotiation Board, supra, 354. The closely related doctrine of exhaustion of administrative procedures also must be considered. This principle pertains to the narrower issue of the timing and propriety of acting and, unlike subject matter jurisdiction, is discretionary with the Court. Ibid.

It was on this issue that the Supreme Court disagreed with the Circuit Court's decision and reversed and remanded the case. The Circuit Court had dissected the exhaustion doctrine into its "component parts" and concluded that none of the policies underlying the doctrine would be offended by staying pending proceedings until resolution of the FOIA demands. 466 F. 2d at 354–361. The Supreme Court, however, felt that the contractors were compelled to pursue all of their administrative remedies before the Board, rather than invoking equitable relief to stay the pending proceedings. 42 L.W. at 4209.

Unlike the typical adjudicatory procedure of FTC litigation, proceedings before the Renegotiation Board involve a series of statutorily prescribed de novo determinations. At each stage of the multilevel process, a litigant risks incurring additional liability. See Note, Developments Under the Freedom of Information Act—1972, 1973 Duke L.J. 178, 179–180, n. 11. Because of the distinctions between litigation before the FTC and the Renegotiation Board, the Supreme Court's holding in Bannercraft may be limited to the "unique" nature of the Renegotiation Board's proceedings. Ibid., 183–184.

Some of the language in Justice Blackmun's majority opinion supports this view. At one point he stated the ruling as follows: "[W]e hold only that in a renegotiation case the contractor is obligated to pursue its administrative remedy. . . ." 42 L.W. at 4209 (emphasis in original). He subsequently declared that "[t]he nature of the renegotiation process mandates this result." Ibid.

If Bannercraft is construed as applying to all administrative agencies, plaintiffs clearly would not be entitled to restrain the pending FTC proceedings. As previously mentioned, they have not exhausted their administrative remedies under the Federal Trade Commission Act and FTC regulations, just as the litigants in Bannercraft had not run the gamut of proceedings prescribed by the Renegotiation Act.

But even if Bannercraft is read narrowly, as may befit the language of the case, the same result would obtain. The Supreme Court expressly refrained from passing upon "whether or under what circumstances, it would be proper for the District Court to exercise jurisdiction to enjoin agency action pending the resolution of an asserted FOIA claim." Ibid. The Circuit Court, however, did pass upon this issue. The guidelines it set forth are not satisfied in the instant case.

The insuperable obstacle to granting a stay here is the absence of "irreparable injury" to the plaintiffs. They say that the upcoming hearing on the merits can be averted only by access to the disputed documents for presentation to the administrative law judge in order that he may reconsider his denial of their motion to dismiss the complaint. By being forced to submit to the adjudicatory hearing, they say that they will be subjected to the following burdens: inability to locate some key witnesses needed to rebut the charges against them; fading memories of those witnesses they manage to secure; costs of maintaining their defense in the administrative proceedings; and the attendant adverse publicity emanating from the FTC's "virtually worthless" charge in the May 2, 1972, press release.

While not insubstantial, these comprise "the usual expense and annoyance which accompany vindication of a right through normal legal channels." Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc. v. Renegotiation

Board, supra, 355. "Mere litigation expense, even substantial and unrecoupable cost," does not constitute irreparable injury for purposes of averting the exhaustion doctrine. Renegotiation Board v. Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc., supra, 4210. Unavailability or ineffectiveness or favorable witnesses also does not constitute "the sort of irreparable injury of which equity normally takes cognizance." Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc. v. Renegotiation Board, supra, 355.

The stigma of the "virtually worthless charge," with its attendant adverse effects on plaintiff's businesses, is comparable to the obloquy one is likely to experience whenever a civil complaint or indictment is filed against him. Having to now undergo administrative hearings to clear their reputations is "a risk of litigation that is inherent in society, and not the type of injury to justify judicial intervention." Sears, Roebuck and Company v. NLRB, supra, at 93. Entitlement to the documents they seek, even if these would be significantly helpful to them, is "of a different order from the kind of irreparable injury required to interrupt an administrative proceeding." Ibid.

Since CDC and AIA may renew their motions to dismiss the complaint during the upcoming administrative hearings, "extraordinary circumstances" do not exist for staying those proceedings. Ibid. Absent a "cogent showing of irreparable harm," they are not entitled to restrain pending FTC proceedings against them. Ibid.

But this does not end the matter. While denying declaratory relief and the restraining of FTC proceedings, the Court retains jurisdiction over the FOIA claims. Because the Commission has now responded to the request for documents, determination of that dispute is now ripe. The case has reached "a posture at which judicial intervention would be effective and appropriate." Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc. v. Renegotiation Board, supra, 354. Summary judgment must therefore be denied.

The question then becomes what kind of intervention is in order. Precluded from staying pending proceedings, the Court is not barred from making an independent determination of the status of the documents demanded by plaintiffs, without having to enjoin the current FTC proceedings. Moreover, since it appears that no further FTC action is scheduled in this matter until commencement of the hearing this August, restraining the proceedings is unnecessary.

Resolution of the dispute under the FOIA can be accomplished expeditiously by compelling submission of the disputed documents for in camera inspection. Ibid., 361; Note, 1973 Duke L.J. 178, supra, 184. This will not interfere with current FTC proceedings. Moreover, exercise of this injunctive power is specifically bestowed by the FOIA and it is not in any way inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decision in Bannercraft. 42 L.W. at 4210.

Accordingly, within ten (10) days of the entry of this Order defendants shall submit to the Court for in camera examination the two documents they claim are exempt from disclosure under the FOIA. Within this same time period, defendants may file with the Court any memoranda they desire in support of their contention. Plaintiffs may within the same time period, of course without access to the submitted documents, file with the Court any memoranda contesting exemption of the documents. During this same time period all parties may also file memoranda regarding the FTC's claim that no further pertinent documents exist.

The Court will then undertake in camera examination of the documents. Should it determine that plaintiffs are entitled to them, the Court will order that they be produced for them. But the Court will not then enjoin the administrative law judge to reconsider his denial of the motion to dismiss the complaint. Ordering such relief would contradict what the Court has said about the inappropriateness of interfering with the pending FTC proceedings.

In his denial of the motion to dismiss, the administrative law judge preserved plaintiffs' rights to renew their request during the adjudicatory proceedings. He also indicated that this may be appropriate upon submission of additional documentation received from the Commission. Therefore, he presumably would be receptive to reconsidering the motion should plaintiffs secure access to the documents they desire and he finds them to be competent and relevant to the prejudice issue.

Alternatively, he may adhere to his observation that this issue must await resolution until more facts are presented during the hearing on the merits. That determination and subsequent action by the administrative law judge or the Commission proper would be outside the equitable scope of this Court.

TRIBUTORS, BUT WOULD BE PERMITTED TO USE RANGES FOR VARIOUS TYPES OF DISTRIBUTORS

[1334] Battery additive manufacturer would not be limited to advertising only average sales or earnings of its distributors rather than being permitted to state ranges for various types of distributors, providing it did not make deceptive use of unusual earnings realized by a few.

2. REQUIREMENT THAT RECORDS BE KEPT REFLECTING SALES, PROFITS OR DISTRIBUTOR EARNINGS "UNDER CIRCUMSTANCES SIMILAR TO" PURCHASERS WAS TOO VAGUE

While Federal Trade Commission could permissibly require battery additive manufacturer to keep records of sales of distributors in various basic categories, such as part-time and full-time workers, requirement that manufacturer keep records reflecting sales, profits or earnings of distributors "under circumstances similar to" purchasers or prospective purchasers was too vague.

3. NO DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS OCCURRED WHERE RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENT WAS NOT SOUGHT IN COMPLAINT, BUT WAS PROPOSED IN COMPLAINT COUNSEL'S BRIEF

In proceeding to require battery additive manufacturer to cease and desist from deceptive advertising, manufacturer was not denied due process because recordkeeping provision of cease and desist order was not sought in complaint, where such provision was proposed in complaint counsel's brief to commission and answered by manufacturer.

4. PORTIONS OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDER REGULATING LABORATORY TEST CLAIMS IN ADDITION TO DURATIONAL CLAIMS WAS PROPER WHERE ADVERTISEMENTS WERE CLEARLY UNSUBSTANTIATED AND LABORATORY TEST CLAIMS WERE WITHOUT QUALIFICATION

Where administrative law judge and commission found that battery additive manufacturer's performance claims relating to durational capacities of additive were clearly unsubstantiated, and commission further found that manufacturer had expressly or impliedly represented additive as laboratory tested, without qualification, and that representations conveyed misleading impression that duration-of-effect claims were based on laboratory tests, portions of cease and desist order regulating laboratory test claims in addition to durational claims was proper.

5. REQUIREMENT OF DISTRIBUTION OF COPIES OF ORDER AND SIGNED ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF RECEIPT THEREOF WAS WITHIN F.T.C.'S AUTHORITY

Commission could require that battery additive manufacturer supply each distributor with copy of order requiring it to cease and desist from deceptive advertising, and to procure signed statements acknowledging receipt thereof.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 492 F. 2d 1333)

On petition for review of cease and desist order of F.T.C., court held that the manufacturer should not be limited to advertising only the average sales or earnings of its distributors; that requirement that manufacturer keep records reflecting sales, profits or earnings of distributors "under circumstances similar to" prospective purchasers was too vague; that requirement to cease making misleading statements as to laboratory tests was reasonable; and that F.T.C. could require manufacturer to distribute copies of the cease and desist order to all distribtuors and to procure signed statement of acknowledged receipt.

Petition denied in part; cause remanded in part.

PER CURIAM:

National Dynamics Corporation (NDC) manufactures a battery additive known as VX-6. It markets the product largely through some 12,000 distributors. Some of these work on a full-time [1335] basis, but most work only part-time. The distributors are not NDC employees, but the company supplies them with sales and advertising materials with which to promote the product.

In November 1969, the Federal Trade Commission issued a complaint against NDC's advertising practices. Broadly speaking, the charges were of two sorts: Some related to allegedly misleading claims concerning potential earnings of VX-6 distributors; others concerned the performance claims NDC made for its product. Following the leisurely course typical of FTC proceedings, this one led to a six paragraph cease and desist order issued February 16, 1973, and ended in an order denying reconsideration dated May 1, 1973.

Only four of the six ordering paragraphs are challenged. Two of these, paragraphs 1 and 2, relate to the overly enthusiastic depiction of the rewards awaiting prospective distributors; one, paragraph 4, relates to representations concerning the performance of VX-6; the remaining one, paragraph 6, directs NDC to deliver a copy of the order to all present salesmen or other persons engaged in the sale of its products and to secure a signed statement acknowledging receipt.

[1] Paragraph 1 requires NDC to cease and desist from > Representing, directly or by implication, that persons purchasing respondents' products can or will derive any stated amount of sales, profits or earnings; or representing, directly or by implication, the past or present sales, profits or earnings of purchasers of respondents' products unless in fact the past sales, or the profits and earnings represented, are those of a substantial number of purchasers and accurately reflect the average sales, profits or earnings of such purchasers under circumstances similar to those of the purchaser or prospective purchaser to whom the representation is made; or misrepresenting, in any manner, the past, present or future sales, profits or earnings from the resale of respondents' products.

In the course of its attack on this paragraph, NDC says it cannot feasibly comply with the phrase "under circumstances similar to those of the purchaser or prospective purchaser to whom the representation is made" since it does not know what the circumstances of any particular purchaser may be. Apparently the Commission was endeavoring to require NDC to disclose whether the distributors whose earnings they cited worked part-time or full-time, but the language is not well adapted to carrying out this sound purpose. We likewise do not see why NDC should be limited to advertising only the average sales or earnings of its distributors rather than be permitted to state ranges for various types of distributors, provided it does not make deceptive use of unusual earnings realized only by a few. We shall not undertake to redraft the paragraph; with some good will on both sides, these problems should be readily susceptible of resolution.[1]

[2, 3] Changes in paragraph 1 will require conforming changes in paragraph 2 which requires NDC to maintain records substantiating the accuracy of its representations. Beyond that, while the Commission can permissibly require NDC to keep records of the sales of distributors in various basic categories, such as part-time and full-time workers, the requirement that the records reflect the sales, profits or earnings of distributors "under circumstances similar to" purchasers or prospective purchasers is too vague. NDC also objects to the recordkeeping requirement because it claims that it cannot feasibly obtain the profit and earn[1336]ings figures of its thousands of distributors. Commission counsel answers that NDC must have records showing the sales to each distributor and information concerning the permitted markup, and that this would suffice if the representations were similarly limited. We think this paragraph should be clarified as indicated. On the other hand, NDC's argument that it was denied due process because the recordkeeping provision was not sought in the complaint, although it was proposed in complaint counsel's appeal brief to the Commission and answered by NDC, is without merit, FTC v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 427–428, 77 S. Ct. 502, 1 L. Ed. 2d. 438 (1957), as NDC's broader attacks even more plainly are.

[1] NDC has called our attention to the action of the FTC in approving an affidavit of compliance on a similar issue in Matter of Merlite Industries, Inc., File No. 6523049, dated March 1, 1967. Without in any way limiting the FTC to that formulation, we think it may afford a useful basis from which to start a redraft.

[4] Paragraph 4 of the order directs NDC to cease and desist from > Representing, directly or by implication, in any advertisement that an independent laboratory has tested any product or that any laboratory test substantiates or supports performance claims in said advertisement, unless each performance claim in said advertisement has been substantiated by a competent scientific test conducted by said laboratory or laboratories and unless such laboratory or laboratories have supplied respondents with a written report which describes, in detail, the entire test performed, including, but not limited [to], the product tested, instruments used, test procedures, data and results of such test.

NDC says this is inconsistent with the findings by the Administrative Law Judge and the Commission that the test reports in the company's possession adequately substantiated its claims concerning the effectiveness of VX-6. However, both the Administrative Law Judge and the Commission found that NDC's performance claims relating to the durational capacities of VX-6 were clearly unsubstantiated. The Commission further found that petitioners had expressly or impliedly represented VX-6 as laboratory-tested, without qualification, and that those representations had conveyed the misleading impression that the duration-of-effect claims were based on laboratory tests. Although petitioners contend that paragraph 4 should, at most, prohibit only unsubstantiated durational claims, the paragraph as written appears reasonably related to the misrepresentations found by the Commission. Accordingly, we find no flaw in paragraph 4, FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 389-390, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965).[2]

[5] We likewise see no merit in NDC's objections to paragraph 6, described above. NDC's point is that since it supplies the distributors with all the advertising materials, there is no need to send a copy of the order and obtain a receipt. But distributors may have a supply of old materials and may not confine themselves to the written word. Since the copies of the order can be delivered along with the revised advertising material, the only burden on NDC is of using certified mail so as to obtain a receipt. To impose this requirement is well within the broad power confided to the FTC in framing remedial orders.

The petition to review is denied except with respect to Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the order which are remanded to the Commission for reformulation in accordance with this opinion. No costs.

[2] Petitioners contend that the initial complaint and proposed order did not adequately identify the issues to be litigated. However, the complaint sufficiently alleged that the performance claims had not been substantiated through adequate testing and that the product had not been "fully tested," and paragraph 4 of the final order is a narrower version of the two portions of the proposed order dealing with representations of testing.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. BEATRICE FOODS CO.*

No. 73-1120. F.T.C. Docket No. 6653.

(United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, March 8, 1974)

1. COMPROMISE ORDER OF F.T.C. PROSCRIBED NOT ONLY ACQUISITION OF INTEREST "IN" A DAIRY, BUT ALSO ACQUISITION OF INTEREST "OF" A DAIRY

   Compromise order of FTC requiring divestiture by distributor of dairy products of five dairies, whether owned in full or in part by distributor, and requiring distributor to cease and desist from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any interest in any firm engaged principally in business of manufacturing, processing or distributing described dairy products did not proscribe only acquisition of interest "in" a dairy, but also proscribed acquisition of interest "of" a dairy.

2. IN DETERMINING PURPOSES OF DECREE, NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN F.T.C. AND APPELLANT BEFORE CONSENT DECREE AND APPELLANT'S POST DECREE CONDUCT WERE NOT MATERIAL

   Negotiations between FTC and distributor of dairy products before consent decree and distributor's post decree conduct were not material in determining purposes of decree.

3. STATUTE DOES NOT REQUIRE NOTICE FOR IMPOSITION OF PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION OF F.T.C. CEASE AND DESIST ORDER

   No notice is required by statute for imposition of penalities for violation of cease and desist order of FTC.

4. APPELLANT'S ACQUISITION OF SALES VOLUME OF DAIRY WAS WRONGFUL, AFTER BEING PLACED ON NOTICE BY F.T.C. DECREE BARRING APPELLANT FROM ACQUIRING ANY "INTEREST IN" A DAIRY FIRM

   FTC decree barring distributor of dairy products from acquiring any "interest in" a dairy firm placed distributor on notice that its acquisition of sales volume of dairy, causing loss of that dairy as competitor, was wrongful.

5. IMPOSITION OF PENALTY FOR PERIOD BEFORE F.T.C. GAVE NOTICE DID NOT VIOLATE DUE PROCESS, WHERE DELAY AND F.T.C. UNCERTAINTY WERE ATTRIBUTABLE TO CORPORATION'S OWN PROCRASTINATION IN GIVING SUFFICIENT INFORMATION UPON WHICH TO ACT

   Where delay and alleged uncertainty of FTC in stating that transactions of corporation were proscribed by prior FTC order were attributable in large measure to corporation's own procrastination in giving FTC sufficient information upon which to act, imposition of penalty for period before FTC gave notice that corporation's conduct violated order did not violate due process.

6. MISCONSTRUCTION OF LAWFUL OBLIGATIONS IS NO DEFENSE IF IN LAW THAT INTERPRETATION IS ERRONEOUS

Simply because a party misconstrues its lawful obligations under consent decree in antitrust case does not afford it a legal defense if in law that interpretation turns out to be erroneous.

7. DAILY PENALTY WAS PROPERLY IMPOSED WHERE EACH DAY'S HOLDING OF ILLEGALLY ACQUIRED INTERESTS WAS A SEPARATE OFFENSE

Each day's holding of illegally acquired interests in violation of Federal Trade Commission's cease and desist order was a separate offense for which daily penalty was properly imposed.

8. DISTRICT COURT HAS STATUTORY AUTHORITY TO ORDER DIVESTITURE OF ACQUIRED INTERESTS WHEN THEY WERE ACQUIRED IN VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ORDER

District court has statutory authority to order corporation to divest itself of interests it acquired in violation of Federal Trade Commission's cease and desist order.

9. F.T.C.'S OBJECTION TO SALE OF ONE PLANT AND STOCK OF ANOTHER TO ONE PURCHASER MERELY MEANT THAT APPELLANT NEEDED TO COME FORWARD WITH AN IMPROVED PACKAGE

In view of provision of FTC cease and desist order to effect that, if corporation established that by its good-faith efforts it had been unable to dispose of five properties to single purchaser, it might dispose of properties to two or more purchasers, approved in advance by FTC, objection by FTC to sale of one plant and stock of another to a single purchaser did not excuse corporation from further performance, but merely meant that it had to come up with a better package.

10. F.T.C.'S APPROVAL OF SALE OF FOUR PROPERTIES DID NOT TERMINATE OBLIGATION TO DISPOSE OF FIFTH PROPERTY UNDER DIVESTITURE ORDER DIVIDED INTO TWO PARTS; NOR WAS THE CORPORATION ENTITLED TO ADDITIONAL 18 MONTHS FROM RECEIPT OF NOTICE OF ITS OBLIGATION TO DIVEST ITSELF OF THE FIFTH PROPERTY

Where FTC divestiture order was divided into two parts: a one-year period in which corporation was to attempt to sell five properties to single purchaser and an additional six months in which it could complete divestitures by sales to separate purchasers, if need be, approval by FTC of sale of four of properties to single purchaser did not render the order inoperative and, as to fifth property, corporation was not entitled to an additional 18 months from date it received notice that it was still obligated to divest itself of that property.

11. GOOD FAITH WAS NOT A COMPLETE DEFENSE TO IMPOSITION OF PENALTIES, MERELY RELEVANT AS TO SEVERITY OF PENALTY TO BE ASSESSED

Good faith was only relevant as to severity of penalty to be assessed against corporation which failed to comply with Federal Trade Commission divestiture order and was not a complete defense to imposition of penalties against it for violation of the order.

In civil enforcement action against distributor of dairy products for alleged violations of F.T.C. consent order, court held that F.T.C.'s decree barring appellant from acquiring any "interest in" a dairy firm placed appellant on notice that its acquisition of the sales volume of another dairy was wrongful; that, because F.T.C.'s delay in stating that transactions were proscribed were caused by appellant's procrastination in providing F.T.C. with sufficient information upon which to act, imposition of penalty for period before F.T.C. gave notice did not violate due process; and court had power to order divestiture.

This is an appeal from a summary judgment granted by the District Court for the District of Minnesota, the Honorable Philip Neville presiding, in a suit brought by the United States against Beatrice Foods Company under § 11(l) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l); and § 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l). The government sought civil penalties and injunctive relief for two violations of a Federal Trade Commission consent order. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the United States, assessed monetary penalties and ordered divestiture of Beatrice's holdings acquired in violation of the FTC order.[1]

On appeal Beatrice contends that:

(a) Under Count I, there has been no showing that Beatrice's transactions with Maple Island Dairies violated the consent decree;

(b) The district court erred in granting summary judgment in that questions of fact exist as to the intended meaning of the consent decree;

(c) The district court erred in imposing daily penalties for the Maple Island transactions, first, because Beatrice was not given adequate notice of the alleged order violation, and second, because there was no continuing violation but only a single illegal acquisition;

(d) The district court lacked the power to grant injunctive relief requiring Beatrice to divest itself of its interest in Maple Island; and

(e) Under Count II, the court erred in requiring Beatrice to divest its minority stock interest in Valley Gold Dairies.

G. THOMAS EISELE, United States District Judge, Eastern District of Arkansas, sitting by designation.

[1] The opinions below are reported at 344 F. Supp. 104 (summary judgment), and 351 F. Supp. 969 (penalties and decree).

Background

In 1956, the Federal Trade Commission instituted proceedings against Beatrice and three of its competitors alleging acquisitions in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and § 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1). The proceedings against Beatrice's competi[1262]tors were all settled by consent decrees.[2] In March, 1964, an FTC hearing examiner held that five of Beatrice's recent acquisitions violated § 7 of the Clayton Act. The examiner ordered divestiture of the five firms and enjoined Beatrice for ten years from acquiring "the whole or any part of the stock, share capital or assets" of any dairy firm. On April 26, 1965, the FTC affirmed the examiner's decision.

Beatrice petitioned for review of the order in the Ninth Circuit. While the petition was pending, the FTC and Beatrice agreed to settle the case with entry of a modified order. In May 1967, the Ninth Circuit modified the FTC order to reflect the settlement and affirmed the order as modified. On June 7, 1967, the FTC issued the modified order.

The modified order required divestiture of five unlawfully acquired dairies, whether owned in whole or in part by Beatrice, to a single purchaser.[3] The order also contained the following cease and desist provision:

> Beatrice shall cease and desist, for a period of ten (10) years from the effective date of this order from acquiring, directly or indirectly, any interest in any firm, corporate or noncorporate, engaged principally or as one of its major commodity lines at the time of such acquisition in any State of the United States or in the District of Columbia in the business of manufacturing, processing or distributing at wholesale or on retail milk routes any of the products described in Paragraph I of this order, without the prior approval of the Commission.

COUNT I: THE MAPLE ISLAND TRANSACTIONS

Count I of the government's complaint alleged that Beatrice violated the above cease and desist order by acquiring an "interest in" Maple Island Dairies. The district court so found.

Maple Island Dairies distributed dairy products in Minnesota and Wisconsin. In 1968, Maple Island decided to dispose of its unprofitable "northern division" distribution system. This division had been distributing dairy products bearing the Maple Island label (1) at four stores owned by Maple Island,[4] (2) along 11 routes operated by Maple Island employees, and (3) along 11 routes owned and operated by independent distributors.

[2] Each firm was ordered to:

[C]ease and desist from acquiring, directly or indirectly, through subsidiaries or otherwise, the whole or any part of the stock, share capital or assets (other than products sold in the course of business) of any concern, engaged * * * in the business of manufacturing, processing or selling at wholesale or on retail milk routes [specified dairy products].

[3] The modified order permitted one dairy in West Virginia to be sold separately. The original order had required divestiture of five dairy plants scattered all over the country. The consent decree, however, substituted five plants all located in the southwest.

Representatives from Maple Island met frequently with representatives of Russell Creamery of Wisconsin, Inc., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Beatrice. As a result of these discussions, the 11 routes owned by Maple Island were converted into independent distributorships. The new distributors purchased from Maple Island the assets used to operate the routes, including inventory and accounts receivable. The purchase of seven of the 11 routes was financed primarily by Beatrice. The new distributors agreed to distribute Maple Island products exclusively. They also executed conditional sales contracts, factor's liens, and notes in favor of Maple Island. Then, Beatrice, Maple Island, and each distributor signed an agreement whereby Maple Island assigned to Beatrice the conditional sales contract, factor's lien, note and franchise agreement, and the distributor accepted the assignment. On September 1, 1968, Russell Creamery [1263] (Beatrice) began supplying the dairy products for all but a few of the new distributors.

The 11 independent Maple Island distributors, who owned their own physical facilities, only owed Maple Island for their 30-day trade accounts. Four paid these amounts themselves, six were financed by Beatrice and one was dropped from the arrangement. Maple Island also granted to Beatrice the right to use Maple Island's labels in the northern division for five years.

As a result of the above transactions, the government charged that Beatrice had violated the consent cease and desist order by acquiring an "interest in" Maple Island.

On appeal, Beatrice argues that the phrase used in the FTC order, "interest in," "does not apply to assets or interests of a dairy, but rather prohibits the acquisition of an interest in a dairy." In rejecting this argument, and in holding that there was no dispute of facts, Judge Neville found that the term "interest" has a consistent and commonly understood meaning in relationship to property, business and other things of value, citing the Restatement of Property § 5:

> The word "interest" is used in this Restatement both generically to include varying aggregates of rights, privileges, powers, and immunities, and distributively to mean any one of them.

The district court then found that:

> "[I]nterest" includes, by definition, the rights transferred here to Beatrice by Maple Island. The license to use the label, the notes, distributorship agreements, > sales contracts and factor's liens are all "rights in the nature of property" and valuable rights forming a part of the business and in many instances comprising assets of Maple Island. Whereas before, Maple Island held all rights, privileges, powers, and immunities relating to the assets transferred, after the transfer, Beatrice held some of those rights and the independent distributors held the rest. And while the sales contracts, factor's liens and notes did not give Beatrice title. Beatrice clearly held a security interest, i.e., a right of ownership contingent upon the default of the titleholder. Such interests are no less interests within the terms of the order because contingent upon default of the debtor. Perhaps most significant, prior to the transfer, Maple Island had the "rights to the benefits" inseparable from the property transferred, i.e., the sales of its milk to the customers along Maple Island's former routes. After the transfer, Beatrice had those rights at least for the minimum period of the distributorship agreements and the advantage of an established and continuing relationship with the distributors. Beatrice thereby gained access to all or most of the customers—the sales volume—who previously bought milk from Maple Island. The net result was an increase in gross sales of Russell Creamery in Superior alone of nearly $1 million, about 30%.

United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F. Supp. 104, 111–112 (D. Minn. 1972).

[1] Beatrice's argument is that the trial court was totally preoccupied with defining "interest" and failed to recognize that the real term of art within the decree is the preposition "in" as distinguished from the possible use of the word "of." Thus it is argued that the compromise decree allows the purchase of interests of a dairy and proscribes only the acquisition of interests in a dairy. We think the argument disingenuous. Neither preposition in the context of the overall decree demonstrates, a definitive, special meaning. Both "in" and "of" are, in common usage, words of function bearing similar connotations of active and possessive participation. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1139, 1565 (1967). We must give the decree its "normal meaning" rather than one party's view of its purpose.

[1264] It is urged the trial court erred in failing to admit evidence of the pre-order negotiations between the parties to ascertain "the purpose" of the decree. Similarly, it is argued that post-decree conduct is also material.[5] We reject this contention on the same grounds that

[5] On January 25, 1968, the FTC informed National Dairy, one of Beatrice's competitors who had earlier signed a consent decree, that the acquisition of the market share of distributors or processors would violate National's order. Specifically, the FTC wrote that:

> National Dairy is hereby notified that the Commission regards the prohibition on acquisitions in said order, Part III, as including the entering into of any arrangement with another party by which National Dairy obtains the market share, in whole or in part, of such other party. Such arrangements would include any transaction by which a processor ceases selling milk under his own label and instead distributes National Dairy milk under one of National Dairy's labels. On the other hand, ordinary requirements or supply contracts under which a processor-distributor discontinues his processing business but continues to operate as a distributor selling, under his own label, milk supplied him by National Dairy would not be regarded as coming within the order. (emphasis added).

The FTC advised Beatrice that it would interpret the Beatrice decree in the same manner, even though the language of the two orders was slightly different. Parenthetically, the trial court did. In United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 682, 91 S. Ct. 1752, 1757, 29 L. Ed. 2d 256 (1971), the Supreme Court observed:

> [T]he scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it. (emphasis added.)

[2] Although we think the order clear, parenthetically we note that it only prohibits acquisitions made without prior Commission approval. Beatrice knew that it was under a broad cease and desist order which was designed to prevent a large multimarket company from acquiring regional dairy firms. Beatrice could easily have allayed the risk of later litigation by seeking the Commission's prior approval before entering into negotiations with Maple Island. Significantly, Beatrice did seek FTC approval for several other acquisitions during this same period of time.

Imposition of Daily Penalties

With regard to the Maple Island transaction, the district court fined Beatrice $200 per day from September 1, 1968 (the date Beatrice began supplying milk to the independent distributors) through October 23, 1970 (the date the government filed its complaint), for a total of $156,400.

Beatrice attacks the imposition of the above penalty on two grounds. First, it argues that it was not given adequate notice of the violation until October 23, [1265] 1970, the date the complaint was filed.[6] Second, Beatrice contends that daily penalties were unwarranted be-we note that the Commission's interpretation of the National Dairy order was subsequently invalidated and no new clarification ensued.

Beatrice contends that the above-underlined sentence expressed the Commission's intent not to prohibit the acquisition of distributorships. It argues that this post-decree conduct by the FTC is relevant to a determination of the order's meaning. However, its authority for this point, United States v. Atlantic Refining Co., 360 U.S. 19, 79 S. Ct. 944, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1054 (1959), does not appear to extend as far as Beatrice would like. There, the Court found from the language of the decree alone that the government's position was at best a strained construction. It then bolstered this view by reference to the government's post-decree conduct, which had been consistent with the Court's reading of the decree. Thus, it appears that the decree in Atlantic Refining was unambiguous and that the post-decree conduct was somewhat superfluous.

Furthermore, as the government notes, the FTC's letter of January 25, 1968, sets forth a far different factual hypothesis than Beatrice's arrangement whereby the rights under the distributorships carried with them the license to use Maple Island's label, its goodwill and sales volume in the northern division.

[6] Since the trial court held that this was the last day for which a penalty could be imposed, acceptance of Beatrice's notice theory would mean that only one day's penalty could be assessed.

cause the consent order prohibits only the act of acquisition and not continued holding of illegally acquired assets. These two contentions will be discussed separately.

A. Notice

Beatrice argues that no penalty could be imposed before the FTC gave notice that Beatrice's conduct was in violation of the cease and desist order. Assessment of penalties for conduct occurring before such notice would, according to Beatrice, violate due process.

We look first at the statutory scheme for the imposition of penalties to determine if a notice requirement was intended by Congress.

When the FTC determines that one of its orders has been violated, the statutory procedure calls for certification of pertinent facts to the Attorney General. 15 U.S.C. § 56. If the Attorney General decides to bring suit, the penalty provisions of § 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l), and § 11(l) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), come into play.[7] These statutes contain no notice requirement. In United States v. J. B. Williams Co., Inc., 354 F. Supp. 521 (S.D.N.Y.), appeal docketed, No. 73-1624 (2d Cir. 1973), the district court unequivocally rejected the argument that notice is statutorily required:

> The court disagrees with defendants' assertion that "it is settled that the Government may not impose penalties under 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) with respect to alleged violations of orders where these violations preceded Commission notice that the conduct was deemed in violation of the order." Defendants' Memorandum 58-59. Such notice is neither required by the statutory scheme nor by the Commission's rules and procedures. The only procedural step required by the F.T.C. Act before institution of a Section 5(l) suit is the certification of facts relating to the alleged violation to the Attorney General. See Section 16, 15 U.S.C. § 56. A blanket rule requiring prior notice by the Commission of alleged violations of its orders has absolutely no statutory basis whatever.

[7] Section 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l), provides:

Any person, partnership, or corporation who violates an order of the Commission to cease and desist after it has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.

Section 11(l) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), provides:

Any person who violates any order issued by the commission or board under subsection (b) of this section after such order has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of any such order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the commission or board each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.

Id., 354 F. Supp. at 532 (emphasis added).

The legislative history of the penalty provisions supports this conclusion. The Federal Trade Commission Act was amended in 1938 by the Wheeler-Lea Act, which provided that FTC orders would become final in 60 days or upon completion of review proceedings in the courts of appeals. Act of March 21, 1938, 52 Stat. 111. The Clayton Finali[1266]ty Act of 1959 similarly amended the Clayton Act. Act of July 23, 1959, 73 Stat. 243. These significant changes lend considerable support to the government's position that no notice is required by the statute. Prior to 1938, the Commission had to prove three violations before penalties could be assessed. First, it had to prove a violation upon which to base its own cease and desist order. Second, it had to prove a violation of the order (i.e., conduct occurring after the issuance of the order) before a court of appeals could enforce the order. Finally, it had to prove a third violation for a violator to be held in contempt of the court of appeals enforcement order. The Wheeler-Lea Amendment changed this cumbersome procedure. However, the same three steps remained in effect insofar as Clayton Act violations were concerned until 1959. The legislative history of the Clayton Finality Act, discussed in FTC v. Jantzen, Inc., 386 U.S. 228, 87 S. Ct. 998, 18 L. Ed. 2d 11 (1967), makes it clear that that amendment was designed to streamline enforcement proceedings under the Clayton Act in the same manner as the Wheeler-Lea Amendment had done for the FTC Act:

> The effectiveness of the Clayton Act . . . has long been handicapped by the absence of adequate enforcement provisions. . . . S. 726 would put teeth into Clayton Act orders and would fill the enforcement void which has existed for many years.

S. Rep. No. 83, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1959), U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1959, p. 1815.

> The bill . . . is in effect a perfecting amendment to the Clayton Act. It has no other purpose than to effect the will of Congress with respect to the role of the Federal Trade Commission in Clayton Act enforcement in the same manner and to the same degree that the will of Congress was effectuated by the Wheeler-Lea amendments to the Federal Trade Commission Act.

105 Cong. Res. 12732.

In FTC v. Henry Broch & Co., 368 U.S. 360, 82 S. Ct. 431, 7 L. Ed. 2d 353 (1962), the Supreme Court discussed this legislative history and then noted:

> In contrast, the procedures that are contained in the Federal Trade Commission Act for enforcement of cease-and-desist orders issued thereunder are much simpler and more direct. A cease-and-desist order issued pursuant to section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, becomes final upon the expiration of the time allowed for filing a petition for review, if no such petition is filed within that time.

Id. at 366 n. 6, 82 S. Ct. at 435 quoting H.R. Rep. No. 580, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 4, U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1959, p. 1804.

However, the Supreme Court did warn that overly broad language in an FTC order would not necessarily "withstand scrutiny under the 1959 amendments." The Court said:

> The severity of possible penalties prescribed by the amendments for violations of orders which have become final underlines the necessity for fashioning orders which are, at the outset, sufficiently clear and precise to avoid raising serious questions as to their meaning and application.

Broch, supra, at 367–368, 82 S. Ct. at 436.

See also, Sperry Rand Corp. v. FTC, 110 U.S. App. D.C. 1, 288 F. 2d 403, 404 (1961); and United States v. Standard Distributors, Inc., 267 F. Supp. 7, 9 (N.D. Ill. 1967), for a similar interpretation. Cf. United States v. H. M. Prince Textiles, Inc., 262 F. Supp. 383, 388 (S.D.N.Y. 1966).

[3] We are thus satisfied that no notice is required under the statutes. However, this does not resolve the constitutional challenge to the imposition of penalties before notice of violation is given. As indicated Beatrice asserts that notice was not given until the complaint was filed. On the other hand, the government's position is that the cease and [1267] desist order itself gives sufficient notice of what conduct is proscribed.

Beatrice relies primarily on Continental Baking Co. v. Dixon, 283 F. Supp. 285 (D. Del. 1968). There, the government notified Continental that its compliance report, with regard to a cease and desist order previously entered against it, was unacceptable in that the information it contained was indequate and incomplete. Thereafter, Continental filed a supplemental report. The FTC then notified Continental that the reports did not show compliance and added that it was unable to determine whether Continental was in violation of the order without more information.

Continental then brought suit, seeking to quash the FTC's order for a third report and requesting a preliminary stay suspending penalties until the dispute over the reports was settled. Under Continental's interpretation of the statute, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l), it would be subject to penalties for each day that the controversy remained unresolved (if it were ultimately found in violation)—hence, the request for the stay.

The court found that the penalty issue was not ripe for review:

> If the Court were to accept Continental's view of the relevant statutory provision it would be constrained to grant the stay requested, but as the Court reads the provisions of 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) in conjunction with the rules and > regulations[8] of the Federal Trade Commission, the Commission has the obligation to determine and to inform parties whether and to what extent their conduct may be in violation of a cease and desist order. It is only after the Commission has made such a finding that the penalties contemplated by 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) could be assessed, and only from that day forward. Any other interpretation of the statute and regulations would raise serious questions of due process.

> In the instant case, the Commission concedes that it has made no decision as to whether plaintiff's conduct violates the cease and desist order. As this Court views the litigation at this preliminary stage, no penalties have accrued against which this Court could issue a stay, and thus, there is no justiciable controversy which would render the case ripe and proper for review.

Continental Baking Co v. Dixon, 283 F. Supp. 285, 287–288 (D. Del. 1968).

Beatrice likewise relies on the dictum of the district court found in United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., No. C–1220 (D. Colo. Aug. 2, 1971), aff'd, 485 F. 2d 16 (10th Cir. 1973). That case was also a suit by the government to recover civil penalties and injunctive relief for violations of a consent cease and desist order. Although the district court found that the transactions violated, the order, it refused to impose daily penalties based on the "single acquisition" theory (discussed infra). With respect to notice, ITT Continental apparently contended that the FTC had to notify it of its intent to certify the case to the Attorney General. The district court rejected this argument; however, it added the following statement:

> Had the Court concluded that the violations were continuing in nature, a determination of the question of whether or not reasonable notice should have been given would be required. In light of the Court's finding in paragraph 7 hereof, this question need not be resolved, but, as obiter dictum, it would seem unreasonable to permit the commission to knowingly let daily penalties accrue without giving notice of the commission's position at the earliest reasonable time.

Slip Opinion at 5 (emphasis added).

[1268] In affirming the district court, the Tenth Circuit made no mention of the notice issue, presumably because it was unnecessary in light of the court's holding that daily penalties were unwarranted.[9]

[8] As the government points out in its brief, the court never indicated what rules and regulations of the Commission it was referring to. There are no Commission regulations which require the giving of notice of a violation.

[9] The only other case to consider the notice issue in the constitutional sense appears to be United States v. J. B. Williams Co. Inc., 354 F.Supp. 521 (S.D.N.Y.), appeal docketed, No. 73–1624 (2d Cir. 1973). Although the court rejected the constitutional argument, it appears that the case is distinguishable on its facts:

> If defendants intend by this assertion to claim a violation of their right to due process in this case, the claim is rejected. The record shows that the FTC informed defendants that the advertisements contained in their first compliance report were in violation of the order. The Commission took the unusual step of permitting defendants to file a second compliance report. The Commission informed defendants in June, 1969, on the basis of this report, that they were still not in compliance with the order. When, after this notice and after 17 months since the order became final, defendants proceeded to disseminate the advertisements challenged here without prior approval by the Commission, defendants acted at their own peril.

J. B. Williams, supra, 354 F.Supp. at 532–533 (emphasis added).

Beatrice attempts to bolster its due process argument with the following facts:

(1) On December 9, 1968, the Commission notified Beatrice by letter that it had come to the Commission's attention that Beatrice "may have acquired, directly or indirectly, an interest in Maple Island. . . ." This letter also requested Beatrice to submit all information relevant to the Maple Island transaction and "a detailed statement why, in Beatrice's opinion, the acquisitions or transactions are not subject to the Commission's order."

(2) In January, 1969, Beatrice filed its annual compliance report, in which it referred only to "agreements with independent distributors of Maple Island." This information being inadequate, the Commission, by letter dated April 29, 1969, again requested Beatrice to provide detailed information regarding the Maple Island "arrangements." It does not appear in the record that Beatrice ever replied directly to this letter.

(3) On September 12, 1969, the Commission resolved to investigate Beatrice's compliance with the order. By letter of September 12, 1969, the Commission informed Beatrice of the resolution. The letter also rejected Beatrice's 1969 compliance report "for the reason that the Commission is unable to determine from such report the manner and extent of Beatrice's compliance with [the cease and desist] order." The letter further stated that the Commission was of the opinion that the report "raises a real question as to whether the arrangements did not in fact involve fundamental questions of order coverage." Pursuant to the September 12, 1969, resolution, the Commission also ordered Beatrice and Maple Island to file special reports. These reports were filed with the Commission in November, 1969.

(4) On June 17, 1970, the Commission certified to the Attorney General the facts it felt constituted violations of the order. It does not appear from the record that Beatrice was notified of this certification. On the Commission's recommendation, the Attorney General filed suit on October 23, 1970.

In summary, none of the Commission's communications with Beatrice prior to October 23, 1970, unequivocally stated that the Commission felt Beatrice was in violation of the order.[10] At most, the Commission indicated that possible violations existed which warranted further investigation. Beatrice urges that this is exactly what Continental Baking Co. v. Dixon, supra, held to be insufficient notice.

The government does not attempt to distinguish Dixon, but simply asserts that the decision ignores the statutory [1269] scheme.[11]

[10] As will be discussed, the government specifically informed Beatrice of the Valley Gold (Count II) violation.

[11] The government points to United States v. Ancorp National Services, Inc., 367 F. Supp. 1221 (S.D.N.Y. 1971), where, in a ruling on a preliminary motion, the court characterized Dixon as "a misconception of the entire statutory framework."

Relying on the previously discussed legislative history, the government argues that the order itself is sufficient notice of the duty it imposes.

[4, 5] We think the basic question necessarily turns on whether the order itself is sufficiently clear to place Beatrice on notice of the prohibited conduct. The question of proper notice, as in cases of statutory construction, depends on whether the order itself is so vague "that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application . . . ."
Cf. Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391, 46 S. Ct. 126, 127, 70 L. Ed. 322 (1926). This same reasoning must apply to construction of the order here involved. Our examination satisfies us that the FTC decree barring Beatrice from acquiring any "interest in" a dairy firm was in fact sufficiently precise in terminology to place Beatrice on notice of its wrongful action in its transactions with Maple Island Dairies. Additionally, one cannot completely ignore the atmosphere and official history surrounding the cease and desist order. We think it obvious, as the trial court concluded, that "the acquisition of the sales volume by Beatrice and the loss of Maple Island as a competitor is the kind of event the order was intended to prevent." Moreover, the delay and alleged uncertainty of the FTC in stating that the transactions were proscribed is attributable in large measure to Beatrice's own procrastination in giving the FTC sufficient information upon which to act. If Beatrice had simply taken the trouble to seek permission of the FTC or even to make inquiries whether FTC approval was necessary, much delay could have been avoided.

[6] Litigation continually arises as to the meaning and breadth to be given consent decrees in antitrust cases. Cf. United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 91 S. Ct. 1752, 29 L. Ed. 2d 256 (1971); United States v. Atlantic Refining Co., 360 U.S. 19, 79 S. Ct. 944, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1054 (1959). Simply because a party misconstrues its lawful obligations under such decrees, it is not afforded a legal defense if in law that interpretation turns out to be erroneous. Misunderstanding of the law is no more an excuse under the Clayton Act than anywhere else. In effect, the argument proffered here is similar to the defendant's contention, urged more emphatically in the district court under Count II, that it acted in good faith. We think, as did the district court, that if this has any relevancy at all it is a factor to be considered by the trial court only in measuring or mitigating the penalty.

B. The Offense: Single or Continuing?

The continuing penalty provisions of 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l) are virtually identical. Section 21(l) provides in part:

> Each separate violation of any such order shall be a separate offense, *except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a > final order of the commission or board each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense. (emphasis added.)

Beatrice argues that here there was no continuing violation. Since the consent decree prohibits only "acquisitions" [12] rather than "acquisitions and further holdings," Beatrice argues that it has committed only one violation because an acquisition is an isolated occurrence which is not continuing in nature.[13] The government, on the [1270] other hand, argues that an acquisition is a continuing offense until it is undone.

This case is factually similar to United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., No. C–1220 (D. Colo. Aug. 2, 1971), aff'd, 485 F. 2d 16 (10th Cir. 1973), wherein the Tenth Circuit adopted the position advocated by Beatrice, i.e., that the FTC order [14] merely proscribed the acquisition of assets: "The acquisition itself, and not the method of operation thereafter, is the critical factor, and this is the event or incident to which the complaint and the order were directed." 485 F. 2d at 19 (emphasis in original).

Such a limited construction of the order ignores the crucial effects of an acquisition and would render nonacquisition orders virtually meaningless.[15] As the government persuasively urges here:

> For competitive purposes there is nothing intrinsically wrong with the "act of acquisition" in and of itself. Rather it is the effect of an acquisition, the relationship it creates which may lead to its proscription. . . . The order's express and agreed terms barred further "acquisitions" and that term plainly had the same meaning as in Section 7 of the Clayton Act. The anti-competitive effects of acquisitions condemned by Section 7 come from the fact that, by holding the assets, the acquiring firm changes the competitive structure of the industry involved. It is the permanent effect of prohibited acquisitions which Congress sought to remedy in the statute . . . . [Any other interpretation] would convert

[13] Beatrice concedes that an order could be drawn which would prohibit acquisitions and further holdings; however, it argues that the order in question was not so drawn. Beatrice does not cite to any nonacquisition orders drawn with what it considers the requisite specificity. The clause in the Beatrice order seems to be the standard nonacquisition language.

[15] The Tenth Circuit stated that the imposition of [single] penalties "does not insulate the consequences of the acquisition from further proceedings which remain available to the Government." 485 F. 2d at 21 (emphasis added). Although it did not give any indication as to what these further proceedings are, there appear to be only two conceivable alternatives. First, the government could bring a contempt action for violation of the order, in which case the penalties would be within the discretion of the court. However, since the contempt suit and the civil penalty suit are regarded as concurrent remedies (see United States v. Standard Distributors, Inc., 267 F. Supp. 7, 10–11 [N.D. Ill. 1967]) equally available to the government, there is no reason to limit the government to the contempt action when it is seeking more than $5,000 in penalties. Second, the government could bring a separate action for divestiture (or, as it did here, seek divestiture as another remedy for the order violation). However, divestiture alone is clearly not an adequate alternative. In the present case, Beatrice has enjoyed the benefits of the illegal acquisition since September 1, 1968, and continues to do so to this date since the district court's order was stayed pending appeal.

> all orders barring future acquisitions into minor expenses of any acquisition or merger, for the prohibition could be avoided by payment of a $5,000 penalty. (emphasis added).

In Gottesman v. General Motors Corp., 414 F. 2d 956 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 403 U.S. 911, 91 S. Ct. 2208, 29 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1971), the court reasoned:

> Here the very acquisition and position of potential control which was found violative of the Clayton Act as of 1949 continued through 1961. We need not dispute the statement of the district court that, in the ordinary antitrust case, there is no "presumption of continuance of unlawful conduct." Here, however, what was unlawful was du Pont's status as stockholder in General Motors, and that status continued until divestiture.

Id. at 965 (emphasis added).

Similarly, in United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 77 S. Ct. 872, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057 (1957), the defendants argued that where the challenged stock acquisition occurred in 1917, the government could not bring suit in 1949 to undo the acquisition since § 7 was applicable only to the acquisition and not to the subsequent holding of the stock. The Supreme Court rejected this argument:

> We repeat, that the test of a violation of § 7 is whether, at the time of suit, [1271] there is a reasonable probability that the acquisition is likely to result in the condemned restraints. . . . The fire that was kindled in 1917 continues to smolder.

Id. at 607, 77 S. Ct. at 884 (emphasis added).[16]

In United States v. Schine, 260 F. 2d 552 (2d Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 934, 79 S. Ct. 318, 3 L. Ed. 2d 306 (1959), the defendants were found to have violated an antitrust decree by acquiring interests in theaters without prior court approval. The defendants tried to argue that the statute of limitations on these acquisitions had run; however, the court held:

> [A]lthough the initial acts in contempt of the decree occurred prior to the statutory period, the "illegal" conditions which they created continued up to the date of the order to show cause and resulted in what might be called "continuing contempts."

Id. at 555–556.

[7] It is significant that Beatrice does not contest the imposition of daily penalties for the Count II (Valley Gold) failure to divest. As the government points out, the daily penalty provision was thought necessary in the case of divestiture orders because otherwise "an order dissolving an unlawful merger could be ignored after the mere payment of a $5,000 fine." H.R. Rep. No. 580, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 7, U.S.

[16] Gottesman and du Pont each involved § 7 of the Clayton Act. Since the cease and desist order in our case is based upon the 1956 findings of the FTC that Beatrice had violated § 7, interpretations of that statute should be equally pertinent to an interpretation of the consent order.

Code Cong. & Admin. News 1959, p. 1807. If each day's holding of assets subject to a divestiture order is a separate offense, we think the same should be true of each day's holding of illegally acquired interests.

Equitable Power of District Court To Order Divestiture

The district court's order of December 26, 1972, required Beatrice to divest itself:

> absolutely and outright in good faith of all rights, titles, interests, assets and facilities including the use thereof, directly or indirectly acquired by defendant or its agents and subsidiaries in the former so-called northern division or area of Maple Island Dairy as the result of, and arising out of, its arrangements, contracts, or agreements or those of defendant's agents and subsidiaries, with Maple Island Dairy or others.

United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 351 F. Supp. 969, 972 (D. Minn. 1972).

[8] Beatrice complains that the district court lacked authority to enter the above order. Beatrice relies primarily on Herbold Laboratory, Inc. v. United States, 413 F. 2d 342 (9th Cir. 1969). In Herbold, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that "Congress, in prescribing a civil action for monetary penalties [15 U.S.C. § 45(l)], indicated no intent that the equitable powers of District Courts to issue injunctions might also be invoked." Id. at 344. The court further observed that:

> When a statute so clearly provides certain, specific sanctions for violations of a Cease and Desist Order, we cannot believe that the courts should reach beyond the statutory provisions and exert a power which, apparently, the Congress has deliberately withheld.

Id.[17]

[17] It is significant to note that the Herbold court reversed the district court in toto because it found that Herbold had not violaed the cease and desist order. Moreover, the government had not requested injunctive relief until the time of closing argument before the trial court. The Ninth Circuit discussed the injunctive power question only because it was not sure that "the District Court, had it reached the conclusion that the appellants had not violated the Order, would not have undertaken to enjoin future violations." Herbold, supra at 344. Thus, the reasoning of the Ninth Circuit with respect to the propriety of injunctive relief was clearly dicta. The rationale of Herbold has been rejected by other courts. See United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., C–1220 (D. Colo. Aug. 2, 1971), aff'd, 485 F. 2d 16 (10th Cir. 1973) : United States v. Bostic, 336 F. Supp. 1312 (D.S.C. 1971), aff'd per curiam, 473 F. 2d 1388 (4th Cir. 1972). cert, denied, 411 U.S. 966, 93 S. Ct. 2146, 36 L. Ed. 2d 686 (1973) ; United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 234 F. Supp. 710 (S.D. N.Y. 1964), aff'd per curiam, 352 F. 2d (2d Cir. 1965).

In Porter v. Warner Holding Co., 328 U.S. 395, 66 S. Ct. 1086, 90 L. Ed. 1332 (1946), the Price Administrator brought suit to enjoin a landlord from violating the Emergency Price Control Act and to require him to make restitution to tenants of excess rents collected. The trial court granted the injunction, but denied the restitution order because it felt there was no jurisdiction under the statute for restitution.

The Supreme Court reversed, finding that the district court's inherent equitable powers could be used to sustain a restitution order:

> Moreover, the comprehensiveness of this equitable jurisdiction is not to be denied or limited in the absence of a clear and valid legislative command. Unless a statute in so many words, or by a necessary and inescapable inference, restricts the court's jurisdiction in equity, the full scope of that judisdiction is to be recognized and applied. "The great principles of equity, securing complete justice, should not be yielded to light inferences, or doubtful construction." Brown v. Swann, 10 Pet. 497, 503, 9 L. Ed., 508. See also Hecht Co. v. Bowles, supra, 321 U.S. 321, 330, 64 S. Ct. 587, 88 L. Ed. 754.

Porter, supra at 398, 66 S. Ct. at 1089 (emphasis added).
See also Wyandotte Transportation Co. v. United States, 389 U.S. 191, 200, 88 S. Ct. 379, 19 L. Ed. 2d 407 (1967); Mitchell v. DeMario Jewelry, Inc., 361 U.S. 288, 291–292, 80 S. Ct. 332, 4 L. Ed. 2d 323 (1960); Culpepper v. Reynolds Metals Co., 421 F. 2d 888 (5th Cir. 1970).[18]

Finally, we note that the underlying statutory basis for an FTC cease and desist order is § 7 of the Clayton Act. Apropos to our discussion is the Supreme Court's discussion of that section in United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 328–331, 81 S. Ct. 1243, 1251–1253, 6 L. Ed. 2d 318 (1961):

> It cannot be gainsaid that complete divestiture is peculiarly appropriate in cases of stock acquisitions which violate § 7. That statute is specific and "narrowly directed," . . . . The very words of § 7 suggest that an undoing of the acquisition is a natural remedy. Divestiture or dissolution has traditionally been the remedy for [1273] Sherman Act violations whose heart is intercorporate combination and control, and it is reasonable to think immediately of the same remedy when § 7 of the Clayton Act, which particularizes the Sherman Act standard of illegality, is involved. Of the very few litigated § 7 cases which have

[18] As stated in Walling v. Brooklyn Braid Co., Inc., 152 F. 2d 938 (2d Cir. 1945):
The action taken below was based upon the general powers of courts of equity to grant injunctions and, as in cases between private litigants, the public interest is always to be considered and protected when such a court in the exercise of its sound discretion grants or withholds injunctive relief. Central Kentucky Gas Co. v. Railroad Commission, 290 U.S. 264, 271, 54 S. Ct. 154, 78 L. Ed. 307; United States v. Morgan, 307 U.S. 183, 194, 59 S. Ct. 795, 83 L. Ed. 1211. In a case like this it is self-evident that the public interest is directly concerned in the proper enforcement of a valid wage order. Good administration of the statute is in the public interest and that will be promoted by taking timely steps when necessary to prevent violations either when they are about to occur or prevent their continuance after they have begun. The trial court is not bound by the strict requirements of traditional equity as developed in private litigation but in deciding whether or not to grant an injunction in this type of case should also consider whether the injunction is reasonably required as an aid in the administration of the statute, to the end that the Congressional purposes underlying its enactment shall not be thwarted.
Id. at 940–941 (emphasis added).

been reported, most decreed divestiture as a matter of course. Divestiture has been called the most important of antitrust remedies. It is simple, relatively easy to administer, and sure. It should always be in the forefront of a court's mind when a violation of § 7 has been found. (emphasis added.)[19]

COUNT II: THE VALLEY GOLD TRANSACTION

As part of the consent decree, Beatrice was ordered to divest itself of its ownership of certain plants. The relevant portion of the decree reads:

> Beatrice Foods Co., ("Beatrice"), within a period not exceeding eighteen (18) months from the effective date of this order, unless extended, shall divest it self absolutely and in good faith to a purchaser approved in advance by the Commission, of all plants which are owned in whole or in part by Beatrice or operated by Beatrice at Pasadena, California (two plants); Cedar City, Utah; El Paso, Texas; Roswell, New Mexico; Albuquerque, New Mexico; all locations in the State of Arizona; and Morgantown, West Virginia, . . . as may be necessary to restore the properties as competitive entities, all as hereinafter provided.
> Provided, however, that this order does not require that the plant, assets, properties and businesses located at Morgantown, West Virginia, be sold to the purchaser of the other plants, assets, properties and businesses described above.
> Provided further, however, that if, at the expiration of one year from the effective date of this order, Beatrice establishes that despite its good faith efforts it has been unable to dispose of the plants, assets, properties and businesses described above—other than those located at Morgantown, West Virginia—to a single purchaser, Beatrice may dispose of said plants, assets, properties and businesses to two or more purchasers, approved in advance by the Commission.
> As used in this order the term "assets, properties and businesses conducted by Beatrice at or in conjunction with said plants" shall include all dairy distribution stations and branches regardless of where located, which are owned in whole or in part by Beatrice or operated by Beatrice and supplied by any of said plants.

In the fall of 1967, Beatrice presented for FTC approval an offer to purchase the El Paso dairy and the 18½% stock interest in Valley Gold Dairies, Albuquerque. This offer was rejected by the FTC, presumably because it did not dispose of all of the properties in the order to a single purchaser.

In January, 1969, Beatrice presented for FTC approval a plan to sell the four wholly-owned Beatrice properties in El Paso, Texas; Glendale, Arizona; Cedar City, Utah; and Pasadena, California, to a single purchaser. No one but the Valley Gold majority stockholder was interested in purchasing Beatrice's Valley Gold stock. However, this stockholder was not interested in all four of the other properties. Thus, it was impossible to sell all five to a single purchaser. Accordingly, the FTC approved the sale of the other four properties to a single [1274] purchaser, knowing that the Valley Gold stock was not part of the package. Thereafter the following events ensued:

[19] On November 16, 1973, § 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act was amended, expressly empowering district courts "to grant mandatory injunctions and such other and further equitable relief as they deem appropriate . . . ." Pub. L. No. 93–153, § 408(c), U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 1973, p. 656. In a letter to this court, the government has urged alternatively the retroactive applicability of this amendment because of its "remedial" nature. In view of our holding, we need not pass on this question.

(1) On March 6, 1969 (after the expiration of the 18-month period of the order), the FTC asked Beatrice to inform the FTC of its efforts regarding compliance with the divestiture order vis-a-vis the Valley Gold stock.

(2) Beatrice initially attempted to have the Valley Gold stock deleted from the order. The FTC denied this petition. In August, 1969, Beatrice therefore requested an extension of time until August 31, 1970, in which to divest the Valley Gold stock.

(3) The FTC denied the extension request, but said no action would be taken against Beatrice if the sale were completed by November 15, 1969.

(4) On November 14, 1969, Beatrice requested an extension until February 15, 1970. The FTC denied this request on December 12, 1969, and informed Beatrice that it intended to institute enforcement proceedings.

(5) On December 30, 1969, Beatrice requested FTC approval to sell the stock to the estate of the majority stockholder. Approval was given and the sale was actually completed on January 2, 1970.

The district court entered summary judgment for the government on this count as well, assessing penalties from November 15, 1969.

Beatrice argues that the order required timely divestiture of "all plants which are owned in whole or in part by Beatrice or operated by Beatrice at . . . Albuquerque, New Mexico." (emphasis added.) Beatrice contends that it never owned, in whole or in part, a "plant" in Albuquerque and urges that the trial court erred in equating a minority stock interest with ownership of a plant.

In its answer to the complaint, Beatrice "admits that it was required to divest itself of its interest in . . . Valley Gold Dairies."[20] Thus, there existed no material question of fact with respect to the meaning of the order. The trial court was correct in rejecting this argument.

[9] Beatrice's second contention is that the FTC's approval of the sale of the four properties to a single purchaser constituted a waiver of that portion of the order requiring divestiture of the Valley Gold stock. There is no merit to this argument. Beatrice completely ignores the proviso to the order which reads as follows:

> Provided further, however, that if, at the expiration of one year from the effective date of this order, Beatrice establishes that despite its good faith efforts > it has been unable to dispose of the plants, assets, properties and businesses described above—other than those located at Morgantown, West Virginia—to a single purchaser, Beatrice may dispose of said plants, assets, properties and businesses to two or more purchasers, approved in advance by the Commission.

[20] The trial court also examined internal Beatrice memoranda which it found unequivocally recognized Beatrice's obligation to divest the Valley Gold stock.

This paragraph simply means that the FTC's approval of the sale of the four properties only relieved Beatrice of the obligation to sell all five to a single purchaser. Beatrice was still required to find a second purchaser for the Valley Gold stock.

It is totally irrelevant that in 1967 the FTC rejected a proposed sale of the El Paso plant and the Valley Gold stock to a single purchaser. The FTC was merely trying to effectuate the purpose of the order, which would have been thwarted by approval of such a sale. The rejection simply meant that Beatrice had to come up with a better package, not that it was excused from further performance.

[10] Beatrice next contends that it was entitled to an additional eighteen months in which to divest the Valley Gold stock from March 6, 1969, the date [1275] when, according to Beatrice, it first received notice that it was still obligated to divest the Valley Gold stock. We disagree. Beatrice had notice from the date of the order that it had eighteen months in which to divest all five properties. As discussed earlier, the FTC's approval of the sale of the four properties did not terminate Beatrice's obligation to sell the Valley Gold stock. The divestiture order is clearly divided into two parts: (1) a one-year period in which Beatrice was to attempt to sell all five properties to a single purchaser, and (2) an additional six months in which Beatrice could complete the divestitures by sales to separate purchasers, if need be. Thus, the old order did not become "inoperative" when the first sale was approved; rather, it simply progressed to the second stage.

[11] Finally, Beatrice raises a good faith defense to the Valley Gold count. It argues that it was placed in an impossible position because there was only one purchaser interested in the Valley Gold stock, and this purchaser was not interested in the other properties. And, after the approved sale of the other properties, Beatrice still had difficulty completing the Valley Gold sale because of the purchaser's refusal to pay what Beatrice considered a fair price. The trial court properly rejected the good faith argument as a complete defense.[21]

[21] The court did, however, consider defendant's claimed good faith when it assessed penalties at the rate of $200 per day, rather than the $5,000 per day requested by the government. Judge Neville observed:

> The court has some sympathy as a business proposition with defendant's difficulty in finding a ready market for a minority stock interest in a closed corporation, particularly where the principal stockholder of the corporation became deceased. The court also recognizes defendant did divest itself of its other properties as required and eventually of the Valley Gold stock, though some 49 days too late and beyond the last extension of time.

United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 351 F. Supp. 969, 971 (D. Minn. 1972).

The discretionary nature of the penalties here involved is crucial. Thus, in United States v. H.M. Prince Textiles, Inc., 262 F. Supp. 383 (S.D.N.Y. 1966), the court held that good faith is not a defense to an action for civil penalties under § 45(l). Accord, United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 212 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1962). In H.M. Prince, the court observed that the order's "main objective is to insure the protection of the public which must be protected whether the violations are intentional or not." H.M. Prince, supra 262 F. Supp. at 388. Thus, we conclude, as did the district court, that good faith is only relevant to the severity of the penalty to be assessed.

The trial court's judgment on both counts is affirmed.

F.T.C. v. BRITISH OXYGEN CO., LTD., ET AL.*

Civ. A. No. 74–31. F.T.C. Docket No. 8955.

(United States District Court, District of Delaware, March 11, 1974)

On petition for preliminary injunction, court held that F.T.C. had made a proper showing under Sec. 13(b) of the F.T.C. Act that an acquisition made by respondents may be found to violate Sec. 7 of the Clayton Act and Sec. 5 of the F.T.C. Act and entered a preliminary injunction which required British manufacturer and American producer of industrial gases to maintain the U.S. firm as a viable, separate and independent company and to refrain from encumbering or transferring stock of the U.S. firm.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

The Federal Trade Commission's (the "Commission") application for a preliminary injunction under Section 13(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended by Section 408(f) of the Trans-Alaska

---

*Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. ¶75,003, at 96.445 (1974–1 Trade Cases). Order amending preliminary injunction dated March 11, 1974. For case before the Commission, see 86 F.T.C. 1241. See also p. 910 herein.

Pipeline Authorization Act, P.L. 93–153, 87 Stat. 588, Nov. 16, 1973 [15 U.S.C. § 53(b)] having come on for hearing on March 8, 1974, and the Court having independently considered the affidavits, exhibits and briefs of the parties and oral argument of opposing counsel, the Court Finds and Concludes:

1. That the Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter and over all of the above named appearing respondents, viz. British Oxygen Company, Ltd., ("BOC"), a United Kingdom company, BOC Financial Corporation ("BOC Financial"), a Delaware corporation, BOC Holdings, Ltd. ("BOC Holdings"), a United Kingdom company, British Oxygen Investments, Ltd. ("BO Investments"), a United Kingdom company, and Airco, Incorporated ("Airco"), a New York corporation.

2. That the Commission has sufficiently demonstrated its "reason to believe" that Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, may be violated by the acquisition of Airco's stock by BOC through its subsidiaries.

3. That the Commission has made a "proper showing" of a "likelihood of ultimate success" under Section 13(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act that BOC's acquisition of Airco's stock may be found to be in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act at the conclusion of its administrative proceedings now pending before it.

4. That the weighing of the equities is in favor of the application and that the matter is in the public interest.

> I. Now Therefore, pending the entry of a final order as defined in 15 U.S.C. §§ 21 and 45 in respect to the administrative complaint now before the Commission, this Court hereby issues the following preliminary injunction, Directing and Ordering BOC, BOC Financial, BOC Holdings, BO Investments and Airco, the named respondents, each of their officers, directors, employees and agents, each of their subsidiaries, successors and assigns, and all other persons in active concert or participation with respondents who shall have received actual notice of this order by personal service or otherwise, to:
> > A. Maintain Airco as a viable separate and independent company and to make no changes in its operations likely to hinder a future divestiture of Airco, including a merger, consolidation or acquisition of any equity interest.
> > B. Preserve and protect all assets of Airco and refrain from disposing of or encumbering such assets, except in the ordinary course of business, and refrain from comingling them with any other assets of BOC or its subsidiaries, without prior approval of the Commission.

C. Refrain from taking any steps to implement any provision of the agreements between Airco and BOC, dated July 25, 1973 and December 10, 1973, respectively except for Paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of the December 10th agreement.

D. Refrain from making available or communicating to each other any confidential or proprietary information, including customer lists, trade secrets, formulas, know-how or manufacturing processes of each party, except this injunction shall not prohibit Airco and BOC from operating under any license agreements between them which were outstanding prior to July 1, 1973 or prohibit them from engaging in normal sales and purchase activities with each other in a volume not in excess of that which existed prior to July 1, 1973.

E. Retain separate and unencumbered all shares of Airco which BOC may own, acquire or control.

F. Refrain from attempting to influence or interfere with Airco's independent judgment on any matter so as adversely to effect the competitive position of Airco vis-a-vis BOC or any of its subsidiaries.

G. Refrain from transferring any shares of stock or other securities of Airco from BOC Financial to BOC or any other entity or person unless such transferee shall subject itself to the jurisdiction of this Court.

II. It Is Further Ordered That this preliminary injunction is issued upon the following conditions: (1) the Commission shall expedite the administrative proceeding in this matter, (2) shall file a written report with the Court at least every three months from the date hereof [of] the progress of the proceedings and the cause, if any, of any delays with a copy served on respondents, and (3) the Commission shall give a definitive answer at least within fifteen days after it receives a request for approval under any of the terms of this order.

III. It Is Further Ordered That this injunction is granted pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 53(b) without the necessity of the Commission furnishing bond.

IV. It Is Further Ordered That the temporary restraining order heretofore entered in this action is hereby dissolved.

V. It Is Further Ordered That jurisdiction is hereby retained for the purpose of enabling any party to this proceeding to apply to this Court at any time for such further orders and directions as may be necessary and appropriate for the construction or carrying out of this order, for the modification of any provision thereof, and for the enforcement of compliance of any term or condition thereof and the punishment of any violations thereof.

F.T.C. v. CONTINENTAL OIL CO.*

Civ. A. No. 1094–73. F.T.C. File No. 99–157.

(United States District Court for the District of Columbia, March 11, 1974)

On petition for enforcement of subpoena duces tecum issued pursuant to an investigation into natural gas reporting procedures, court held that the information demanded, bid calculation files, was not relevant to the investigation and ordered the petition for enforcement denied.

Before HART, District Judge.

ORDER

Be It Remembered that on the 13th day of December, 1973, the Federal Trade Commission's petition for enforcement in the above cause came on for hearing and the Court having considered the Federal Trade Commission's petition, the pleadings and briefs of the parties on file in the above cause and the arguments of counsel in open court, and the Court being of the opinion that Continental's bid calculation files are not relevant to the investigation or inquiry being carried on by petitioner, it is hereby ORDERED that the Federal Trade Commission's petition is hereby denied; provided that the Federal Trade Commission may, at a later date and upon good cause shown, apply to the Court for an order requiring production of individual bid calculation files in any case where the Commission can show that Continental has been awarded a bid on an offshore lease and has delayed for an unreasonable time in conducting drilling operations on such lease. Subject to being reopened as set forth above this cause is dismissed.

No 73-1233. F.T.C. Docket No. 8869.

(United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, March 18, 1974)

1. WHILE PROOF OF ACTUAL INJURY IS UNNECESSARY TO SUPPORT F.T.C. CEASE AND DESIST ORDER, PROTECTION OF PUBLIC IS ESSENTIAL TO JUSTIFY FILING OF COMPLAINT

Protection of public is essential to justify filing of complaint under Federal Trade Commission Act, but proof of actual injury is unnecessary to support a Commission cease and desist order.

2. INDIVIDUALS IN SOCIETY HAVE THE RIGHT TO BE TOLD THE TRUTH SO THAT CHOICES CAN BE UNDERSTANDINGLY MADE AMONG PRODUCTS OR OFFERS

[60] A catalog retailer's promise of unconditional "free trial" or "percent off" when both were conditional, was not in the public interest since individuals in society have a right to be told the truth, so that their choices among products, or among offers, can be understandingly made.

3. F.T.C. COMPLAINT JUSTIFIED WHERE ALLEGED DECEPTIVE AND UNFAIR ADVERTISING PRACTICES RESULTED IN SUBSTANTIALLY HIGH NET SALES FOR RESPONDENT

Where catalog retailer in its sales effort advertised for credit customers in circulars to "established" and "new" customers, and seasonal catalogs to "new" customers, and retailer's net sales by "hot merchandise" catalogs were estimated at $27,000,000 in 1969 and 1970 and $30,000,000 in 1971, the Federal Trade Commission's complaint alleging that advertising practices were deceptive and unfair was justified and Commission did not waste its time with trivia in considering alleged deceptive and unfair practices.

4. F.T.C. FINDING OF A "CAPACITY AND TENDENCY" TO MISLEAD THE PUBLIC WAS SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE

Evidence including showing that conditions of catalog retailer in its advertisements to customers were not stated or located in such a way that customers, without undue difficulty, would understand that the "free trial" and "percent off" offers were not truly free but conditioned on customer's meeting retailer's credit criteria supported the Federal Trade Commission's finding of a "capacity and tendency" to mislead the public.

5. VARIANCE BETWEEN F.T.C. ALLEGATION OF FAILURE TO DISCLOSE AND FINDING OF DISCLOSURE BEING "FAR REMOVED" FROM ALLURE OF ADVERTISEMENT WAS NOT FATAL

There was no fatal variance between the Federal Trade Commission's complaintiff's allegation of failure to disclose conditions on face of advertisements and the Commission's finding that placement of the conditions was "far removed" from the allure of the advertisment.

6. F.T.C. CEASE-AND-DESIST ORDER WAS NOT "VAGUE AND AMBIGUOUS" NOR DID IT "VIOLATE THE STIPULATION" ENTERED INTO BY PARTIES AT HEARING EXAMINER'S REQUEST

A cease and desist order of the Federal Trade Commission did not "violate the stipulation" entered into by the parties at request of the hearing examiner nor was the order "vague and ambiguous," where thrust of the order was a requirement that credit conditions, relating to both prospective and established customers, be stated "clearly and conspicuously * * * in immediate conjunction with" the offer in order that prospects not be misled by positioning conditions where average person in catalog retailer's market would be likely to overlook them.

7. Need To Serve Customers or Meet Competition Are Not Justification for Deceptive and Unfair Advertisements

The Federal Trade Commission's cease and desist order issued against catalog retailer would not effectively "ban" free trial offers; unfair and deceptive advertisements cannot be justified on basis that they are needed either as a service to the consumer or to meet competition in the market.

8. Evidence Requested by Retailer in Quashed Subpoenas "Duces Tecum" Was Irrelevant to Proceedings

In proceeding against catalog retailer for deceptive trade practices and unfair competition, the succeeding examiner's quashing of subpoenas duces tecum issued against competitors did not deprive the retailer of evidence bearing on nature and extent of order to be entered, where evidence sought was of no avail since even if its competitors were more deceptive, the evidence was irrelevant since alleged facts that retailer's competitors were worse did not require that the retailer be permitted to continue the deception found by the Federal Trade Commission.

On petition for review of F.T.C. cease and desist order, court held that public protection is essential to justify filing a complaint, but truth of actual injury is unnecessary to support cease and desist order; unconditional offers which are in fact conditioned are not in the public interest; the complaint was justified; and there was no fatal variance between allegations in the complaint and the findings of the Commission.

Kiley, Senior Circuit Judge.

[61] The Federal Trade Commission ordered petitioner, Spiegel, Inc., to cease and desist from engaging in deceptive trade practices and unfair competition [1] in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(c).[2] Spiegel petitions to have the order reviewed and set aside. We deny the petition and direct enforcement of the Commission's order.

Spiegel is a catalogue retailer of, among other things, clothing, household appliances and kitchenware, with principal office and place of business in Chicago, Illinois. During the relevant period prior to November, 1971, it shipped its merchandise, when sold, from Chicago into several of the United States. In its sales efforts it advertised for credit customers in circulars to "established" and "new" customers, and seasonal catalogues to "new" customers. The Commission's complaint, issued November 8, 1971, alleged that Spiegel's advertising practices were deceptive and unfair in violation of the Act, and that the complaint was "in the public interest."

The cease and desist order followed upon Spiegel's answer denying deception, a pre-hearing stipulation of facts, a limited evidentiary hearing before a Commission hearing officer, appeals to the Commission by both parties,[3] and the Commission's adoption, with modifications, of the hearing officer's decision.

The complaint alleged that the statements contained in circulars and seasonal catalogues which offered "free trial" or "percent off" of merchandise represented directly or by implication that the offers were available "without condition of restriction;" that "in truth and in fact" the offers of shipment to the "new" customers were conditioned upon the offerees qualifying for credit under Spiegel criteria; and that no shipments were made under the offers to the "established ... credit customers" unless the amount of the purchases, added to the pre-existing credit charges of the purchaser, was less than the total credit amount Spiegel had previously allowed the customer.

The complaint charged that Spiegel's use of these alleged "false, misleading and deceptive statements" had the "capacity and tendency" to mislead the public into purchasing Spiegel's merchandise in reliance upon the truth of the statements "all to the prejudice and injury of the public and of [Spiegel's] competitors," and constituted unfair and deceptive practices and unfair competition in violation of the Act.

Spiegel's answer denied that the complaint was in the public interest, stated that the advertising followed the custom and usage of the trade, stated the alleged unlawful practices had been abandoned, and denied deception and injury to customers or competition.

[1] Sec. 5(a)(6): "The Commission is empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations . . . from using unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce." [15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(6).]

[2] Sec. 5(a)(1): "Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful." [15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1).]

[3] The Commission is both prosecutor and judge under § 5(45) of the Act, FTC v. Klesner, 280 U.S. 19, 27, 50 S. Ct. 1, 74 L. Ed. 138 (1929).

The Commission's Final Order [4] directed Spiegel to desist from its "free [62] trial" or "percent off" advertising practices as to prospective and established customers, unless it "conspicuously disclose[d] in immediate conjunction" with the offers that they are subject to Spiegel's credit approval; disclosed at the top of questionnaires requesting information about credit that the questionnaire is an application for credit; and disclosed any condition or restriction rendering an offeree ineligible to qualify for the offer. Finally, the order directed Spiegel to desist from representing directly or by implication that a free trial offer or price reduction is without condition when such condition exists.

I.

There is no merit in Spiegel's contention that the order should be set aside as too trivial for Commission attention because there was no proof of injury to the public or to Spiegel's competitiors.

[1] Protection of the public is essential to justify filing a Section 5 complaint. FTC v. Klesner, 280 U.S. 19, 27, 50 S. Ct. 1, 74 L. Ed. 138 (1929). However, proof of actual injury is unnecessary to support a Commission cease and desist order.

Significant in the examiner's decision, adopted by the Commission, are the statements that "an advertisement must be truthful . . . . To comply with the Federal Trade Commission Act, an advertisement must be akin to a passport for the complete truthfulness of the statements contained therein;" and that where, as here, the offers are conditioned, "unsophisticated clues to the conditions should be as obvious on the face of the advertisement as the inducing offers themselves."

The moral tone of those statements is implicit in Justice Cardozo's language in FTC v. Algoma Co., 291 U.S. 67, 78–79, 54 S. Ct. 315, 320, 78 L. Ed. 655 (1934):

> Fair competition is not attained by balancing a gain in money against a misrepresentation of the thing supplied. The courts must set their faces against a conception of business standards so corrupting in its tendency. The consumer is prejudiced if upon giving an order for one thing, he is supplied with something else. Federal Trade Comm'n v. Royal Milling Co., 288 U.S. 212, 216, [53 S. Ct. 335, 77 L. Ed. 706]; Carlsbad v. W. T. Thackeray & Co., 7 Cir., 57 F. 18. In such matters, the public is entitled to get what it chooses, though the choice may be dictated by caprice or by fashion or perhaps by ignorance. Nor is the prejudice only to the consumer . . . . "A method inherently unfair does not cease to be so because those competed against have become aware of the wrongful practice." Federal Trade Comm'n v. Winsted Hosiery Co., 258 U.S. 483, 494, [42 S. Ct. 384, 385, 66 L. Ed. 729]. The careless and the unscrupulous must rise to the > standards of the scrupulous and diligent. The Commission was not organized to drag the standards down.

The primacy of truthfulness in advertising was made explicit in FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive, 380 U.S. 374, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965), wherein the Supreme Court held that it was a deceptive practice to convey to television viewers the impression that they were watching an actual experiment when they were viewing only a simulation, notwithstanding the fact that the experiment had been conducted off-camera and the product had performed as represented. The Court stated, at 388–389, 85 S. Ct. at 1044:

> We find an especially strong similarity between the present case and those cases in which a seller induces the public to purchase an arguably good product by misrepresenting his line of business, by concealing the fact that the product is reprocessed, or by misappropriating another's trademark. In each the seller has used a misrepresentation to break down what he regards to be an annoying or irrational habit of the buying public—the preference for particular manufacturers or known brands regardless of a prod[63]uct's actual qualities, the prejudice against reprocessed goods, and the desire for verification of a product claim. In each case the seller reasons that when the habit is broken the buyer will be satisfied with the performance of the product he receives. Yet, a misrepresentation has been used to break the habit and, as was stated in Algoma Lumber, a misrepresentation for such an end is not permitted.

The Ninth Circuit, citing Colgate-Palmolive, has held that "[d]eception itself is the evil the statute is designed to prevent." Floersheim v. FTC, 9 Cir., 411 F. 2d 874 (1969).[5] That holding is faithful to the Supreme Court decisions.

[2] The promise of an unconditional "free trial" or "percent off," when both are conditional, is not in the public interest. A good society depends upon promises being kept. And individuals in society have a right to be told the truth, so that their choices among products, or, as in this case, among offers, can be understandingly made. If sellers in our society are free to compete for consumers' patronage with others by unfair advertising, not only is the consumers' right violated, but our commitment to fair competition becomes a pretense. The courts "must set their faces" against those practices which are harmful to the public interest.

The record here contains ample proof of the need tq protect the public interest. Spiegel's catalogues were distributed in interstate commerce and its advertisements inserted in numerous metropolitan newspapers. Between 1969 and July 1970, approximately three million circulars offering price discounts were distributed. Spiegal distributed two million "free trial" offers annually. Net sales by "hot merchandise" catalogues were estimated at $27,000,000 in 1969 and 1970, and $30,000,000 in 1971.

[3] We hold that the complaint was justified and that the Commission did not waste its time with trivia in considering the alleged deceptive and unfair practices.

II.

[4] Spiegel argues that the Commission's order is not supported by the evidence. We need not discuss the circular and catalogue statements at length in disposing of the argument. Suffice to say that the statements are clearly designed to attract credit customers to Spiegel's offers. For example, a multi-paged circular is sent with a typewritten invitation to the "Dear Customer" to try the nineteen "outstanding values . . . at our risk." "[Y]ou can order any or all of these values on 30-DAY FREE TRIAL . . . . All we require is that your order be for $10 or more . . . . We'll rush your merchandise to you." "[R]emember, you're not buying . . . merely trying." In the margin of the first page in large type is the following: "SEND NO MONEY. TRY ANY OF THESE VALUES 30 DAYS FREE." There is no statement in the circular itself on any condition or restriction, other than the $10 minimum. In another free trial offer there are small print statements of credit qualifications, such as "subject to [Spiegel's] acceptance."

The Commission did not find that Spiegel stated the offers were unconditional. It found that the conditions were not stated or located in such a way that customers, without undue difficulty, would understand that the "free trial" and "percent off" offers were not truly free but were conditioned on the customer meeting Spiegel's credit criteria. As Spiegel states it, the alleged deceptive factor was in the placement and print size of the conditions, not the lack of statement of conditions.

We have examined the circulars and catalogues in the record containing similar statements, and we hold that the evidence gives substantial support to the Commission's finding of a "capacity and tendency" to mislead the public. The [64] testimony of Spiegel's vice-president that its advertisements lack "even the capacity to injure" does not compel a finding different from the Commission's.

III.

[5] There is no merit in Spiegel's contention that there is a fatal variance between the complaint's allegation of failure to disclose conditions on the face of the advertisements and the Commission's finding that placement of the conditions was "far removed" from the allure of the advertisement. We find no variance. And this court's Wrisley Co. v. FTC, 7 Cir., 113 F. 2d 437, 442 (1940), does not support Spiegel.

IV.

[6] Spiegal has not persuaded us that three of the four paragraphs in the order "violate the stipulation" entered into by the parties at the request of the hearing examiner, and consequently bear the "badge of unfairness." [6] Nor is the order, in our opinion, "vague and ambiguous."

The thrust of the four paragraphs in the Commission's order is a requirement that the credit conditions, relating to both prospective and established customers, be stated "clearly and conspicuously . . . in immediate conjunction with" the offer in order that the prospects not be misled by positioning conditions where the average person in Spiegel's market would be likely to overlook them. The order is reasonably related to the violations found.

V.

[7] We do not share Spiegel's concern that the Commission's order will effectively "ban" free trial offers. We refer to the apt statement of the Supreme Court in Colgate-Palmolive, supra, 380 U.S. at 390, 85 S. Ct. at 1045: "We think it inconceivable that the ingenious advertising world will be unable, if it so desires, to conform to the Commission's insistence that the public be not misinformed." In any event, unfair and deceptive advertisements cannot be justified on the basis that they are needed either as a service to the consumer or meet competition in the market.

VI.

[8] The original hearing examiner, at Spiegel's request, issued twelve subpoenas duces tecum against competitors of Spiegel. The succeeding examiner sua sponte quashed the suboenas. Spiegel argues that the ruling deprives it of evidence bearing on the nature and extent of the order to be entered; and that the evidence sought would have shown Spiegel's conduct to have been exemplary viz-à-viz its competitors, since it alone of its competitors in the market stated credit conditions. It further claims the evidence was relevant to show it could believe its offers reasonable in light of its competitors' advertisements.

We hold that the ruling was not erroneous. The evidence sought was of no avail to Spiegel. Even if its competitors were more deceptive, the evidence was irrelevant. We note again the Cardozo statement, 291 U.S. at p. 79, at 54 S. Ct. at p. 320 of Algoma, that "the Commission was not organized to drag the standards down." See also the Sixth Circuit's statement in Collier & Son Corp. v. FTC, 427 F. 2d 261, 276 (1970): "The purpose of Commission orders is not to put those employing deceptive acts or practices in pari delicto with each other." That Spiegel's competitors were worse does not require that Spiegel be permitted to continue the deception found by the Commission.

[6] The parties at the hearing stipulated that the sole issue before the examiner was whether Spiegel's advertisements of "free trial" offers or "percent off" offers are unfair or deceptive because of the manner in which customers are notified of Spiegel's requirement of credit approval in order to obtain the benefit of such offers.

PELL, Circuit Judge (dissenting).

If for no other reason, the order of the FTC should be set aside by this court because of the utter triviality of the matter involved. I therefore respectfully dissent.

The FTC conceded the correctness of the general rule that detriment to the public interest must be shown. Here, by issuing its order, the FTC has in effect found there was detriment to the public interest in the situation of deadbeats being deceived into thinking that they are going to receive a free trial of, or a discount on, merchandise which they could not realistically purchase on either a cash or a deferred basis. It is difficult to imagine a less egregious affront to the public interest.

As early as 1924, only nine years after the FTC had begun to operate, it was stated that > [t]he Commission is handling too many cases, and that it should exercise a greater discretion in selecting those cases which involve questions of public importance. It does not seem necessary that public funds should be employed to prosecute cases . . . involving trivial or merely technical offenses, in which the public interest is not always easy to discern. G. Henderson, The Federal Trade Commission 337 (3d ed. 1927).

Similarly, the Hoover Commission noted in 1949 that > in the selection of cases for its formal dockets, the Commission has long been guilty of prosecuting trivial and technical offenses and of failing to confine these docket to cases of public importance. Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., Task Force Report on Regulatory Commissions, app. N, 128 (Comm. Print 1949).

Most recently, The President's Advisory Council on Executive Organization, in its report entitled "A New Regulatory Framework" (January 1971), stated:

> Much of the criticism of the FTC is aimed at its disproportionate attention to comparatively trivial matters—resulting largely from the breadth of its mandate and compounded by inherent deficiencies of the collegial form of organization. Preoccupation with minutiae over the years has created a "jack of all trades—master of none" profile for the FTC. Id. at 87.

In S. Buchsbaum & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 160 F. 2d 121 (7th Cir. 1947), this court, in holding that the findings and conclusion of the Commission that the petitioner had been guilty of deceptive acts was not supported by substantial evidence, made the following pertinent comment, at 123–124:

> [E]ven though there be no proof of actual deception required, there must be a showing that the acts and practices sought to be proscribed are detrimental to the public interest in order to satisfy the statutory requirement that the proceeding be in the public interest. 15 U.S.C.A. § 45(b). Here the Commission made no finding that the deception, if any, had ever resulted in or had any tendency to result in detriment to the purchasing public. We find nothing in the findings to support the conclusion that the acts and practices are "all to the prejudice and injury of the public." (Emphasis added.)

Putting the most blatant possible interpretation on the advertising material of Spiegel, and assuming, arguendo, that the most astute and sophisticated reader would be unable to find any clue in the material that would impose any qualification or condition on the enjoyment of [66] a free trial or a discount, whether that reader be an adult or a child, financially responsible or irresponsible, honest or dishonest, I cannot conceive that the public would be misled into thinking that these merchandising gimmicks were intended for any persons except a member of the prospective and potential purchasing public under circumstances in which Spiegel expected eventually either to receive the purchase price or the return of the merchandise. The inference that Spiegel intended to deal with financially irresponsible persons is scarcely supportable from the bare fact of a free trial offer or a discount possibility.

This is not a case where we are dealing with hidden charges which would vitiate the supposed discount, nor one where the applicant was supposedly getting a free trial but was actually required to keep the goods once they reached his possession. In fact, the parties stipulated that credit approval was the only restriction or condition qualifying these offers.

However, it is not necessary to decide the case on the above hypotheses. The basic evidence does not seem to be in dispute here, and that evidence in my opinion is totally lacking in substantiality to support a finding of deceptive advertising detrimental to the public. It is true that the statements that "All orders are subject to Spiegel Credit Approval" appeared on the catalogue rather than in equal size type with the reference to discounts and free trials. However, I know of no prohibition of the use of an eyecatcher as long as the rest of the advertising material puts the eyecatcher in proper perspective.

Under any interpretation of the advertising material, it is clear that one cannot partake either of the free trial period or the discount without filling out and signing the order form. It is necessary for the prospective free trial user or discount applicant, if a new customer, to give detailed information about marital status, income, financial obligations, nature of employment, and similar factual data for credit evaluation. In varying language, the order form makes it clear that all orders are subject to acceptance by Spiegel. As to established credit customers, I cannot conceive that they were not already aware of the fact that a favorable credit rating is required and that if they are delinquent they will not be the beneficiary of further unpaid-for utilization of Spiegel merchandise.

In his conclusion, the trial examiner stated that the practices had the capacity to mislead members of the purchasing public into the purchase of substantial quantities of Spiegel products. I wholly fail to comprehend this, as the only ones who received the products were those who passed muster on credit. It is not an uncommon trait for people to overextend themselves in credit purchasing, but there is nothing about this advertising to cause this natural human tendency to exceed its present liberal boundaries. Protection against our human frailties may be arguably a worthwhile object of civilization, but in this country, absent deception or misleading representations, we are still free to determine such matters for ourselves.

The trial examiner emphasized that advertising must be truthful, but again I fail to find that, reasonably construed, the advertising in question is otherwise. Also, the trial examiner specifically stated in reaching his conclusion that the advertising was deceptive and unfair that he did not do so on a basis of demonstrated injury to purchasers.

The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission viewed this case, and its inconsequentiality, as I do, and I adopt and agree with his statement in dissent as being the proper dispositive basis of the case:

> I cannot agree that consumers would fail to appreciate that Spiegel's free-trial offers necessarily were subject to acceptance by Spiegel. The nature and amount of information obtained by Spiegel on its application forms, in my opinion, puts the consumer on notice that Spiegel has established criteria which prospective customers must meet prior to receiving the merchandise on a free-trial basis. It seems to me unlikely that a consumer would conclude that the information provided on the application form was irrelevant to Spiegel in deciding whether or not to provide the consumer with the offered merchandise.
> Of course, it is arguable that some few prospective customers who sent in filled-in application forms may not have fully understood the conditional nature of the offer. Also, I appreciate that economic injury is not always a condition precedent to an order under Section 5. However, in the circumstances of this case where no economic loss of any consequence appears and where no testimony was received with respect to consumers' understanding of the import of the application forms or whether Spiegel's disclosures were in fact sufficient, the entry of an order is not warranted.

Finally, and in any event, the order entered by the Commission is far too broad and is unjustified by this particular velitation.[1]

For the reasons set out in this dissent, I would set aside the order of the Commission.

DIENER'S, INC., ET AL., v. F.T.C.*

No. 73-1184. F.T.C. Docket No. 8804.

1. TESTIMONY OF F.T.C. INVESTIGATOR WAS NOT RELIED UPON BY COMMISSION IN SUCH A MANNER AS TO IMPROPERLY FUSE ROLES OF JUDGE AND PROSECUTION

Federal Trade Commission did not improperly fuse roles of judge and prosecution in the manner and degree to which it relied on testimony of an FTC investigator in determining existence of asserted advertising violations, where investigator's testimony did not drift into a representation by him of ultimate validity of charges and where Commission was careful to assess such evidence in proper light.

2. BASING CEASE AND DESIST ORDER ON PAST PRACTICES NOT CONTINUED INTO PRESENT DID NOT LEAVE F.T.C. POWERLESS TO ISSUE SUCH ORDER

Federal Trade Commission was not powerless to issue a cease and desist order on the basis of past advertising practices that had not been shown to have continued to the present.

3. COURT OF APPEALS EXERCISED ITS POWER OF APPELLATE MODIFICATION IN ORDER TO CLARIFY F.T.C. CEASE AND DESIST ORDER CAST IN INAPPROPRIATE TERMS

Where Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order with respect to advertising practices was cast in inappropriate terms so that petitioners may have been justifiably uncertain as to what they could and could not do, thus subjecting petitioners to a competitive handicap, Court of Appeals would exercise its power of appellate modification and recast order in more specific terms to correspond with interpretations of current order that Commission had offered the court.

[1] I do not dissent from that portion of the majority opinion dealing with Spiegel's inability to demonstrate that other mail order houses engage in the same type of inducement advertising but with less candor than Spiegel does. If a law violation exists, securing compliance with the law often follows selective prosecution of one among many violators. There is no indication here of other than a normal process of selectivity.

This phase of the case was again brought to my attention after the completion of the dissent by the receipt by my wife of a mailed offer from a nationally known merchandiser. On the envelope was the word in one inch letters, "FREE!" Inside, also in large letters, was reference to a free 14 day home trial of kitchen equipment. At the bottom of the backside of the "Free Trial Certificate," and nowhere else in the several sheets extolling the merchandise and referring to the privilege of free trial, small type stated, "All orders subject to credit acceptance or request for prepayment by our National Sales Office."

I read the challenged order in this case as relating only to the consuming public and not as being based upon injury to competitors, although that was also charged in the complaint. If this latter aspect had been involved, it would appear that the Subpoenas Duces Tecum should not have been quashed.

*Reported in 494 F. 2d 1132 (1974). For case before the Commission, see 81 F.T.C. 945, modified 84 F.T.C. 1306.

On petition for review of F.T.C. cease and desist order, court held that F.T.C. did not improperly fuse the roles of judge and prosecution; had power to issue cease and desist order on basis of past advertising practices; and the court would recast the order in more specific terms where it was cast in inappropriate terms.

Commission's order, as modified, affirmed and enforcement granted.

Jacob A. Stein, Washington, D.C., for petitioners.

Robert E. Duncan, Atty., F.T.C. with whom Harold D. Rhynedance, Jr., Asst. Gen. Counsel, Washington, D.C., was on the brief, for respondent.

Before MCGOWAN and MACKINNON, Circuit Judges, and CHRISTENSEN,* United States Senior District Judge for the District of Utah.

PER CURIAM:

[1133] This is a petition to review a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order directed against certain advertising practices found by the Commission to violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, and Sections 4 (a) and (c) of the Textile Fiber Products Identification Act, 15 U.S.C. § 70b (a) and (c). We have examined petitioners' contentions carefully and find that they establish no basis for setting aside the Commission's order. We are persuaded, however, that one part of the remedial order is cast in inappropriately absolute terms, and we have accordingly modified that portion to correspond to the purpose and effect that the Commission has represented to us, both in its brief and at oral argument, it intended. We affirm the Commission's order, as modified by this court, and grant enforcement.

[1] Petitioners first assert that the Commission improperly fused the roles of judge and prosecutor in the manner and degree to which it relied on the testimony of an FTC investigator in determining the existence of the asserted violations. We disagree. Although a point does exist at which a blending of prosecutorial and adjudicative functions will deprive a party of a fair administrative hearing, see e.g., Amos Treat & Co. v. SEC, 113 U.S. App. D.C. 100, 306 F. 2d 260 (1962), it does not appear to us that that point has been reached in this case. The investigator's testimony did not drift into a representation by him of the ultimate validity of the charges. Moreover, the Commission expressed an awareness of the potential problems of accepting its investigator's testimony, and was careful to assess this evidence in the proper light. Having examined the record and the opinions of the Administrative Law Judge and the Commission, we find no indication that petitioners were denied a fair administrative adjudication. Cf. Kennecott Copper Corp. v. FTC, 467 F. 2d 67, 79 (10th Cir.), cert.

[2] Petitioners also claim that the Commission failed to articulate a basis for holding that entry of its order is in the public interest. To the extent that this claim rests on an assertion that the Commission order is not based on substantial evidence of record, it is without merit. Equally unpersuasive is petitioners' claim that the proven violations occurred too far in the past to justify an order aimed at present and future practices. Clearly the Commission is not powerless to issue a cease and desist order on the basis of past practices that have not been shown to have continued to the present. See Giant Food, Inc. v. FTC, 116 U.S. App. D.C. 227, 322 F. 2d 977, 986 (1963), cert. dismissed, 376 U.S. 967, 84 S. Ct. 1121, 12 L. Ed. 2d 82 (1964), and cases cited therein. And even assuming the existence of a point at which past practices must be considered too dated to support an FTC cease and desist order, we do not find the time span between the occurrence of the proven violations and the issuance of this order to present any significant problem.

[3] One assertion of error by petitioners does have merit. Petitioners assert that the Commission order subjects them to a competitive handicap. Pointing out that the Commission order against their competitor, Giant Food, Inc., allows Giant to make savings claims in relation to either the difference between Giant's previous and present prices or in relation to differences between Giant's prices and those of its competitors,[1] petitioners insist [1134] that the Commission has prevented them from making the full range of savings claims that Giant's order permits. In response, the Commission asserts that a reading of the order in its entirety reveals that it does not preclude claims of savings over competitors' prices, so long as such representations satisfy the basic requirements of paragraph four and five governing "trade area savings" claims. The Commission further maintains that petitioners did not voice any similar objection in the proceedings before it, and that the matter is not deserving of judicial attention since, in any event, petitioners can seek clarification by raising the matter with the Commission when they file their compliance reports.

[1] The relevant portion of the order against Giant Food, Inc. prevents Giant from:

> Representing in any manner that by purchasing any of its merchandise, customers are afforded savings amounting to the difference between respondent's stated price and any other price used for comparison with that price, unless a substantial number of the principal retail outlets in the trade area regularly offer the merchandise for sale at the compared price or some higher price or unless respondent has offered such merchandise for sale at the compared price in good faith for a reasonably substantial period of time in the regular recent course of business.

In re Giant Food, Inc., Order Making Final Modifications of Order to Cease and Desist, 66 F.T.C. 476, 478–79 (1964).

We do not feel that approval of the order in its present form is a prudential resolution of this issue. Examination of the entire order does suggest that perhaps petitioners may be unduly sensitive to the language of certain parts. Nonetheless, portions of the order do speak in sweeping terms and may leave petitioners justifiably uncertain as to what they can, and what they cannot, do. We think that an ordering provision should be as free of ambiguity as possible. Thus we feel it appropriate to exercise our power of appellate modification, 15 U.S.C. § 45(d), to recast the order in more specific terms corresponding with the interpretations of the present order that the Commission has offered to this court. While recognizing that our modification may in some respects compound the already existing redundancy of some of its provisions, a redundant cease and desist order is, surely, preferable to an ambiguous one.

Petitioners have offered four modifications of the order which, they assert, are required to correct its deficiencies. We have examined petitioners' proposed modifications in light of the nature of their objections, as well as the evidence of record concerning the nature and scope of their violations, and have concluded that our modification of paragraph two of the order will adequately resolve the existing ambiguities. Accordingly, we modify paragraph two to read:

> Using the words "Save" or "Savings" or any other word or words of similar import or meaning in conjunction with a stated dollar or percentage amount of savings between respondents' stated price and any other price used for comparison with that price, unless the stated dollar or percentage amount of savings actually represents the difference between the offering price and the actual price at which a substantial number of principal retail outlets in the trade area regularly sell or offer the merchandise for sale or between the offering price and the actual bona fide price at which such merchandise had been sold or offered for sale on a regular basis to the public by the respondents for a reasonably substantial period of time in the recent, regular course of their business. [Modifications in emphasis.]

We reject petitioners' other proposed modifications. Petitioners' suggested alteration of paragraph 5(a) is unnecesary, particularly in light of our modification of the second paragraph. Paragraph 5(a) is, by its terms, limited to savings claims between "respondents' stated price and respondents' former price," and, as such, is both readily understandable and warranted by the evidence of record. Petitioners' suggested modifications to the first and third paragraphs are both unnecessary and unsound.

[1135] In all other respects, the order of the Commission is affirmed and its enforcement, as modified by this court, is granted.

It is so ordered.

On petition for enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued in the course of an investigation into natural gas reporting procedures, court held that the subpoenas were improper in that they sought data for purposes of enabling the Commission to attempt to determine natural gas reserves or the validity or accuracy of natural gas reserve estimates, and the court being of the opinion that the subpoenas are improper in other respects and should not be enforced as issued, the F.T.C. petition for enforcement is granted in part and denied in part.

Before HART, Chief Judge.

ORDER

The Federal Trade Commission ("Trade Commission") having petitioned on June 13, 1973, for enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued by an Assistant Director of the Trade Commission's Bureau of Competition to each of the above captioned respondents on November 24, 1971, in the course of a Trade Commission investigation into natural gas reserve reporting procedures (FTC Investigation File No. 711 0042); and the respondents having opposed enforcement of said subpoenas, contending that the principles of primary jurisdiction and collateral estoppel preclude the Trade Commission from seeking the demanded documents or data for purposes of determining the validity or accuracy of natural gas reserve estimates, and contending further, inter alia, that certain demands of the subpoenas are irrelevant to any proper subject or area of investigation and are unduly broad and burdensome; and the parties having fully briefed and presented oral argument on the issues; and the Court upon consideration of all the premises, being of the opinion that the Trade Commission is authorized to pursue the investigation to determine whether there exists any evidence of conspiracy in the reporting of proved natural gas reserve estimates to the American Gas Association by respondents, but that the subpoenas duces tecum are improper insofar as they seek data for the purposes of enabling the Trade Commission to attempt to determine natural gas reserves or the validity or accuracy of natural gas reserve estimates, matters already considered and ruled upon by the Federal Power Commission, and the Court being of the further opinion that the subpoenas are improper in other respects as well and should not be enforced as issued:

---

* Not otherwise reported.

It is now therefore ordered:

1. Enforcement of specifications A, B, C, D, E, and F of the subpoenas duces tecum is hereby granted. Enforcement of specifications G, H, I, J, K, and L is hereby denied except as provided below.

2. Respondents shall produce documents as called for by specifications G, H, and I of the subpoenas duces tecum for the years 1969, 1970 and 1971, subject to the following modifications and limitations:

(a) Production shall be limited to documents containing or underlying proved natural gas reserve estimates. Raw field data, bid calculation data, and bid calculation files are not required to be produced. As regards underlying back-up data for each estimate called for by specification G, only the immediate data used to make the estimate need be submitted. For estimates arrived at volumetrically, specification I(1) will be satisfied by supplying all the underlying numbers which were used in the formula including the recovery factor and the size of the reservoir(s). As for the estimates arrived at by pressure decline curves, specification I(1) will be satisfied by submitting the curve used.

(b) Production of documents shall be made with respect only to a random sample of 100 of those offshore Southern Louisiana fields which were included in reports for 1971 by the Southern Louisiana Subcommittee of the American Gas Association Committee of Natural Gas Reserves. This random sample shall be selected by a procedure agreed upon between Trade Commission and respondents.

(c) Each respondent shall make production with respect to the fields, selected in the manner described in paragraph 2(b), in which it had an ownership interest as of the date reports were submitted by the Southern Louisiana Subcommittee of the American Gas Association Committee of Natural Gas Reserves.

(d) All production ordered pursuant to this paragraph 2 shall be made for the sole purpose of permitting the Trade Commission to investigate whether there is a conspiracy in the reporting of natural gas proved reserve estimates, and not for the purpose of permitting the Trade Commission to investigate or determine the amount of proved natural gas reserves.

3. Respondents shall produce documents as called for by specifications J and K of the subpoenas duces tecum, subject to the following modifications and limitations:

(a) Production shall be limited to documents relating to proved natural gas reserve estimates in those offshore Southern Louisiana fields which were included in reports for 1971 by the Southern Louisiana Subcommittee of the American Gas Association Committee of Natural Gas Reserves.

(b) Production shall be limited to documents prepared or dated during the years 1966 through 1971, inclusive, which were exchanged between or among, or constitute, contain or refer to any agreement, arrangement or communication between or among, respondent or others, including the American Gas Association.

4. Respondents shall produce documents as called for by specification L, except production shall be limited to the employees who have acted with respect to proved natural gas reserve estimates for offshore Southern Louisiana during the years 1966 through 1971, inclusive.

5. In complying with this Order, the definition of terms contained in the original subpoenas duces tecum shall apply.

6. Respondents shall comply with this Order within 180 days after the date upon which they are advised of the sample fields selected in accordance with paragraph 2(b) hereof.

7. Each respondent shall have the option of producing documents called for by this Order at the corporate office or field location where the responsive documents are normally maintained or at the Federal Trade Commission's offices in Washington, D.C. With respect to documents as to which any respondent elects to make production at a corporate office or field location, the Trade Commission shall inspect and reproduce any of said documents at such office or field location, or at such other location as agreed upon by the respective parties, and shall bear any costs of reproduction or copying which the Trade Commission may require or desire.

8. Any document produced under this Order which contains confidential information may be designated as being confidential by the respective respondents, in which event all documents so designated shall be subject to the following protective treatment:

(a) Documents designated as confidential by a respondent shall be deposited with and be maintained by a custodian who shall be the Secretary to the Commission. Unless and until otherwise ordered by the Court upon due notice to all affected parties documents so designated may be inspected only at the depository location and only by employees of the Trade Commission officially assigned to the Trade Commission's investigation entitled "File No. 711 0042." Said documents shall be used only in connection with said investigation, and said employees shall not suffer or permit disclosure or copying of any such document, or any portion thereof, or any information contained therein to any other person.

(b) Unless and until otherwise ordered by the Court upon due notice to all affected parties, documents designated confidential under this Order shall remain in custody of the Custodian and neither the documents nor any copies thereof shall be removed from such custody.

(c) At the conclusion of the Trade Commission's investigation pursuant to which such confidential documents have been produced, all documents so designated as confidential, together with all copies thereof, shall be returned to the respective respondent unless the Trade Commission seeks and obtains an order of the Court providing otherwise.

(d) The protective provisions of this Order shall be deemed to apply to the Trade Commission, to the individual Commissioners of the Trade Commission and to all persons in the employ of the Trade Commission; sanctions for violation of any provision of this Order may be imposed on the Trade Commission, or any person who violates any provision of this Order.

9. The Court reserves its ruling as to any and all matters, contentions or issues not specifically disposed of by this Order. Jurisdiction over these proceedings is retained for the purposes of providing other and further relief as necessary.

So ordered this 22nd day of March, 1974.

ORDER

Upon consideration of the Federal Trade Commission's petition for enforcement of a subpoena duces tecum, the matter having been fully briefed and argued before the Court, and the Court having advised in the premises, it is this 22nd day of March, 1974,

ORDERED, That the respondent, The Superior Oil Co., Inc., shall comply, within 180 days from the date on which this Order becomes final, with Specifications A through F and K through L of the subpoena, provided that Specifications A, B, D, E and F may be complied with by submitting a verified written statement by an officer of the Company containing the requested information in lieu of the documents specified, and it is

FURTHER ORDERED, That as to the respondent, The Superior Oil Co., Inc., Specifications G through J of the subpoena be, and the same hereby are, denied enforcement and quashed; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED, That any document produced under this Order which contains confidential information may be designated as being confidential by the respondent, in which event all documents so designated shall be subject to the following protective treatment:

(a) Documents designated as confidential by a respondent shall be deposited with and be maintained by a custodian who shall be the Secretary to the Commission. Unless and until otherwise ordered by the Court upon due notice to all affected parties documents so designated may be inspected only at the depository location and only by employees of the Trade Commission officially assigned to the Trade Commission's investigation entitled "File No. 711 0042." Said documents shall be used only in connection with said investigation, and said employees shall not suffer or permit disclosure or copying of any such document, or any portion thereof, or any information contained therein to any other person.

(b) Unless and until otherwise ordered by the Court upon due notice to all affected parties, documents designated confidential under this Order shall remain in custody of the Custodian and neither the documents nor any copies thereof shall be removed from such custody.

(c) At the conclusion of the Trade Commission's investigation pursuant to which such confidential documents have been produced, all documents so designated as confidential, together with all copies thereof, shall be returned to the respondent unless the Trade Commission seeks and obtains an order of the Court providing otherwise.

(d) The protective provisions of this Order shall be deemed to apply to the Trade Commission, to the individual Commissioners of the Trade Commission and to all persons in the employ of the Trade Commission; sanctions for violation of any provision of this Order may be imposed on the Trade Commission, or any person who violates any provision of this Order.

The Court reserves its ruling as to any and all matters, contentions or issues not specifically disposed of by this Order. Jurisdiction over these proceedings is retained for the purposes of providing other and further relief as necessary.

So ordered this 22nd day of March, 1974.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Airco, Inc., one of the respondents in this proceeding, has moved for limited reargument of this Court's order of March 8, 1974, and modified March 11, 1974, issuing a preliminary injunction. Specifically, Airco desires to modify Paragraphs B and C of the injunction.

Paragraph B directs the respondents to:

> B. Preserve and protect all assets of Airco and refrain from disposing of or encumbering such assets, except in the ordinary course of business, and refrain from commingling them with any other assets of BOC or its subsidiaries, without prior approval of the Commission.

Airco argues that since less than 26% or Airco's assets are employed in lines of commerce involved in the Commission's complaint, Par. B of the preliminary injunction, perhaps inadvertently, has unduly restricted Airco's freedom to deal with the 64% of its assets which are totally unrelated to the case. This argument was fully advanced at the time the injunction issued, and the Court was aware of the temporary restriction placed upon Airco by this provision. To alleviate the restriction, the Court granted the relief requested on the condition that the Commission act promptly (within 15 days) upon any request of any approval to dispose of or encumber Airco's assets. The Court concluded that the temporary restriction was reasonable, under 15 U.S.C. § 53(b), to assure effective remedial relief of the Commission's allegations were ultimately sustained.

Secondly, Airco contends that Paragraph C of the injunction nullifies the prohibition contained in the final paragraph of the July 25, 1973 agreement between BOC and Airco which provides that BOC shall not acquire additional Airco shares for a period of 5 years without Airco's approval. Airco thus suggests that this paragraph of the agreement should be specifically excepted in Paragraph C. This is unnecessary for Airco's protection of its contractual undertaking because Paragraph A directs BOC "to make no changes in its [Airco's] operations likely to hinder a future divestiture of Airco, including . . . acquisition of any equity interest." This restriction on acquiring additional Airco shares by BOC so long as the injunction is outstanding performs the same function as Airco's contractual right under the July 25th agreement.

Order

For the foregoing reasons, the motion of Airco, Inc. for limited reargument is hereby denied.

F.T.C. v. FREDERICK CHUSID*

Civ. A. No. 74 C 53. F.T.C. File No. 99–1968.

(United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, March 28, 1974)

On petition for enforcement of subpoena duces tecum, court granted respondent's petition to dismiss the subpoena on technical grounds which do not preclude the issuance of another subpoena at a later date.

Before WILL, District Judge.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

This action has been brought by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), with the authorization of the Attorney General of the United States, for judicial enforcement of a subpoena duces tecum issued in the course of an investigation of Frederick Chusid & Company. The FTC has applied to this court, pursuant to Section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 49, for an order requiring respondent to appear and produce documentary evidence.

Respondent has moved to dismiss the petition contending he is not in default of any subpoena, and that these proceedings are therefore premature. In the alternative, he opposes the enforcement of the subpoena, arguing that it is void in a number of respects. For the reasons set forth below, respondent's motion to dismiss the petition will be granted.

The facts of this case are not in dispute and may be summarized briefly. On January 22, 1973, the FTC adopted a resolution directing an investigation into whether Frederick Chusid & Co. was engaged in unfair or deceptive practices in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Pursuant to this resolution, the Commission on February 14, 1973 issued a subpoena duces tecum to Frederick Chusid, as Chairman of the Board of Frederick Chusid & Co. The return dates specified on the subpoena were April 2, and April 3, 1973.

In accordance with § 2.7(b) of the regulations of the FTC, Chusid filed a timely motion to quash the subpoena, setting forth a number of grounds in support thereof. Such a motion requires a ruling by the Commission itself. 16 C.F.R. § 2.7(b). Neither respondent nor his attorneys received any notice of the disposition of this motion prior to the return dates of the subpoena. On April 2, respondent appeared at the designated place and time set forth in the subpoena, but refused to produce the requested documents until a ruling had been made on the motion to quash. The presiding FTC official at the investigatory hearing had no knowledge of the status of the pending motion, and attempted to proceed with the hearing. When it became clear that respondent, on advice of counsel, was not going to produce any information until the motion had been ruled upon, the presiding official excused Chusid from the witness stand. He also stated that Chusid was not excused from the subpoena but gave no indication whatsoever as to when, if ever, Chusid should reappear.

* Not otherwise reported.

Nothing further happened until Chusid's attorneys received a letter from the Secretary of the Commission dated May 25, 1973, stating that the motion to quash was being denied and giving the reasons therefor. The letter concluded by stating:

> The information specified by the subpoena shall be forwarded to the Chicago Regional Office within five days of the receipt of this letter, and arrangements shall be made to present all testimony required by the subpoena within 15 days of the receipt of this letter.

This May 25 letter was sent by first class mail, and was signed by the Secretary of the Commission, "by direction of the Commission." Apparently, the Secretary then realized that all such communications were required to be sent by either certified or registered mail, so on June 1, 1973, he sent a copy of the earlier letter, registered, return receipt requested, to the same attorneys. Chusid himself never received any notification from the Commission. Respondent has not as yet produced the documents requested in the subpoena, and the FTC filed this petition for enforcement on January 8, 1974.

Respondent's first motion is to dismiss the petition, contending that there is no extant subpoena to enforce. He argues that, since on April 2 the original subpoena was not continued to any other day by the issuing officer, it no longer had any effect after April 3. Moreover, since no new subpoena issued after the Commission's ruling on the motion to quash, he contends there is nothing for which he can be held in default. We agree.

We do not see how the original subpoena can have any continuing vitality. The Commission's own rules clearly require that all subpoenas must specify a designated time and place either to testify or to produce documentary evidence. 16 C.F.R. § 2.7(a). The only provision made for continuing a subpoena is also contained in that section, which states:

> [F]or good cause shown, [the issuing officer] may extend the time prescribed for compliance with subpoenas issued during the investigation of any matter.

The Commission's failure to rule on the preliminary motion to quash is obviously "good cause" for extension of the time prescribed for compliance. Yet no provision whatsoever was made for any specific extension. The respondent was merely told, not by the issuing officer but by the presiding officer, that he was excused from the witness stand but not from the subpoena. At the very least, the presiding officer should have stated that the witness was excused until such time as the Commission made its ruling, or set some date for respondent to reappear. But the transcript of the proceedings reveals that the presiding officer was unwilling even to recognize the existence of the motion to quash. He attempted to rule respondent's objections to proceeding on this ground as "out of order."

Furthermore, respondent himself never received a proper ruling from the Commission on his motion to quash. The Commission's rules require that all notices be sent by certified or registered mail to the person named. Here, only respondent's attorneys received copies of the Commission's order. The Commission's argument that respondent received "actual notice" as proved by his appearance on the return date, April 2, makes no sense whatsoever with regard to the ruling made nearly two months later on May 25, 1973.

Nor can the May 25 letter from the Commission be construed as a new subpoena. Its failure to designate a specific time and place for production of the subpoenaed documents is in violation of the Commission's own rules. See 16 C.F.R. § 2.7(a). And, the failure to serve Chusid himself with this document is even more fatal in this context than it was in connection with the Commissioner's ruling on the motion to quash.

Consequently, we find that the petition for enforcement must be dismissed as there is no existing subpoena of which respondent could be found in default. In light of this finding we do not reach respondent's arguments attacking the validity of the original subpoena. An appropriate order will enter.

CREDIT CARD SERVICE CORPORATION, ET AL. v. F.T.C.*

No. 73-1357. F.T.C. Docket No. 8861.

1. THE $50 LIABILITY LIMIT COVERING UNAUTHORIZED USE OF CREDIT CARDS COVERS ALL CREDIT CARDS, WHETHER USED FOR BUSINESS OR CONSUMER PURPOSES

Congress never intended that the limitation on liability, set forth in the 1970 amendment to the Truth in Lending Act, for "unauthorized use of a credit card" should be affected by the fact that certain "credit transactions" are exempted from the statute; all credit cards, whether used for business or consumer purposes, are covered by the $50 liability limit.

*Reported in 495 F. 2d 1004 (1974). For case before the Commission, see 82 F.T.C. 191.

2. AFFIRMATIVE DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENT OF F.T.C. ORDER WAS NOT OVERLY BROAD AS TO CORPORATION

Order of Federal Trade Commission, requiring that an affirmative disclosure by corporation relating to liability for unauthorized use of credit cards be included in all advertising for corporate's "credit card registration service," was not overbroad as to corporation, which maintained services which did not involve notification of card issuers for purposes of limiting liability for unauthorized use; if an advertistment for the corporation was solely concerned with services having no relation, direct or indirect, to such notification, the order was not applicable and the affirmative disclosure did not have to be made.

3. AFFIRMATIVE DISCLOSURE REQUIREMENT WAS ADEQUATELY SUPPORTED BY STATEMENT OF REASONS: EVEN THOUGH F.T.C.'S OPINION PROVIDED LITTLE JUSTIFICATION

Federal Trade Commission did not fail to support its affirmative disclosure requirement with an adequate statement of reasons where, while the Commission's opinion itself provided little justification for the disclosure requirement, the Commission adopted as its own the administrative law judge's initial decision, which provided an adequate basis for finding that the required statement of the statutory limit on liability was necessary to prevent deception.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 495 F. 2d 1004)

On petition for review of F.T.C. cease and desist order, court held that Congress never intended to limit the liability for unauthorized use of credit cards, as set forth in the 1970 amendment to the Truth in Lending Act, to credit cards used only for consumer purposes; all credit cards, whether used for business or consumer purposes, are covered by the $50 liability limit.

Order affirmed and enforced.

*Sitting by designation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 294(d).

BAZELON, Chief Judge:

[1005] The Federal Trade Commission Order under attack here requires petitioner [1] to disclose in its advertising the statutory limitation on cardholders' liability for unauthorized use of their credit cards. Petitioner's central contention requires us to reconcile the 1968 Truth in Lending Act with its 1970 amendments. In addition, petitioner raises challenges concerning the breadth of the Commission's Order and the adequacy of the Commission's reasoning. Because we find petitioner's contentions without merit, we affirm.

I

For $9 a year, petitioner Credit Card Service Corporation notified credit card companies that a subscriber's cards had been lost or stolen. It also assisted subscribers in resolving billing errors and in obtaining new cards. Petitioner's advertising emphasized that an individual is liable for the full amount charged to a lost or stolen card until the card's issuer is notified. On August 24, 1971, the Commission issued a complaint alleging that such advertising had appeared after the effective date of the 1970 amendments to the Truth in Lending Act, which limit potential liability for a lost or stolen credit card to $50 per card.[2] After a hearing, an Administrative Law Judge found that petitioner had engaged in "unfair methods of competition" and "unfair or deceptive acts or practices" in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[3] He ordered petitioner to cease and desist from representing that cardholders will have to pay for all goods and services obtained by unauthorized use of their cards.[4] He also required that the following notice be contained in future advertising of petitioner's service:

> IMPORTANT NOTICE
> Effective January 24, 1971, a Federal law provides that a cardholder has no liability for unauthorized use of his credit card unless all of the following four conditions are met. If the card issuing company (1) has notified you of your new limited liability, (2) has provided you with a pre-stamped envelope by which to notify them of a loss, (3) the card contains an approved method of identification, and (4) the use occurred before the [1006] card issuer is notified, then your liability is limited to $50 per card.[5]

The Commission affirmed the decision of the Administrative Law Judge.[6]

II

Petitioner contends that the Truth in Lending Act as amended distinguishes between business credit cards and consumer (non-business) credit cards—only with the latter is cardholder liability for unauthorized use limited to $50. Petitioner maintains, therefore, that the Commission's Order will foster "incomplete and . . . inaccurate disclosures."[7] because it disallows representations that cardholder liability is unlimited when a business card is lost or stolen.

In order to evaluate this contention we must consider the statutory background. In 1968 Congress passed the Truth in Lending Act[8] in order "to assure a meaningful disclosure of credit terms so that the consumer will be able to compare more readily the various credit terms available to him. . . ."[9] The statute regulated the advertising of credit[10] and required that the cost of credit be disclosed.[11] Because it was a consumer protection statute, § 1603(1) exempted from the Act "credit transactions involving extensions of credit for business or commercial purposes . . ."[12]

In 1970, Congress enacted Title V of Public Law 91–508 in order to regulate the credit card industry.[13] This legislation prohibited the unsolicited distribution of credit cards,[14] made the fraudulent use of such cards a federal crime,[15] and, in § 1643, limited cardholder liability to $50 for the "unauthorized use of a credit card." [16] Although other options [1007] were considered,[17] the 1970 legislation was passed as an amendment to the 1968 Truth in Lending Act. Petitioner maintains that because the credit card legislation is an amendment to the 1968 Act, it is subject to the § 1603(1) "business exception" in that Act. Therefore, petitioner concludes, when a credit card is issued or used primarily for business or commercial purposes, the $50 liability limit of § 1643 does not apply.

This subchapter [The Truth in Lending Act] does not apply to the following:

[14] 15 U.S.C. § 1642:

No credit card shall be issued except in response to a request or application therefor. This prohibition does not apply to the issuance of a credit card in renewal of, or in substitution for, an accepted credit card.

[15] 15 U.S.C. § 1644:

Whoever, in a transaction affecting interstate or foreign commerce, uses any counterfeit, fictitious, altered, forged, lost, stolen, or fraudulently obtained credit card to obtain goods or services, or both, having a retail value aggregating $5,000 or more, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Simply on the face of the statutory language, this argument is unpersuasive. The statutory limit on liability comes into play only when there is an "unauthorized use" of a credit card.[18] Section 1603(1) exempts from the statute "credit transactions . . . for business . . . purposes." [19] In the case of unauthorized use, the only event that is arguably a "credit transaction" is the unauthorized use itself. Does this mean that unauthorized uses for business purposes are "credit transactions . . . for business . . . purposes" and therefore exempt from the Act? Surely Congress did not intend that when a card is wrongfully used for business purposes the cardholder is fully liable, but when it is wrongfully used for consumer purposes, the limit on liability is $50. Under that approach, if a thief used a stolen credit card to rent a getaway car, we would have to decide if the rental was for a "business purpose" in order to determine the extent of the cardholder's liability. Indeed, as this example indicates, many unauthorized uses of credit cards are not ordinary "credit transactions" at all, but rather instances of fraud. In sum, given the absence of specific statutory language or legislative history, we cannot impute to Congress the unlikely intention that an "unauthorized use" could be a "credit transaction" for purposes of the § 1603(1) exemption.

(a) A cardholder shall be liable for the unauthorized use of a credit card only if the card is an accepted credit card, the liability is not in excess of $50, the card issuer gives adequate notice to the cardholder of the potential liability, the card issuer has provided the cardholder with a self-addressed, prestamped notification to be mailed by the cardholder in the event of the loss or theft of the credit card, and the unauthorized use occurs before the cardholder has notified the card issuer that an unauthorized use of the credit card has occurred or may occur as the result of loss, theft, or otherwise. Notwithstanding the foregoing, no cardholder shall be liable for the unauthorized use of any credit card which was issued on or after the effective date of this section, and, after the expiration of twelve months following such effective date, no cardholder shall be liable for the unauthorized use of any credit card regardless of the date of its issuance, unless (1) the conditions of liability specified in the preceding sentence are met, and (2) the card issuer has provided a method whereby the user of such card can be identified as the person authorized to use it. For the purposes of this section, a cardholder notifies a card issuer by taking such steps as may be reasonably required in the ordinary course of business to provide the card issuer with the pertinent information whether or not any particular officer, employee, or agent of the card issuer does in fact receive such information.

[17] Early legislative proposals would have placed credit card provisions under the Federal Deposit Insurance Act (see H.R. 12646, 90th Cong., 1st Sess.) and under Title 39 of the United States Code, which deals with the Postal Service (see H.R. 16542, 91st Cong., 2d Sess.).

Petitioner apparently agrees, since it does not argue that the nature of the unauthorized use governs the issue of liability limitation. Petitioner contends instead that § 1603(1) exempts business credit cards from the $50 limit, regardless of whether the cards are wrongfully used for business or consumer purposes.

Petitioner never explains why § 1603(1) which exempts certain "credit transactions" should apply to a particular class of credit cards. Of course, when an individual uses his card for business, that is a "credit transaction . . . for business . . . purposes." But in such a case, the liability limitation does not come into play because there has been unauthorized use. If, nonetheless, we assume that using a card for business purposes exempts an individual from the liability limitation, how long does that exemption last? Until the next time the card is used, for a non-business purpose? Under this approach, liability would depend on how a card was last used before it was lost or stolen.

Petitioner, of course, seeks to avoid this result. Its position seems to be that when a card is issued or used primarily for business, the card itself becomes "a credit transaction . . . for business . . . purposes."[20] Thus the [1008] card is exempted from the statute by § 1603(1) even on those occasions when it is not used for business. We are unwilling to assume that a credit card can be transformed into a credit transaction in this fashion.[21] Yet even if it could, petitioner's approach would be fraught with difficulty. For if § 1603(1) exempts business cards from the $50 liability limit it also exempts them from the other provisions of the 1970 credit card legislation—§ 1603(1) provides exemption from the whole Act, not just part of it.[22] This has disturbing consequences. As we have noted, the 1970 legislation makes the fraudulent use of credit cards a federal crime.[23] Thus, under petitioner's approach, the fraudulent use of business credit cards would not be a federal crime, while the fraudulent use of consumer credit cards would be. This unlikely result should not be attributed to Congress in the absence of specific statutory language or legislative history, neither of which are present here.

[20] Thus petitioner states the question as whether "business credit cards fall within the exemption provision [of § 1603(1)]." Reply Brief for Petitioner at 9.

[21] Nor can the transformation be achieved by arguing that when a card is issued for business, that is a "credit transaction involving extensions of credit for business. . . ." Credit is extended when a card is used, not when it is issued. Moreover, even if mere issuance of a card could bring the § 1603(1) exemption into play, then cards issued for business would be exempt from all of the 1970 credit card legislation, with the unlikely and unworkable results discussed below.

Moreover, petitioner's approach would create practical difficulties. A credit card is often used for both business and personal transactions. Considerable litigation and uncertainty would result if courts had to determine if a card was used "primarily" for business.[24] This determination would be necessary in order to decide whether the $50 liability limit applied and, what is worse, to decide whether a thief committed a federal offense when he fraudulently used a credit card.[25]

[1] In sum, petitioner's attempt to apply the "business exception" to the $50 liability limitation requires stretching the statutory langauge, is unsupported by legislative history,[26] and has troublesome implications for other portions of the statute. We hold therefore that Congress never intended that the limitation on liability for "unauthorized use of a credit card" contained in § 1643 be affected by the fact that certain "credit transactions" are exempted from the statute by § 1603(1).[27] All credit cards, whether used for business or consumer purposes, are covered by the $50 liability limit.[28]

[1009] Our holding is in keeping with the overall purpose of the Congressional enactments at issue here. While the 1968 Truth in Lending Act was designed to protect consumers,[29] the 1970 legislation dealt with the credit card industry in general.[30] The latter legislation may have been passed as an amendment to the former in order to apply the regulatory framework already in place for the Truth in Lending Act to the credit card field as well.[31]

[24] In its brief petitioner states the question as whether the exemption applies to cards "issued or used for business or commercial purposes." Brief for Petitioner at 6. We have added the word "primarily" to this formulation, since we do not understand petitioner to be contending that a card used otherwise is a "business credit card." See note 20, supra. If, however, petitioner is making such a contention its case is even weaker.

[25] Similar problems would arise in determining whether it was legal to issue a credit card in the absence of a request or application, since such issuance is banned by 15 U.S.C. § 1642. See note 14, supra.

[26] Petitioner concedes that the question is "not specifically addressed" in the legislative history of Public Law 91–508. Reply Brief for Petitioner at 5. As we note below, the general purposes of the 1968 and 1970 legislation imply that petitioner's effort to apply § 1603(1) to § 1643 should be rejected.

[27] The Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, in a clarifying amendment to Regulation Z issued pursuant to authority granted in the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. § 1604), has reached the same conclusion—"all cards, whether for business or consumer purposes, are covered . . . by the $50 liability limit." Brief for Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System as Amicus Curiae; see 12 C.F.R. § 226.13(a) (4) and (6).

[28] Our conclusion is strengthened by the fact that § 1643 states that "a cardholder" shall not be liable for more than $50. See note 16, supra. The definitional sections of the Act provide that a "cardholder" could be a "corporation." See 15 U.S.C. § 1602(m), (d), (c). (A "cardholder" is a "person"; a "person" can be an "organization"; an "organization" can be a "corporation"). Thus the liability limit would appear to apply even to corporate cardholders, which is contrary to the contention that there is a "business exception."

[30] See, e.g., the reference to "any . . . credit card" in 15 U.S.C. § 1644 reproduced at note 15, supra.

III

We turn now to petitioner's remaining contentions. The Commission's Order requires that an affirmative disclosure regarding liability for unauthorized use of credit cards be included in all advertising for petitioner's "credit card registration service." [32] Petitioner maintains that because the disclosure is irrelevant to some of its services, such as helping cardholders resolve billing disputes, the Order is overbroad—it applies even when advertising relates solely to matters having nothing to do with liability for unauthorized use.

[2] We do not find the Commission's Order overbroad, because we do not think it reaches as far as petitioner fears. As we have noted, the Order applies only to petitioner's "credit card registration service." The Commission's Opinion described that service as one providing:

> as its principal service, notification on behalf of the subscriber to credit card companies of the fact that a subscriber's credit cards have been lost or stolen. It also offers assistance to the subscriber in resolving billing errors of credit card companies and in obtaining new cards when the subscriber's cards have been lost or stolen, or the subscriber's address has changed.[33]

Thus the Commission saw petitioner's "credit card registration service" as a bundle of subservices, including, in particular, notification of issuers for the purpose of limiting liability. If an advertisement for petitioner is solely concerned with services having no relation, direct or indirect, to such notification, the Order is not applicable and the affirmative disclosure need not be made. Such non-notification services are not "credit card registration services" within the meaning of the Commission's Order. The Commission, in its brief to this Court, appears to concede this point.[34] To read the Order as applying to advertisements having nothing to do with cardholder liability would be to assume that the Commission required an irrelevant disclosure, an assumption we are unwilling to make.

[31] The Administrative Law Judge found that "it is quite obvious that the credit card provisions were inserted by Congress as an amendment to the Truth in Lending Act merely as a convenient place to insert such provisions for efficient administration by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Trade Commission." [34] Brief for Respondent at 27, note 16 ("Petitioners refer to various 'services' which they offer or may offer in the future (Br. 18–19), and argue that the required disclosure is irrelevant to these 'services.' The Commission's order, however, applies only to petitioners' 'credit card registration service' (Supp. App. 2).").

[3] Petitioner's final contention is that the Commission failed to support its affirmative disclosure requirement with an adequate statement of reasons. While the Commission's opinion itself provides little justification for the disclosure requirement, the Commission adopted as its own the Administrative [1010] Law Judge's initial decision.[35] That decision provides an adequate basis for the finding that the required statement of the statutory limit on liability was necessary to prevent deception.[36]

The Commission's Order is affirmed and enforced in its entirety.

So ordered.

ACTION ON SAFETY AND HEALTH, ET AL. v. F.T.C.*

No. 73–1266. F.T.C. File No. 99–142.

(United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, April 17, 1974)

1. Judicial Review Is Not Available if an Action Is Committed to Agency Discretion by Law

[758] If an action is committed to agency discretion by law, judicial review is not available.

2. Courts Should Recognize Basic Presumption Toward Judicial Review as Set Forth in Administrative Procedure Act if Particular Act Is Silent on Subject of Judicial Review

If a particular organic statute is silent on the question of judicial review of an agency's action, courts should recognize basic presumption favoring judicial review embodied in the Administrative Procedure Act.

3. F.T.C. Decision To Deny Appellants' Intervention Was Within Agency Discretion and Exempt From Judicial Review

Consent negotiation procedure between Federal Trade Commission and corporation alleged to have made false and deceptive advertising claims was promulgated by FTC pursuant to its enforcement discretion and FTC's decision to deny intervention to consumer protection organization was an agency action committed to agency discretion and therefore exempt from judicial review.

4. One Invoking Due Process Clause Must Specifically Denominate the Deprivation Suffered

It is incumbent upon one who invokes due process clause against government action to denominate specifically the deprivation he has suffered.

[36] See Initial Decision, supra, Supplemental Appendix at 12–27, esp. 19. Despite petitioner's objection, we do not find the affirmative disclosure, which tracks the statutory language, to be overly detailed or confusing.

* Reported in 498 F. 2d 757 (1974). See also page 539 herein.

5. SUFFICIENT INTEREST IN COMMISSION PROCEEDINGS WAS NOT DEMONSTRATED BY APPELLANTS

Consumer protection group which had sought to intervene in negotiations between FTC and manufacturer alleged to have made false and deceptive advertising claims was unable to demonstrate sufficient interest in Commission proceedings to entitle it to argue that Commission's procedures denied due process.

6. F.T.C. DID NOT ABRIDGE CONSUMER PROTECTIONS GROUP'S RIGHTS BY FAILURE TO PROVIDE EXPANDED PUBLIC PARTICIPATION EVEN THOUGH RIGHT TO PETITION GOVERNMENT IS CONSTITUTIONALLY GUARANTEED

Even if constitutionally guaranteed right to petition the government had any application to action in which consumer protection group sought to intervene in negotiations between FTC and manufacturer which had allegedly made false and deceptive advertising claims, FTC did not abridge consumer protection group's rights by failure to provide for expanded public participation.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 498 F. 2d 757)

On action seeking review of FTC denial of intervention in precomplaint consent negotiations and seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, court held the intervention decision was committed to agency discretion by law and not judicially reviewable; that the consumer protection group did not show sufficient interest in the negotiations to be entitled to allege denial of due process because of the denial of leave to intervene; and that the F.T.C. had not abridged the group's rights in denying them leave to intervene.

Affirmed.

Action on Safety and Health, a consumer protection organization, appeals from an order of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, per Richey, J., dismissing a complaint which sought 1) review of the Federal Trade Commission's (hereafter "Commission") denial of intervention in a pre-complaint consent negotiation; and 2) broad declaratory and injunctive relief concerning the Commission's consent order procedures generally. We hold that the District Court properly dismissed appellants' claims and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Before reviewing the factual background, it may be helpful to discuss briefly the Commission's consent order procedure contained in sections 2.31 to 2.35 of the Commission's Rules of Practice, 16 C.F.R. §§ 2.31–2.35 (1973). Under these rules the Commission may notify a "proposed respondent" of its intention to institute a formal proceeding against him. Such notification contains a form of the proposed complaint which the Commission will issue, as well as the proposed order which the Commission will seek. If the proposed respondent elects, within 10 days, to attempt a settlement, negotiations begin between the Commission's staff and the proposed respondent. If the parties are unable to agree, the Commission may commence formal adjudicative procedure pursuant to 16 C.F.R. § 3.11 (1973). If, however, an agreement is reached and accepted by the Commission, the provisionally accepted consent order is placed on the public record for a period of 30 days, during which time any interested party may file comments or views with the Commission. After reviewing any such public comments, the Commission may withdraw its acceptance of the proposed order or conclude the proceeding by final acceptance of the consent order either as originally proposed or as modified in light of comments received.

The facts underlying this appeal are not in dispute. On October 12, 1972, the Commission, pursuant to 16 C.F.R. § 2.31, declared its intention to issue a complaint charging Volvo, Inc. and others with violation of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45 (1970). The announcement was accompanied by both a proposed complaint and a proposed order. In sum, the complaint alleged that Volvo, Inc. had made false and deceptive advertising claims concerning the economy and durability of Volvo automobiles. The proposed order would have required Volvo, Inc. to cease and desist from making such claims unless it could substantiate the claims with appropriate facts.

At the request of Volvo, pursuant to 16 C.F.R. § 2.32, pre-complaint consent negotiations were begun. On November 6, 1972, during the negotiation period, appellants filed a motion with the Commission for leave to intervene in the negotiations. This motion [1] was denied by the Commission on December 14, 1972.

The Volvo-Commission negotiations resulted in a consent order which was submitted to the Commission on November 17, 1972. On January 10, 1973, appellants filed their complaint in District Court seeking: 1) review of the Commission's denial of intervention in the Volvo matter; 2) a declaration that the Commission's present consent negotiation procedures were constitutionally defective due to insufficient public participation; and 3) injunctive relief to prevent the Commission from utilizing the allegedly unconstitutional procedures until such procedures were revised to provide for greater public participation.

[1] Appellants additionally filed a Motion for Stay of Consent Negotiations until the Commission could rule on their motion for intervention; both motions were denied December 14, 1972.

On January 29, 1973, after oral argument, the District Court issued an order dismissing the complaint. The District Court found, in pertinent part:

> [I]t appearing to the Court that it lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter hereof, for the reason that a grant [760] or denial of intervention in Commission non-adjudicative consent negotiations is entirely discretionary with the Commission and is not judicially reviewable; and that no showing has been made that defendant has clearly violated an important constitutional or statutory right of plaintiffs since the commission's consent order procedure, 16 C.F.R. sections 2.31–.35, affords plaintiffs ample and meaningful opportunity to comment on executed consent agreements prior to final acceptance or rejection of such agreements by the Commission. . . .[2]

Appellants noted their appeal to this court on February 1, 1973, and moved the District Court for an injunction pending appeal. The District Court denied the motion.[3] On March 13, 1973, the Commission provisionally accepted the proposed consent agreement and, pursuant to 16 C.F.R. § 2.34(b) placed the agreement on the public record for 30 days, thereby providing opportunity for public comment before the order was finally accepted. Appellants, on April 23, 1973, moved this court, under Rule 8(a) Fed. R. App. P., for an order staying the Commission from finally accepting the consent agreement pending appeal. This court denied appellants' motion for stay.[4] After the period for public comment had ended, the Commission, on June 26, 1973, issued the final order in the Volvo matter.

The first of appellants' two arguments before this court is that the trial court erred in finding that the grant or denial of intervention in consent negotiations is "entirely discretionary with the Commission and is not judicially reviewable."

Appellants admit that the sole express grant of judicial review in the Federal Trade Commission Act provides for review only of cease and desist orders and only at the request of respondents thereto.[5]

[5] Brief of Appellants at 13. The Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(c) provides in pertinent part :

> Any person, partnership, or corporation required by an order of the Commission to cease and desist from using any method of competition or act or practice may obtain a review of such order in the court of appeals of the United States . . . .

However, appellants rely on cases such as Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S. Ct. 1507, 18 L. Ed. 2d 681 (1967), arguing that an explicit provision for review of certain enumerated types of administrative action does not necessarily preclude review of non-enumerated actions.[6] Thus, it is argued, unless the FTC Act contains "clear and convincing evidence" of an intent to withhold review, review must be granted.

[1, 2] We find that appellants' analysis, with its emphasis on a broad presumption favoring judicial review, is misleading in deciding the question presented. The question before us is not whether appellants have a broad right to seek review of Commission orders but whether review of this agency action is precluded by law. One who must rely upon the APA review provisions to overcome the silence of a particular organic statute must take the good with the bad. The statute and the cases make it clear that if an action is "committed to agency discretion by law," judicial review is not available. Our reading of Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, convinces us only that if a particular organic statute is silent on the question of judicial review, courts should recognize the basic presumption favoring judicial review, embodied in the Administrative Procedure Act, "so long as . . . the action is not committed by law to agency [761] discretion, 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)."[7] Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, at 140 (emphasis supplied). See e.g., Panama Canal Co. v. Grace Line, Inc., 356 U.S. 309, 317, 78 S. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 28.16 at 64-65 (1970 Supp.). Our inquiry must focus on the precise question of whether the power to grant or deny intervention in a consent decree negotiation has been "committed to agency discretion by law." If it has been so committed, § 701(a)(2) of the APA must control and judicial review is precluded.[8] Although the order of the trial court did not specifically mention § 701(a)(2) of the APA, we are satisfied that the trial court relied upon this provision in dismissing appellants' claim for lack of jurisdiction.

[7] The Administrative Procedure Act exempts from judicial review "agency action . . . committed to agency discretion by law." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2) (1970).

[8] Professor Davis makes it clear that inquiry must focus on the action taken. He states:

> The troublesome problem is not whether some administrative action is unreviewable because it is "committed to agency discretion by law" but is how to discover what particular action is so committed and what is not.

K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 28.16 at 965 (Supp. 1970) (emphasis added). This analysis has been adopted by other courts. Ferry v. Udall, 336 F. 2d 706 (9th Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 904, 85 S. Ct. 1449, 14 L. Ed. 2d 286 (1965).

The action of the Commission here under examination is the denial of appellants' motion to intervene in ongoing negotiation proceedings. The Federal Trade Commission Act is silent as to intervention in such consent negotiations. The Act speaks only of intervention in adjudications.[9] The Commission's Rules of Procedure make it clear that "Adjudicative proceedings . . . [do] not include . . . negotiations for the entry of consent orders." [10] The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has held that the Commission's consent order procedure was established pursuant to § 554(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act [11] and that such negotiation proceedings are clearly not adjudicative in nature. The Second Circuit stated:

> Nothing in the Administrative Procedure Act or in the basic principles of fair procedure precludes the Commission from creating and following a procedure for settling disputes without recourse to adjudication. Consent negotiations are not a stage in adjudication but a means of establishing whether adjudication can be avoided altogether. Like investigations, consent negotiations are distinct from the adjudicative process and hence not governed by the standards which control adjudicative procedure.[12]

When it passed § 554(c) of the APA, Congress clearly intended that the development of informal consent decree procedures be left to the individual agency's discretion. The court in Bristol-Myers v. FTC, supra, discussed the question of Congressional intent with regard to consent decree procedures, and stated:

> Congress intended such negotiating proceedings to be informal, without [762] the procedures inherent in trial-type hearings (right of examination and cross-examination, findings of fact and conclusions of law). Recognizing that the formalism of trial-type proceedings might not be conducive to successful settlement negotiations, Congress left to the agencies the power to develop the precise nature of informal proceedings that might be used to implement the statute. [11] 5 U.S.C. § 554(c) (1970) provides:

(c) The agency shall give all interested parties opportunity for—

(1) the submission and consideration of facts, arguments, offers of settlement, or proposals of adjustment when time, the nature of the proceeding, and the public interest permit; and

(2) to the extent that the parties are unable so to determine a controversy by consent, hearing and decision on notice and in accordance with sections 556 and 557 of this title.

> stage commence. If, on the other hand, the negotiation is successful, the parties present an agreement with a staff report to the full Commission, which remains on record for 30 days.

469 F. 2d at 1120 (emphasis added).

We find the reasoning of the Second Circuit in Bristol-Myers v. FTC, supra, to be sound. Congress granted great discretion to the Commission to determine whether a potential respondent has violated the Act and whether a proceeding by the Commission against the violator would be in the public interest.[13] Neither the Federal Trade Commission Act nor the Commission's Rules of Procedure grant appellants any right to intervene in consent negotiations. Rather, the power to prescribe consent negotiation procedure is part of the general enforcement power of the Commission, and such enforcement decisions are generally not subject to judicial review.[14] In this area, concerned as it is with questions of administrative policy and allocation of scarce Commission resources, "the Commission alone is empowered to develop that enforcement policy best calculated to achieve the ends contemplated by Congress and to allocate its available funds and personnel in such a way as to execute its policy efficiently and economically." Moog Industries, Inc. v. FTC, 355 U.S. 411, 413, 78 S. Ct. 377, 379, 2 L. Ed. 2d 370 (1958).[15]

[3] Whether or not the denial of appellants' motion to intervene in the negotiations is agency action committed entirely to agency discretion is a question which must be answered by viewing the source of the Commission's power to act. We believe that the whole consent negotiation procedure was promulgated by the Commission pursuant to its broad enforcement discretion.[16] As such, we [763] hold that the deci-

[15] Accord, FTC v. Universal Rundle Corp., 387 U.S. 244, 87 S. Ct. 1622, 18 L. Ed. 2d 749 (1967). The holdings in these two cases are not contrary to the result reached today. In both cases appellants were respondents under cease and desist orders and complained of failure to prosecute competitors. They were not, as here, merely aspiring intervenors in a non-adjudicatory setting.

[16] Appellants have directed our attention to various cases which they contend stand for the proposition that the APA does not preclude review in this case. Examination of these cases reveals that none concerns the non-adjudicative consent negotiation procedure. Pepsico, Inc. v. FTC, 472 F. 2d 179 (2d Cir. 1972) concerned intervenors who sought review of a cease and desist order which purportedly affected their rights directly. In Rettinger v. FTC, 392 F. 2d 454 (2d Cir. 1968) and Robertson v. FTC, 415 F. 2d 49 (4th Cir. 1969) petitioners seeking review were actual respondents in past proceedings which culminated in cease and desist orders. The question presented in both cases was whether proceedings begun subsequent to the issuance of cease and desist orders were "reopened adjudicatory proceedings" or "compliance" proceedings. The circuit courts in both cases denied jurisdiction. In Elmo Division of Drive-X Co., Inc. v. Dixon, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 113, 348 F. 2d 342 (1965), appellant was a party to a prior consent decree, and the question was whether the district court had jurisdiction to entertain a suit by appellant to enforce procedural rights which the Commission had granted to him in its prior decree.

Thus, none of these cases has any bearing whatever on the question sub judice.

sion to grant or deny intervention is an agency action committed to agency discretion and therefore is specifically exempt from judicial review under § 701(a) (2) of the APA.

Appellants' second argument is that the Commission's present consent order rules do not provide the public with "constitutionally required 'meaningful participation' in consent proceedings."[17] It is their position that "the 'meaningful' participation guaranteed by the First and Fifth Amendments requires the Commission to adopt procedures designed to permit greater public participation . . . ."[18] This result, it is argued, is compelled by "both the due process interest in fairness and the first amendment interest in public participation in decisions which affect the public."[19] The trial court dismissed this portion of the complaint stating that "no showing has been made that defendant has clearly violated an important constitutional or statutory right of plaintiffs since the Commission's consent order procedure . . . affords plaintiffs ample and meaningful opportunity to comment on executed consent agreements prior to final acceptance or rejection of such agreements by the Commission . . . ."[20]

[4, 5] The Commissions rules do not deny due process to appellants because appellants have not demonstrated an interest in the Commission proceedings sufficient to make a due process analysis possible. To put it another way, the mere incantation of the phrase "due process" is not enough to require judicial examination of the Commission's rules. Cases recently decided by the Supreme Court, Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 90 S. Ct. 1011, 25 L. Ed. 2d 287 (1970), Richardson v. Perales, 402 U.S. 389, 91 S. Ct. 1420, 28 L. Ed. 2d 842 (1971), make it clear that a deprivation cognizable under the Fifth Amendment due process clause still must be a deprivation of life, liberty, or property. In Goldberg v. Kelly, supra, there was no dispute that the termination of welfare benefits to appellees "adjudicate[d] important rights" of a property nature.[21] The Court in Goldberg stated:

> [C]onsideration of what procedures due process may require under any given set of circumstances must begin with a determination of the precise nature of the government function involved as well as of the private interest that has been affected by governmental action.[22]

It is incumbent upon one who invokes the due process clause against government action to denominate specifically the deprivation he has suffered. Only then can a court ascertain what procedural due process is required. See Blackwell College of Business v. Attorney General, 147 U.S.App.D.C. 85, 454 F. 2d 928, 932–933 (1971); Bell v. Burson, 402 U.S. 535, 540, 91 S. Ct. 1586, 29 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1971).

[17] Brief of Appellants at 20. It is not entirely clear, but apparently appellants assert that the Commission procedure is constitutionally defective in all events, regardless of whether they are entitled to judicial review of the Commission order denying them intervention in this particular matter.

A careful reading of appellants' papers, both those filed in the trial court and those filed here, discloses that at no time have appellants stated with specificity what they have been deprived of by the Commission's action. Clearly it [764] is not life or liberty within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment. As to a "property" interest, we can find none. Appellants here cannot sustain an allegation that Commission proceedings against Volvo may affect later private actions maintained by any individual who claims to have been injured by deceptive advertising. The Federal Trade Commission Act does not confer a private right of action on any individuals. Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 158 U.S. App. D.C. 207, 485 F. 2d 986 (1973).

Appellants, instead of demonstrating deprivation of a "property" interest, merely recite several cases which, they contend, confer on them the right to "meaningful participation" in the Commission's consent decree procedures. In each case cited by appellants, the interest protected was first, clearly articulated, and second, of a more substantial nature than the right of an undefined "public" to participate in agency enforcement proceedings at a stage prior to formal adjudication. In Goldberg v. Kelly, supra, the issue was termination of welfare benefits which affected the recipients' property interest in these benefits. Armstrong v. Manzo, 380 U.S. 545, 85 S. Ct. 1187, 14 L.Ed.2d 62 (1965) involved the right of a natural father to receive notice of the pending adoption of one of his children. In Holmes v. New York City Housing Authority, 398 F. 2d 262 (2d Cir. 1968), the persons who pressed a due process claim were not members of the "public," but applicants for public housing, whose rights to such housing were directly affected by the governmental action. Similarly, Blackwell College of Business v. Attorney General, 147 U.S. App. D.C. 85, 454 F. 2d 928 (1971), held that the college's "approved" status was a valuable property in the nature of a license, which could not be revoked without due process protection.

In summary, we can find no merit in appellants' asserted Fifth Amendment "right to participation" in the Commission's proceedings. Before a court can evaluate the procedural due process to which a person is entitled, there must first be alleged with reasonable particularity the precise right which the government's act is said to have altered or diminished. Without such an allegation—of a right to life, liberty, or property—there is simply no constitutional claim. As we have observed ante, the decision to allow intervention in nonadjudicative consent decree negotiations is committed to agency discretion. The appellants cite no precedent for their assertion that they have any interest in these proceedings which would entitle them to any due process safeguards. Because they have failed to identify their right with precision, meaningful analysis is impossible. For these reasons, we believe their claim that the Commission's current Rules of Practice, 16 C.F.R. § 2.31–.35, violate the Fifth Amendment is without merit.

[6] Turning now to appellants' First Amendment claim, we note that appellants' presentation to this court is singularly unenlightening.[23] In support of their inchoate claim, bottomed apparently on the right to petition clause of the First Amendment, appellants offer neither relevant precedent nor reasoned analysis.[24] We have, out of necessity, [765] independently researched the relevant case law and find no judicial opinions to bolster appellants' case. This being the situation, we merely affirm the trial court, stating only that if the guaranteed right to petition the government has any application to this case, the Commission has not abridged appellants' rights by its failure to provide expanded public participation. While this resolution does not mark off the precise boundaries of the right to petition clause, we leave that task to a future day when the issue will be clarified and throughly briefed.

Ordinarily, courts will not interfere with an agency until it has completed its action.

[24] Appellants' brief (see note 23 supra) cites only California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508 (1972), a case which has nothing at all to do with "public" participation in anything. That case holds that a carrier's First Amendment right to initiate a court action does not give rise to immunity from civil liability if the initiation of the law suit is itself a violation of antitrust law.

2. VIOLATION OF RIGHT SECURED BY STATUTE; LEGAL ISSUE NOT INVOLVING AGENCY EXPERTISE; AND INABILITY OF ISSUE TO BE RAISED ON LATER JUDICIAL REVIEW ARE REASONS ALLOWING ADMINISTRATIVE REMEDIES TO BE BY-PASSED

   Administrative remedies may be by-passed only if (1) agency has clearly violated a right secured by statute or agency regulation, (2) issue involved is a strictly legal one not involving agency's expertise or any factual determinations, or (3) issue cannot be raised on judicial review of a later order of agency.

3. APPELLATE COURT WAS WITHOUT AUTHORITY TO ENLARGE RECORD WITH MATERIAL NOT MADE PART OF RECORD IN PREVIOUS DISTRICT COURT ACTION

   On appeal from dismissal of complaint for declaratory and injunctive relief by reason of alleged failure of Federal Trade Commission to provide plaintiff with required notice and opportunity to submit information during an investigation into alleged illegal price stabilization, Court of Appeals was without authority to enlarge the record on appeal by admitting certain provisions of the Commission's administrative manual when it was not made a part of the record in the district court.

4. FAILURE TO EXHAUST ADMINISTRATIVE REMEDIES WAS GROUNDS FOR DISMISSING COMPLAINT FOR DECLARATORY AND INJUNCTIVE RELIEF; ISSUE WAS PROCEDURAL AND REVIEWABLE UPON FINAL AGENCY ACTION

   Complaint for declaratory and injunctive relief by reason of alleged failure of Federal Trade Commission to provide required notice and opportunity to submit information to plaintiff during an investigation into alleged illegal price stabilization was subject to dismissal for failure to exhaust administrative remedies in that asserted right to pursue informal settlement and explanation prior to filing of complaint did not appear plainly on face of agency rule, issue was one of procedural propriety which could be raised on appeal from final order of agency, and primary responsibility of interpreting rule rested with agency itself.

On appeal from order of U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, appellate court held that the complaint alleging failure by F.T.C. to provide required notice and opportunity to submit information was properly dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

Federal Trade Commission (Commission) "from any further proceedings" upon Count III of an administrative complaint issued against Borden on October 8, 1971.[1]

In November, 1965 Borden began selling private label fluid milk products in the Chicago area to stores of The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company (A & P). On March 13, 1967 Borden was notified by the Commission that it was investigating whether these sales involved illegal price discriminations in violation of Section 2(f) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(f), or sales at unreasonably low prices or at prices below cost for the purpose of eliminating or lessening competition, in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45.[2] Pursuant to requests by the Commission, Borden furnished information and documentary evidence regarding its milk sales to A & P.

On June 1, 1971 Borden received a copy of a proposed Commission complaint, charging in Counts I and II that A & P had wrongfully induced discriminatory prices and in Count III that Borden and A & P had combined to effect price stabilization.[3] A formal complaint containing the same charges was filed on October 8, 1971. Borden was not charged with illegal price discrimination.

On October 26, 1972 Borden filed with the administrative law judge a motion to dismiss Count III of the Commission complaint for alleged violation of Commission Rule 2.6, 16 C.F.R. § 2.6, which provides:

> Any person under investigation compelled or requested to furnish information or documentary evidence shall be advised with respect to the purpose and scope of the investigation.

The administrative law judge denied this motion on February 13, 1973, and on April 24, 1973 denied Borden's motion for reconsideration or in the alternative for certification of the denial to the Commission pursuant to Rule 3.23, 16 C.F.R. § 3.23.

Borden commenced this action on May 8, 1973, alleging in Count I of its complaint that the "failure to provide the required notice and opportunity to submit information during the investigation was a clear and substantial breach of the requirements of the Commission's own Rule 2.6, and its unpublished rules and directives". Borden applied for a preliminary injunction. The Commission filed a motion to dismiss Count I for failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

[1] The Commission initially contended that the dismissal of Count I was not appealable under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) as an interlocutory order refusing an injunction, since Count II of the complaint remained as a basis for seeking injunctive relief. At oral argument the parties agreed that the issue with respect to appellate review is now moot, since the district court subsequently dismissed Count II of Borden's complaint.

[2] On January 21, 1969 the Commission by formal resolution authorized a Commission investigation of Borden and A & P with respect to possible price discrimination charges. Borden alleges that it was informed of this resolution in October, 1969.

[3] It is undisputed that Borden was not given notice that it was under investigation for possible charges of illegal price stabilization until it received the proposed complaint on June 1, 1971.

In a well-reasoned opinion entered June 7, 1973 the district court denied the application for a preliminary injunction and granted the motion to dismiss, holding that "it is deprived of jurisdiction of Count I by the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies".[4] On this appeal Borden challenges only the ruling on the motion to dismiss. We affirm.

[1, 2] It is well settled that ordinarily courts will not interfere with an [787] agency until it has completed its action [5] and that administrative remedies may be bypassed only if (1) the agency has clearly violated a right secured by statute or agency regulation, Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 188–189, 79 S. Ct. 180, 3 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1958); Elmo Division of Drive-X Company v. Dixon, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 113, 348 F. 2d 342, 346–347 (1965); (2) the issue involved is a strictly legal one not involving the agency's expertise or any factual determinations, Jewel Companies, Inc. v. F.T.C., 432 F. 2d 1155, 1159 (7 Cir. 1970); McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, 197–199, 89 S. Ct. 1657, 23 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1969); or (3) the issue cannot be raised upon judicial review of a later order of the agency, Jewel, supra at 1159. We agree with the district court that none of these exceptions are applicable here.

Borden argues that under Rule 2.6 it was entitled to notice that it was being investigated for illegal price stabilization and "to submit exculpatory or explanatory information" during the investigative stages of the Commission's proceedings. In support of this contention Borden relies upon an unpublished directive implementing Rule 2.6, which reads:

> As a matter of standard operating procedure, in any matter in which a recommendation for a complaint is contemplated the proposed respondent should be * * * afforded an opportunity to furnish information respecting the acts or practices involved prior to submitting the matter to the Commission with recommendation for complaint.

This directive is from a citation "of a recent staff directive" in E. Pollock, Pre-Complaint Investigations by the Federal Trade Commission, 45 Chicago Bar Record 379, 381–82 (1964). Prior to oral argument Borden filed a motion to enlarge the record pursuant to Rule 10(e) F.R. App. Pro. to include the provisions of Section 6–051.7B of the Commission's Administrative Manual, which was made available to Borden during the pendency of this appeal pursuant to a request for disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552. Section 6–051.7B provides:

[4] Administrative hearings were commenced on June 11, 1973. The Commission completed its case in chief just prior to oral argument on this appeal. Borden's defense was scheduled to begin on March 4, 1974.

[5] Borden's contention that no further administrative remedies are available is without merit. 16 C.F.R. § 3.54 (1973) prescribes the scope of review on appeals from initial decisions of administrative law judges. This would include a review of the judge's order denying the motion to dismiss the administrative complaint as to Borden, as well as adverse rulings with respect to the exclusion of evidence if obtained in violation of Rule 2.6.

> Notifying the Respondent. When a recommendation for complaint issuance is contemplated, the respondent should be notified that an investigation is being made and given the opportunity to furnish information on the acts or practices involved some time before submitting the matter to the Commission with recommendation for complaint. Where this procedure is not followed, the reason must appear in the memorandum transmitting the proposed complaint and order.[6]

[3] The request to the Secretary of the Commission for disclosure of the directive was made after the district [788] court's decision from which this appeal was taken. Rule 10(e) does not give this court authority to admit on appeal any document which was not made a part of the record in the district court. See United States ex. rel. Kellogg v. McBee, 452 F. 2d 134, 137 (7 Cir. 1971). The motion to enlarge the record accordingly is denied. In any event the staff directive as quoted in the Chicago Bar Record is substantially the same as Section 6–051.7B and was considered by the district court in determining the motion to dismiss.

Borden was fully apprised of the investigation of possible illegal price discrimination with respect to its milk sales to A & P. The Commission contends that Rule 2.6 in no way suggests that if the Commission staff in analyzing the evidence uncovers proof of additional or alternate violations, further notice must be given prior to notice through the proposed complaint. The staff directive, the Commission argues, is "a purely internal admonition designed to serve the efficient operation of the Commission rather than a mandatory rule conferring rights upon potential respondents".

[4] The district court correctly noted that in deciding whether exhaustion of administrative remedies should be required the initial consideration is whether the agency has violated a clear right. What-

[6] By letter to counsel representing the Commission on the administrative complaint, Borden on February 22, 1973 requested voluntary disclosure of the directive mentioned in the Chicago Bar Record. This request was denied February 26, 1973 on the ground that "The Commission's internal directions and instructions to the staff are considered confidential." See 16 CFR § 4.10(a)(1) (1973). On March 15, 1973 Borden requested that the administrative law judge issue a subpoena duces tecum compelling production of the directive. This request was denied on April 18, 1973, the administrative law judge noting that the request for disclosure of confidential records should be addressed to the Secretary of the Commission. See 16 CFR § 4.11 (1973). No further action was taken by Borden until July 5, 1973, almost one month after the district court's dismissal of Count I of Borden's complaint on June 7, 1973. On that date Borden filed an appropriate request for disclosure with the Secretary of the Commission, and it was pursuant to this request that disclosure of Section 6–051.7B was obtained.

ever the merits of the parties' claims with respect to Rule 2.6 and the staff directive, we agree with the district court's conclusion that:

> Borden's asserted right to pursue informal settlement and explanation prior to the filing of a complaint does not appear plainly on the face of Rule 2.6. The unpublished rule cited as evidence of that interpretation simply states that a party should be given an opportunity to supply information respecting the matters under investigation. Granted that the latter rule begins with the phrase "as a matter of standard operating procedure," it is not clearly mandatory that such an opportunity be provided.[7]

Relying upon our decision in Jewel, supra, Borden contends that "it will be unable to raise the Commission's violation of Rule 2.6 on appeal of a final agency order." However, as the district court recognized, Jewel is distinguishable in a number of respects. We held in Jewel, supra at 1159, that exhaustion of administrative remedies was not required where the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission was challenged on the ground that "one of the Commissioners did not properly exercise his statutory discretion in voting for the issuance of the complaint." We noted that review of a final order might not be adequate, since "if the question of the Commissioner's obligation is postponed until final appeal of a Commission order, the standard of review will be different," that it, "the court of appeals would only decide whether the final order is supported by the evidence and would not question the authority of the Commission in issuing the complaint." Id. In contrast, the issue here is one of the procedural propriety of the steps taken during the investigatory stage leading to an administrative complaint [789] and may be raised on appeal from the Commission's final order.[8]

Judicial review of proceedings of the Federal Trade Commission is governed by 15 U.S.C. §45(c), which provides for review of cease and desist orders by the courts of appeals. Section 10(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 704, provides:

[7] The district court correctly pointed out that its conclusion is buttressed by the discretionary nature of 16 CFR §2.21 (1973), which provides for informal settlements during the investigatory stage and states:

"§2.21. Voluntary compliance.

"(a) The Commission, when it has information indicating that a person or persons may be engaging in a practice which may involve violation of a law administered by it, and if it deems the public interest will be fully safeguarded thereby may afford such person or persons the opportunity to have a matter disposed of on an informal nonadjudicatory basis.

"(b) In determining whether the public interest will be fully safeguarded through such informal administrative action, the Commission will consider: (1) The nature and gravity of the alleged violation; (2) the prior record and good faith of the parties involved; and (3) other factors, including, where appropriate, adequate assurance of voluntary compliance."

See also the Commission's explanatory statement of §2.21, 34 Fed. Reg. 19044, November 29, 1969.

[8] See Sterling Drug Inc. v. F.T.C., 146 U.S. App. D.C. 237, 251, 450 F. 2d 698, 712 at n. 13 (1971) where the court noted that "the rule that agency decisions must be affirmed if supported by adequate findings of fact and substantial evidence in the record obviously does not apply where a proper hearing has not been held."

> Agency action made reviewable by statute * * * [is] subject to judicial review. A preliminary, procedural, or intermediate agency action or ruling not directly reviewable is subject to review on the review of the final agency action.

If the administrative proceedings subsequently result in a cease and desist order against Borden, Borden will have an opportunity on review to raise the issue of whether the Commission violated Rule 2.6 and its staff directives in failing to give Borden an opportunity to present exculpatory evidence during the precomplaint stage of the administrative process. We agree with the district court that "The issuance of the Commission's complaint would seem to constitute intermediate agency action and the decisions of the Administrative Law Judge [on Borden's motions to dismiss] would appear to be procedural rulings within the scope of the court of appeals' power to review under 5 U.S.C. § 704." See Bristol-Myers Company v. F.T.C., 469 F. 2d 1116, 1117 (2 Cir. 1972); Frito-Lay, Inc. v. F.T.C., 380 F. 2d 8, 10 (5 Cir. 1967).

In addition, the issue in Jewel, supra at 1159, was characterized as "inherently a legal one", involving "statutory construction." The district court correctly observed that:

> The nature of the legal question involved here differs in a significant way from that in Jewel. There, the legal question required the interpretation of a statute—a task to which the courts are accustomed and well suited and to which administrative agencies have no claim of expertise. 4 Davis § 30.01, at 241. In the area of interpretation of agency rules, however, the primary responsibility of interpretation rests with the agencies themselves and, as noted above, great weight is accorded their interpretations. Thus the determination of the jurisdictional issue in this case, unlike that in Jewel, is not susceptible to determination by the Court without delay.

Finally, the district court properly recognized that Borden's claim of irreparable injury based upon the cost and inconvenience of defending itself in administrative proceedings is not alone sufficient to justify judicial intervention in the administrative process. See Myers v. Bethlehem Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 51–52, 58 S. Ct. 459, 82 L. Ed. 638 (1938); and Renegotiation Board v. Bannercraft Clothing Co., 415 U.S. 1, 94 S. Ct. 1028, 1040, 39 L. Ed. 2d 123 (1974), where the Court reaffirmed the rule of Myers that "Mere litigation expense, even substantial and unrecoupable cost, does not constitute irreparable injury."

We conclude that there are no exceptional circumstances which would justify Borden's attempt to bypass the administrative process, and that the district court properly dismissed Count I of Borden's complaint under the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies.

Affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. J. B. WILLIAMS COMPANY, INC., ET AL.*

No. 236, Docket 73–1624. F.T.C. Docket No. 8547.

(United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, May 2, 1974)

1. NOTWITHSTANDING THE CRIMINAL NATURE OF ACTION, SIXTH AMENDMENT RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL DOES NOT APPLY TO CIVIL PENALTIES FOR ALLEGED VIOLATION OF F.T.C. CEASE AND DESIST ORDER

   [415] Sixth Amendment right to jury trial did not apply to suit by United States to recover civil penalties for alleged violation of FTC cease and desist order, notwithstanding contention that action was inherently criminal in nature.

2. EVEN THOUGH STATUTE IS SILENT ON RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL, GENERALLY THERE IS A RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL WHEN U.S. SUES TO COLLECT PENALTIES

   Generally, there is right to jury trial when United States sues to collect a penalty, even though statute is silent on right of jury trial.

3. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF CIVIL PENALTY SECTION OF F.T.C. ACT DOES NOT SUGGEST THAT CONGRESS INTENDED TO WITHHOLD RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY

   While a jury trial would not have been required if the FTC had sought an order of civil contempt in a court of appeals, nothing in the legislative history of the civil penalty provision of the FTC Act suggests that Congress intended to conform the procedures of that provision with those of the contempt provision and thus to withhold the right of jury trial.

4. JUDGMENT OF F.T.C. IN FRAMING REMEDIAL ORDERS MUST BE GIVEN MUCH WEIGHT

   Much weight must be given judgment of FTC in framing remedial orders.

5. CUSTOM AND "THE REMEDY SOUGHT" MILITATE STRONGLY IN FAVOR OF JURY TRIAL WHERE PRACTICABILITIES AND LIMITATIONS OF JURIES DO NOT MILITATE AGAINST RECOGNITION OF RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL

   The practicabilities and limitations of juries do not militate here against recognition of a right of jury trial, and custom before merger of law and equity and "the remedy sought" militate strongly in favor of it.

6. RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL EXTENDS, NOT JUST TO SOME, BUT ALL KINDS OF QUESTIONS OF FACT

   When there is right to jury trial, it extends to all kinds of questions of fact, not simply to some.

7. DEFERENCE TO F.T.C.'S CLAIM OF VIOLATION OF ORDER NOT REQUIRED BY CONGRESS

   Congress has not required deference to FTC's claim that its order has been violated.

8. PLAINTIFFS WERE ENTITLED TO HAVE JURY DECIDE MEANING OF TELEVISION COMMERCIALS ALLEGEDLY IN VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ORDER

   Manufacturer and advertising agency against whom United States brought suit for penalties for violation of cease and desist order of FTC were entitled to have jury decide meaning of television commercials which allegedly violated order.

9. RIGHT TO FULL EVIDENTIARY HEARING ON ALL GENUINE ISSUES OF MATERIAL FACT BELONGS TO PARTY OPPOSING SUMMARY JUDGMENT MOTION

Party opposing summary judgment motion has right to full evidentiary hearing on all genuine issues of material fact.

10. PARTY OPPOSING SUMMARY JUDGMENT AND RAISING TRIABLE FACT QUESTIONS IN BENCH HEARING, HAS RIGHT TO ADDUCE EXPERT TESTIMONY OF LIVE WITNESSES AND CROSS-EXAMINE OPPONENT'S WITNESSES INSTEAD OF RELYING ON AFFIDAVITS

In a bench trial, if party opposing summary judgment raises any triable fact questions, such party has right to adduce expert testimony of live witnesses and cross-examine his opponent's witnesses rather than to have to rely on affidavits submitted in opposition to summary judgment motion.

11. DETERMINATION OF WHETHER ACCUSED COMMERCIALS OR PRODUCT COME WITHIN ORDER AS CONSTRUED IS A TASK APPROPRIATE FOR JURY WHILE DETERMINATION OF WHAT THE ORDER MEANT IS A TASK FOR THE COURT

Questions of whether television commercials violated FTC cease and desist order and whether new product was within reach of order which applied to any other preparation of substantially similar composition or possessing substantially similar properties involved determination of what order meant, which was task for court, and whether accused commercials or product come within or[416]der as so construed, a task appropriate for jury.

12. COURT WAS JUSTIFIED IN GIVING BROAD READING TO WORDS CONTAINED IN ORDER IN DETERMINING APPLICABILITY OF ORDER TO ANOTHER PRODUCT

In determining whether FTC cease and desist order applied to another product, court was justified in giving broad reading to words which were contained in order and which made order applicable to "or any other preparation of substantially similar composition or possessing substantially similar properties."

13. THAT THERE WAS NO GENUINE ISSUE OF FACT WITH RESPECT TO APPLICABILITY OF ORDER TO NEW PRODUCT BEING WITHIN SCOPE OF ORDER WAS ESTABLISHED BY THE RECORD

Record established that there was no genuine issue of fact with respect to whether new product distributed by manufacturer which was subject to FTC cease and desist order which applied to any other preparation of substantially similar composition or processing substantially similar properties was within scope of order.

14. F.T.C. DID NOT HAVE BURDEN OF SHOWING THAT ALLEGED VIOLATIVE COMMERCIALS WERE FALSE AND DECEPTIVE

FTC did not have burden of showing that commercials which were claimed to violate cease and desist order, if within order, were false and deceptive.

15. WHETHER ORAL AND/OR VISUAL CONTENT OF CHALLENGED ADVERTISEMENTS FELL WITHIN ORDER'S PROHIBITIONS IS FOR THE COURT TO DETERMINE

Fact that FTC did not have burden of showing that commercials which allegedly violated cease and desist order, if within order, were false and deceptive did not mean that once Commission establishes that cease and desist order is in effect and that particular advertisement has been disseminated which allegedly violates order, it is for court to determine as matter of law whether oral and/or visual content of challenged advertisements fell within scope of prohibitions in order.

16. QUESTION OF MEANING OR EFFECT OR WORDS IS FOR THE TRIER OF FACTS, TO BE DECIDED AFTER HEARING ALL MATERIAL EVIDENCE

Generally, when meaning or effect of words or acts is fairly disputed, question is for trier of facts to be decided after hear-in on material evidence.

17. INTERPRETATION THAT PHRASES "BLOOD-BUILDING POWER . . ." AND "BUILDS IRON POWER IN YOUR BLOOD FAST" SAY THAT PRODUCT BUILDS POWER IN INDIVIDUAL, WHICH IS IN VIOLATION OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDER, IS NOT REQUIRED AND PRECLUDES GRANT OF SUMMARY JUDGMENT

While advertisement that product carried "blood-building power to every part of your body" and that it "builds iron power in your blood fast" could be interpreted as saying that product builds power in individual and thereby violated portion of FTC order which enjoined dissemination of any advertisement representing that product would be beneficial in treatment or relief of tiredness symptoms, such interpretation was not required and precluded grant of summary judgment.

18. COURT MUST DRAW INFERENCE MOST FAVORABLE TO OPPONENT OF MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

On motion for summary judgment, court must draw inference most favorable to party opposing motion.

19. RECORD IN CIVIL PENALTY SUIT FAILED TO ESTABLISH THAT ADVERTISEMENTS VIOLATED CEASE AND DESIST ORDER ENJOINING DISSEMINATION OF ADVERTISEMENT REPRESENTING PRODUCT WOULD BE BENEFICIAL TO TIREDNESS SYMPTOMS

Record in suit against manufacturer and advertising agency by United States seeking penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order failed to establish that advertisements which claimed that product carried "blood-building power to every part of your body" and that it "builds iron power in your blood fast" violated cease and desist order which enjoined dissemination of any advertisement representing that product or any similar preparation would be beneficial in treatment or relief of tiredness symptoms.

20. RECORD IN CIVIL PENALTY PROCEEDING CREATED JURY QUESTION AS TO WHETHER ADVERTISEMENT DEPICTING SAD/GLAD WOMAN WAS IN VIOLATION OF CEASE AND DESIST ORDER

Record in proceeding by United States seeking to recover penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order created jury question as to whether advertisement, in which woman who is sad because of having discovered that she has "iron-poor blood" is told not to be sad and to be glad for product which can remedy deficiency and who is subsequently shown smiling, violated cease and desist order which enjoined dissemination of any advertisement representing that product would be beneficial in [417] treatment or relief of tiredness symptoms unless advertisement contained certain express disclosures.

21. NO TRIABLE ISSUE LEFT TO JURY WHEN RECORD IN CIVIL PENALTY ACTION ESTABLISHED THAT ADVERTISEMENTS VIOLATED ORDER PROHIBITING DISSEMINATION OF ADVERTISING WHICH CREATED IMPRESSION OF TIRED FEELING WAS CAUSED BY IRON DEFICIENCY OR LINKED TIRED SYMPTOMS WITH IRON DE-

FICIENCY WAS NOT THE ONE LEADING TO THE CEASE AND DESIST ORDER BUT WAS A NEW PRODUCT

Record in proceeding by United States to recover penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order established, and thus left no triable issue for jury, that advertisements in which it was claimed that many healthy young women have little or no iron reserves and that some women even risk becoming anemic and tired, followed by suggestion to take product and maintain supply needed to prevent iron shortage violated order prohibiting the dissemination of any advertising which created impression that tired feeling was caused by iron deficiency or which linked tiredness symptoms with iron deficiency anemia even though product was not product involved in proceeding leading to cease and desist order but was new product.

22. NOTICE OF NONCOMPLIANCE IS NOT REQUIRED, IN CASES INVOLVING PENALTIES FOR VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ORDERS, IN TIME FOR VIOLATOR TO BRING HIMSELF INTO COMPLIANCE

Penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order may be recovered without giving alleged violator notice of noncompliance in time to bring himself into compliance.

23. TO KNOWINGLY ALLOW DAILY PENALTIES ACCRUE WITHOUT GIVING NOTICE THAT COMMISSION BELIEVES ADVERTISING TO BE IN VIOLATION OF ORDER IS UNREASONABLE

It would seem unreasonable to permit FTC to knowingly let daily penalties accrue without giving notice of Commission's position that advertisements violate cease and desist order.

24. RECORD FAILED TO SHOW F.T.C. KNOWINGLY ALLOWED DAILY PENALTIES TO ACCRUE WITHOUT GIVING NOTICE

Record in proceeding to recover penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order failed to establish that Commission knowingly let daily penalties accrue without giving notice of its position that advertisements violated order.

25. PENALTY WAS NOT LIMITED TO $5,000 PER DAY WHERE AUTHORIZING STATUTE PROVIDED THAT EACH SEPARATE VIOLATION OF ORDER SHOULD BE A SEPARATE OFFENSE

Where statute authorized penalty of $5,000 for each violation of FTC cease and desist order, and statute further provided that each separate violation of order should be separate offense, penalty was not limited to $5,000 per day.

26. DUPLICATE PENALTIES COULD NOT BE LEVIED AGAINST MANUFACTURER AND ITS ADVERTISING AGENCY WHERE AGENCY WAS WHOLLY-OWNED BY STOCKHOLDERS OF MANUFACTURER AND 95% OF ITS BUSINESS WAS THAT OF MANUFACTURER

Where advertising agency was completely owned by stockholders of manufacturer and advertising manufacturer's product constituted 95 percent of advertising agency's business, duplicate penalties for violation of FTC cease and desist order could not be levied against manufacturer and advertising agency.

27. ATTORNEY GENERAL WAS WITHOUT AUTHORITY TO SEEK $500,000 AGAINST EACH PARTY WHERE F.T.C. REQUESTED TOTAL SUM OF $500,000

Where FTC requested only a judgment against manufacturer and advertising agency in total sum of $500,000, Attorney General in suit to collect penalty was without authority to seek that amount against each.

28. It Would be Advisable To Grant Evidentiary Hearing on Amount of Penalties Assessed if Requested by Either the Government or Defendants

If either the Government or defendants requested, it would be advisable for court to grant evidentiary hearing on amount of penalty to be assessed against manufacturer and advertising agency for violation of FTC cease and desist order relating to advertising.

29. Good or Bad Faith, Public Injury, and Ability To Pay Are Factors Determining Size of Penalty To Be Assessed

Size of penalty to be assessed against manufacturer and advertising agency for violation of FTC cease and desist order relating to advertising should be based on number of factors including good or bad faith of defendants, injury to public, and defendants' ability to pay.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 498 F. 2d 414)

On appeal from action by Government for civil penalties, court held that proceeding was not criminal in nature so that defendants had right to jury trial; defendants had right to jury trial on issues of fact; there were issues of fact as to whether some advertisements violated F.T.C. order; and that penalties could not be assessed against both manufacturer and advertising agency when manufacturer had complete control of advertising agency.

Judgments affirmed in part, set aside in part, and reversed and remanded in part.

[418] Friendly, Circuit Judge:

On November 28, 1969, the Federal Trade Commission made a certificate to the Attorney General pursuant to § 16 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 56. The Commission's letter stated it had reason to believe The J. B. Williams Company (Williams) and Parkson Advertising Agency, Inc. (Parkson) were liable for penalties under § 5(l) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l)[1] for violation of a cease and desist order for which the Sixth Circuit had granted enforcement,

[1] Throughout this litigation, § 5(l) read:

(l) Any person, partnership, or corporation who violates an order of the Commission to cease and desist after it has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action

J. B. Williams Co. v. FTC, 6 Cir., 381 F. 2d 884 (1967), and recommended that the Attorney General institute "appropriate proceedings . . . for recovery of civil penalties as prescribed in said section." The appropriate proceedings were described in a draft complaint, which alleged 100 violations and sought "[j]udgment against defendants in the total sum of $500,000."

Five months later the Government began this action; the complaint alleged the same 100 violations, but unlike the Commission's draft complaint, demanded judgment for $500,000 against each defendant. The defendants answered and demanded a jury trial. Subsequently, the Government moved for summary judgment. Judge Motley granted this in the sum of $456,000 against Williams and $356,000 against Parkson with leave to Parkson to apply to pay its penalties in installments with interest, 354 F. Supp. 521 (S.D.N.Y. 1973). The defendants have appealed.

I. The Facts

The instant controversy began with the issuance of a complaint by the FTC in December 1962 relating to defendants' newspaper and television advertising for Geritol, an iron and vitamin product. The gist of the complaint was that the advertising gave the impression that Geritol was an effective general remedy for tiredness, loss of strength or a rundown feeling, whereas in fact it was effective only in the small minority of cases where these conditions were caused by a deficiency in iron or in the vitamins contained in Geritol. After proceedings which it is unnecessary here to detail, the FTC issued a cease and desist order on September 28, 1965. Paragraph 1(d), which both sides agree to be the broadest paragraph of the order, is set forth in the margin.[2] Williams and [419] Parkson petitioned for review of brought by the United States. Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.

Late last year § 5(l) was amended, although the basic structure of the penalty provision remained unchanged. Introduced by Senator Jackson as a rider to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act, 87 Stat. 576 (Nov. 16, 1973), the amendment extended the penalty clause to all Commission orders rather than merely cease and desist orders, increased the maximum penalty per violation to $10,000, and empowered the district courts to grant injunctive relief in the enforcement of Commission orders.

[2] "(d) which represents directly or by implication that the use of such preparation will be beneficial in the treatment or relief of tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling, nervousness or irritability, unless such advertisement expressly limits the claim of effectiveness of the preparation to those persons whose symptoms are due to an existing deficiency of one or more of the vitamins contained in the preparation, or to an existing deficiency of iron or to iron deficiency anemia, and further, unless the advertisement also discloses clearly and conspicuously that: (1) in the great majority of persons who experience such symptoms, these symptoms are not caused by a deficiency of one or more of the vitamins contained in the preparation or by iron deficiency or iron deficiency anemia; and (2) for such persons the preparation will be of no benefit;"

the order under § 5(c) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(c). In the review proceeding, the Sixth Circuit directed that the order be enforced except for a provision directing the petitioners to cease and desist from representing that iron deficiency or iron deficiency anemia can be self-diagnosed without a medical test. J. B. Williams Co. v. FTC, supra, 381 F. 2d at 891. The FTC entered a modified order on November 24, 1967. Williams and Parkson did not seek certiorari.

In October 1968, after receiving appellants' first compliance report, the FTC directed a public hearing on compliance. At the hearing it viewed representative Geritol television commercials and heard argument. Subsequently it issued an opinion in which it concluded that the advertising continued "to treat that portion of the population suffering from tiredness as equal to that portion of the population which experience tiredness due to iron deficiency anemia." The principal basis for that conclusion was that although the television commercials had dutifully announced that "the great majority of tired people don't feel that way because of iron-poor blood and Geritol won't help them," the effect of this disclaimer was largely obliterated by the visual presentation and by such phrases as "but it is a medical fact that many of the millions of people who have iron-poor blood are tired and need Geritol" (emphasis in original) or "but millions do have iron-poor blood and you could be one of the many who are tired for that reason and need Geritol." The FTC advised that "in order to avoid future enforcement proceedings" Williams and Parkson should immediately discontinue the broadcast of the television commercials provided the Commission or any similar ones. The Commission also directed Williams and Parkson to file a further compliance report by January 31, 1969.

The second compliance report stated that the company was currently using only three different television commercials (subsequently termed the "AA" advertisements), scripts of which were submitted with the report. These commercials warned viewers that they might be suffering from "iron-poor blood" and focused on Geritol's ability to cure iron deficiency. They spoke of Geritol's "blood-building power" and of its capacity to build "iron power in your blood fast." The report also described and included scripts for five other commercials (subsequently termed the "BB" advertisements), which were no longer being disseminated but which the company believed to be in compliance. Williams and Parkson included in the report a request to meet promptly with Commission representatives in order to facilitate the preparation of new advertising themes. On May 8, 1969, the Chief of the FTC's Compliance Division wrote Williams' counsel that "the Commission would be favorably disposed to accepting as compliance with its order to cease and desist the absolute discontinuance by J. B. Williams Company, Inc., of the BB advertisements submitted with your last report and the continued use of the AA advertisements only with deletion from them of all references to 'power'." [3] The letter also advised that Williams would have to eliminate all references in its labeling to prevention of tiredness. A week later, on May 15, counsel wrote that Williams and Parkson were willing to accept these conditions, although they did not concede either that the BB advertisements or the use of the word "power" in the AA advertisements violated the order. Counsel also agreed to the omission of all labeling references to [420] Geritol's ability to prevent tiredness, although not conceding "that the Commission's Order relates in any way to preventative claims." On June 6, the Commission wrote counsel,[4] acknowledging receipt of the May 15 letter, stating it was "of the view that the 'AA' commercials will comply with the order if all references to 'power' are deleted," and requesting another report within 30 days.[5]

The third compliance report, submitted on July 2, 1969, stated that Williams and Parkson had decided to stop using the AA commercials rather than revise them to eliminate the word "power"; that "[t]he process of removing these commercials from the air and substituting others for them was commenced promptly and was completed during June"; and that the word "power" would be deleted if the AA commercials were to be used again. In accordance with the Commission's request, Williams submitted scripts of television commercials and other promotional materials currently in use.

Shortly thereafter a new ground for controversy arose. Counsel advised the Commission that Williams was test-marketing a new product called FemIron. The Compliance Division asked for the formula and for copies of all current and proposed advertising materials. The company promptly responded, noting that FemIron was a food supplement, not a drug or tonic; that it did not contain vitamins, as Geritol does; that it was intended not to treat iron deficiency but merely to provide a supplemental source of iron for women in the child-bearing years. The letter suggested that for these reasons FemIron was not within the provisions of the cease and desist order making the order applicable not only to Geritol but to "any other preparation of substantially similar composition or possessing substantially similar properties, under whatever name or names sold." On July 16, a member of the Division of Compliance responded, indicating that the Commission's Division of Scientific Opinions believed that FemIron and Geritol possessed substantially similar properties. The letter indicated that the Commission would consider FemIron's status, whether the FemIron advertising violated the order, and, if so, "what action should be taken." On September 3 the FTC formally rejected the third compliance report. The Commission concluded that several of the Geritol commercials violated the cease and desist order and that FemIron was subject to the order. The letter stated an investigation would be made to obtain evidence of violations "for use in possible enforcement proceedings."

[3] The Chief of the Compliance Division stated he was instructed to advise that Commissioner Elman dissented "from the foregoing action."

[5] On June 25 the Commission issued a formal statement, from which Commissioners Elman and Nicholson dissented. The former had filed an opinion arguing that the Commission should have requested the Attorney General to file an action for civil penalties.

The draft complaint which the FTC submitted to the Attorney General and the complaint which he subsequently filed alleged violations of three different types. Counts 1 through 4 related to the use of several of the AA commercials, without deletion of the word "power", between June 10 and June 20, 1969. Treating each day's exhibition of a different commercial as the unit of violation, the draft complaint sought penalties under these counts totaling $80,000; the final complaint sought that sum from each defendant. Counts 5–9 related to commercials of a new type submitted in the third compliance report, referred to as the "sad-glad" commercials, which were aired at various times between June 2 and September 8, 1969. In Counts 5 through 7 the unit for determining what constituted a violation was the same as in Counts 1 through 4; the penalties sought for these totaled $220,000 from each defendant. However, in Counts 8 and 9 the complaint used a more severe system of calculating penalties. It counted each broadcast, on June 2, 3, 4 and 6, as a separate violation; apparently the reason for the greater severity was that these commer[421]cials used the terms "blood-building power" and "iron power," as the AA commercials had done. The Government demanded penalties of $45,000 from each defendant on these counts. Counts 10 and 11 concerned two different FemIron commercials that were disseminated on various dates between September 2 and October 1. Here the unit of violation reverted to that used in the earlier counts; the penalties against each defendant aggregated $155,000. For all counts the penalties sought were thus $500,000 from each defendant. As stated earlier, the court granted summary judgment for $456,000 against Williams and $356,000 against Parkson. Rather than summarize the court's opinion here, we will discuss each of its rulings in connection with the various points of appeal raised by defendants.

II. Appellants' Sixth Amendment Claims

[1] The district court properly rejected appellants' claim that jury trial was required and summary judgment precluded because an action to recover penalties under § 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act is criminal in nature.

In many instances Congress has provided, as a sanction for the violation of a statute, a remedy consisting only of civil penalties or forfeitures; in others it has provided the usual criminal sanctions of a fine, imprisonment or both; in still others it has provided both criminal and civil sanctions. When Congress has characterized the remedy as civil and the only consequence of a judgment for the Government is a money penalty, the courts have taken Congress at its word. This seems to us the clear intendment of Hepner v. United States, 231 U.S. 103, 29 S. Ct. 474, 53 L. Ed. 720 (1909); United States v. Regan, 232 U.S. 37, 34 S. Ct. 213, 58 L. Ed. 494 (1914), and Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U.S. 391, 398–405, 58 S. Ct. 630, 82 L. Ed. 917 (1938). Cf. United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d 688, 693 (2 Cir. 1966).

Appellants urge us to overlook Congress' express characterization of § 5(l) as a "civil" action and to hold the sanction imposed in this case criminal because of its allegedly punitive purpose. While Congress could not permissibly undermine constitutional protections simply by appending the "civil" label to traditionally criminal provisions, the statute here at issue is plainly not of that class. In the face of a long line of contrary authority, appellants have not directed our attention to any civil penalty provision that has been held sufficiently "criminal" in nature to invoke the protections of the Sixth Amendment.[6] Although appellants insist that the large size of the judgment entered below could have served no legitimate civil purpose, that argument is more fittingly addressed to the question whether the district court abused its discretion in assessing such a large penalty, see part VIII, infra.

III. Appellants' Right to a Civil Jury Trial of Disputed Issues of Fact

Appellants argue in the alternative that they were entitled to a jury trial under F.R.Civ.P. 38(a) which preserves inviolate "[t]he right of trial by jury as declared by the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution or as given by a statute of the United States." That claim would, of course, be academic if, as the district court held, there were no triable issues of fact. Hepner v. United States, supra, 213 U.S. at 112–115. Since, for reasons detailed in the following section of this opinion, we hold that there were triable fact questions and a remand will thus be required, it is convenient to deal with the civil jury trial issue here.[7]

[6] Whatever doubts lower courts may have had about the quasi-criminal nature of the early penalty clauses in various railroad regulation statutes, see part III, infra, were resolved in Hepner v. United States, supra, and Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry. v. United States, 220 U.S. 559, 578, 31 S. Ct. 612, 55 L. Ed. 582 (1911).

[422] Apparently there is only one reported decision where a court has squarely faced this question under § 5(l) of the FTC Act. In United States v. Hindman, 179 F. Supp. 926 (D.N.J. 1960), the court held that the defendant in a civil penalty suit under § 5(l) has a right to have a jury determine whether he has violated the terms of an FTC order when there is a triable dispute on that question. Against this is dictum from a Third Circuit decision, United States v. Vulcanized Rubber & Plastics Co., 288 F. 2d 257, 258–259 n. 2 (3 Cir.), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 821, 82 S. Ct. 38, 7 L. Ed. 2d 26 (1961). The Vulcanized Rubber court affirmed a district court's grant of summary judgment to the Government in a § 5(l) case where, as the court of appeals held, "there was no issue of fact presented." However, in a footnote dictum two judges branded Hindman as erroneous. The criticism was based on two grounds: (1) that "the sole issue before the court [in Hindman] was whether or not the labeling practice was within the proscription of the order and not whether the labeling practice was deceptive," and (2) that "creating an issue of fact as the court did in Hindman, would usurp the function exclusively vested by Congress in the Federal Trade Commission to determine the issue of whether a labeling practice is misleading or deceptive to the public." While the first proposition is true enough in itself, it manifests some confusion. The district judge in Hindman fully agreed that the only issue before him was whether the order covered the practice in question; as to that issue he held that there was a triable factual dispute.[8] The second proposition seems unsound as applied to enforcement proceedings unless Congress has vested the FTC with power not only to make orders but to determine whether they have been violated—a position which was not taken by the Government although it is approximated by the dissent. No decision has ever intimated such a view. In FTC v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U.S. 37, 54, 68 S. Ct. 822, 832, 92 L. Ed. 1196 (1948), while insisting that the Commission has power to determine all issues essential to the issuance of an order subject only to judicial review on a substantial evidence standard, the Supreme Court recognized that "the enforcement responsibility of the courts, once a Commission order has become final either by lapse of time or by court approval, 15 U.S.C. §§ 21, 45, is to adjudicate questions concerning the order's violation . . ." Nothing was said in Morton Salt to indicate that the court's adjudication of violations of FTC orders, whether in contempt proceedings in a court of appeals or in penalty actions under § 21(l) or 45(l) in a district court, was to be more trammeled than in any other case where a court is given plenary powers of adjudication as distinguished from review of administrative action—much less, as was seemingly indicated in the Vulcanized Rubber dictum, that the Commission's determination was conclusive. In any event a district court decision and a dictum of two judges of the court of appeals of another circuit adversely reflecting upon it are scarcely dispositive either way, and thorough examination of the problem is thus in order.

[7] It is not altogether clear whether Judge Motley decided this issue. At one point she said, 354 F. Supp. at 529, that "precedents in both the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals for this circuit convince the court that the instant action is so analogous to a civil contempt proceeding that no jury trial can or should be required here." But later, 354 F. Supp. at 533 n. 6, after referring back to this passage, she stated, "In any case, the court need not reach this question, since the court holds infra that no dispute of material fact remains to be resolved."

[8] Professor Jaffe suggests that the court of appeals thus misunderstood what the district court had done in Hindman. He states, Judicial Control of Administrative Action 319 n. 237 (1965):

> The jury was to decide whether in the opinion of purchasers the questioned phrase meant the same thing as the proscribed one. Who better than a lay customer to decide?

[2] There can be no doubt that in general "there is a right of jury trial when the United States sues . . . [423] to collect a penalty, even though the statute is silent on the right of jury trial," 5 Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 38.31[1], at 232–33 (1971 ed.). The leading case supporting this proposition is Hepner v. United States, supra, 213 U.S. at 115, where the Court had no difficulty in concluding that in an action to collect a $1,000 penalty assessed for a violation of the Alien Immigration Act, "[t]he defendant was, of course, entitled to have a jury summoned." See also United States v. Regan, supra, 232 U.S. at 43–44, 47.

Many cases, arising under a broad range of other civil penalty and forfeiture provisions, have reached the same conclusion. In The Sarah, 8 Wheat. 391, 21 U.S. 391, 5 L. Ed. 644 (1823), the Court held that when goods were seized on land, a statutory libel of information entitled the defendant to a jury trial. The Court has consistently held since then that forfeitures occurring on land are civil actions at law, entitling the parties to a jury unless it was waived. United States v. Winchester, 99 U.S. 372, 374, 25 L. Ed. 479 (1878); 443 Cans of Frozen Egg Product v. United States, 226 U.S. 172, 183, 57 L. Ed. 174 (1912); C. J. Hendry Co. v. Moore, 318 U.S. 133, 153, 63 S. Ct. 499, 87 L. Ed. 663 (1943). Similarly, actions for statutory penalties have been held to entail a right to jury trial, even though the statute is silent,[9] both where the amount of the penalty was fixed and where it was subject to the discretion of the court, see, e.g., Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. v. United States, 178 F. 12 (8 Cir. 1910) (28-hour law); Connolly v. United States, 149 F. 2d 666 (9 Cir. 1945) (penalty under 25 U.S.C. § 179); United States v. Jepson, 90 F. Supp. 983, 984–986 (D.N.J. 1950) (Emergency Price Control Act of 1942); United States v. Friedland, 94 F. Supp. 721 (D. Conn. 1950) (Housing and Rent Act of 1947); United States ex rel. Rodriguez v. Weekly Publications, 9 F.R.D. 179 (S.D.N.Y. 1949) (qui tam action to recover statutory penalty for making a false claim against the Government).[10] Nothing to the contrary was determined in Wirtz v. Jones, 340 F. 2d 901, 904–905 (5 Cir. 1965), on which the Government relies. There the court, speaking through our brother Anderson, held that, despite decisions that suits by employees or by the Secretary of Labor at their request under § 16 (b) and (c) of the Fair Labor Standards Act for minimum wages and overtime pay entailed the right to jury trial, a different result ensued when the Secretary of Labor sued under § 17 "to restrain violations of section 15 of this title, including in the case of violations of section 15(a)(2) of this title the restraint of [424] any withholding of payment of minimum wages or overtime compensation found by the court to be due to employees under this chapter." Congress having made its intentions to have a court trial entirely clear, the court stated that "[t]he Seventh Amendment does not require Congress to blunt the most competent means of insuring general compliance with a key section of the Act by depriving the equity courts of a significant part of their inherent power."

[9] The cases since the adoption of the Federal Rules generally do not discuss whether the right accrues under the provision of F.R. Civ. P. 38(a) relating to the Seventh Amendment or the provision relating to a statute. This is natural in light of the settled principle that "although a federal statute may not in express terms provide for a jury trial, it may create a cause of action, essentially legal, with an attendant right of trial by jury." See 5 Moore, Federal Practice ¶ 38.12, at 128.25 & n. 10 (1971). In that event the courts imply an intention to allow jury trial, see Damsky v. Zavatt, 289 F. 2d 46, 52 (2 Cir. 1961).

In Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 94 S. Ct. 1005, 1008, 39 L. Ed. 2d 260, 42 U.S.L.W. 4259, 4261 (1974), the Supreme Court recently gave broad scope to the entitlement to a jury trial in actions for the enforcement of rights provided by twentieth-century statutes. The Court there held that the Seventh Amendment applies to actions for damages under § 812 of the 1968 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 3612, reasoning that the right to jury trial attaches generally to actions enforcing statutory rights, "if the statute creates legal rights and remedies, enforceable in an action for damages in the ordinary courts of law." The statute there in question provided that "[t]he court may grant as relief, as it deems appropriate, any permanent or temporary injunction, temporary restraining order, or other order, and may award to the plaintiff actual damages and not more than $1,000 punitive damages, together with court costs and reasonable attorney fees." Although the Court found the language and the legislative history of the statute ambiguous, it held the mandate of the Seventh Amendment squarely applicable. Administrative adjudications such as NLRB backpay awards are distinguishable, the Court wrote, because in administrative proceedings "jury trials would be incompatible with the whole concept of administrative adjudication and would substantially interfere with the [agency's] role in the statutory scheme." When the district court rather than the agency is assigned the adjudicative responsibility, however, and there is "obviously no functional justification for denying the jury trial right, a jury trial must be available if the action involves rights and remedies of the sort typically enforced in an action at law." [11]

[10] Several of these cases were cited by this court in Damsky v. Zavatt, supra, 289 F. 2d at 51, in support of the proposition that "The right to jury trial exists in actions by the United States where it would in a similar action between private parties."

There is some contrary district court authority under the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, Creedon v. Arielly, 8 F.R.D. 265, 268 (W.D.N.Y. 1948), and the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, United States v. Shaughnessy, 86 F. Supp. 175 (D. Mass. 1949); United States v. Friedman, 89 F. Supp. 957, 961 (S.D. Iowa 1950). However, these cases and the reasoning behind them have been sharply criticized, see 5 Moore, Federal Practice ¶¶ 38.11 [7], at 128.2, 38.37 [1], at 307–08 & nn. 11, 13; Tanimura v. United States, 195 F. 2d 329 (9 Cir. 1952); Leimer v. Woods, 196 F. 2d 828 (8 Cir. 1952); United States v. Hart, 86 F. Supp. 787 (E.D. Va. 1949); United States v. Strymish, 86 F. Supp. 999 (D. Mass. 1949); United States v. Mesna, 11 F.R.D. 86 (D. Minn. 1950); cf. Porter v. Warner Holding Co., 328 U.S. 395, 401–402, 66 S. Ct. 1086, 90 L. Ed. 1332 (1946).

[3] Not being able seriously to dispute that an action to recover a statutory penalty generally carries the right to a jury trial, the Government seeks to distinguish an action under § 5(l) because the penalties are collected for violation not of a statute but of an order of an administrative agency.[12] It is common ground that jury trial would not have been required if the FTC had sought an order of civil contempt in the Sixth Circuit.[13] The Government argues that § 5(l) was intended simply to provide an alternative means of enforcement and thus should not be read to invoke different procedures.[14] A short and

[11] Still further support for our position is found in the Supreme Court's decision in Pernell v. Southall Realty, 416 U.S. 363, 94 S. Ct. 1723, 40 L. Ed. 2d 198 (1974). The Court noted that while Congress could have chosen to entrust landlord-tenant disputes "to an administrative agency," it instead provided that those disputes should be brought "as ordinary civil actions"; accordingly, the Court held, the Seventh Amendment required that a jury trial be available on demand. Section 5(l) of the FTC Act provides for just such a "civil action."

[12] We put it this way rather than "order of a court", see 15 U.S.C. § 45(c) ["To the extent that the order of the Commission is affirmed, the court shall thereupon issue its own order commanding obedience to the terms of such order of the Commission"], because § 5(l) applies equally when a FTC order becomes effective through failure of the aggrieved party to seek review.

[13] Very likely this would also be true in a proceeding for criminal contempt unless the Government sought imprisonment of more than six months. See Cheff v. Schnackenberg, 384 U.S. 373, 86 S. Ct. 1523, 16 L. Ed. 2d 629 (1966).

[14] We cannot forbear an expression of wry amusement at the Government's statement "that Congress did not require the Government to bring a proceeding before the already overburdened Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals." We are at a loss to understand how judicial loads were in any way lessened by the Government's bringing a proceeding which must have required a great many hours of study by a busy district judge and has demanded many more by a court of appeals quite as "overburdened" as the Sixth Circuit, which already was familiar with the case and could have proceeded without being obliged to consider most of the difficult questions here presented.

probably sufficient answer would be that if in [425] authorizing a civil suit by the chief law officer of the Government, a procedure which had always been thought to entail a right of jury trial, Congress had wished to withhold it (assuming arguendo that it could), Congress would have said so in unmistakable terms and not left this as a secret to be discovered many years later. At the very least, such a conclusion would require evidence in the legislative history that Congress intended the procedure under § 5(l) to be the same as in a civil contempt proceeding. A study of the development of the civil penalty provision in the FTC Act suggests just the opposite.

Section 5(l) was part of the Wheeler-Lea Act of 1938, 52 Stat. 111, which amended the original Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914. The Wheeler-Lea Act was directed mainly at extending the Commission's authority to reach all unfair and deceptive practices whether or not they had an anticompetitive effect, thereby overruling the restrictive interpretation given to the 1914 act in FTC v. Raladam Co., 283 U.S. 643, 51 S. Ct. 587, 75 L. Ed. 1324 (1931). In addition, the 1938 amendments added a number of provisions intended to make the FTC's orders more effective. They provided that an FTC order would become final either after review and approval by a court of appeals or after the time for seeking review had expired, § 5(g); the Commission would no longer be required to prove a second violation before obtaining judicial enforcement of its order. In addition, the Wheeler-Lea Act empowered the reviewing court to issue an injunction pendente lite to prevent harm to the public, § 5(c); it established criminal penalties for violation of the statute under certain limited circumstances, § 14 (a); and it enabled the Commission to cause the institution of an action to recover a civil penalty for violation of the Commission's final orders, §§ 5(l), 16. The civil penalty provision was devised to complement the circuit court's contempt power, which had previously been the sole means of remedying violations. If the party sought review of the Commission's order in the court of appeals and the order was enforced there, the Commission could seek to remedy any subsequent violation of the order either through contempt proceedings before the court that enforced the order or through an action for recovery of the Civil penalty. If the party did not contest the order by seeking review in the court of appeals, the Commission's sole civil remedy for any subsequent violation would be through the penalty action.

The Wheeler-Lea bill underwent a number of false starts before it was finally enacted in 1938. The first version, S. 994, 74th Cong., 1st Sess., which was introduced in 1935, contained only the germ of the ultimate Act—it did nothing more than extend the FTC's authority to include unfair or deceptive practices in or affecting commerce, whether or not they adversely affected competition. That bill died on the Senate calendar. By the next year, the bill had grown to approximately its final size, with the addition of many of the procedural revisions that survived to enactment. That bill, S. 3744, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. (1936), contained a civil penalty clause roughly similar to the one ultimately enacted, although the penalties were much smaller and were set as fixed sums. According to that provision, after the Commission's order had become final any violation of the order would subject the offender to "a penalty of $500 for each such offense and of $25 for each day it continues, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States." After passing the Senate, 80 Cong. Rec. 6603 (May 4, 1936), the bill died in the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Two [426] companion and successor bills, H.R. 10385, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. (1936), and H.R. 3143, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. (1937), also died in committee. Finally, a parallel House bill was proposed, H.R. 5854, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. (1937), which contained language very similar to that finally adopted, but provided variable rather than fixed penalties. For violation of a final order, the penalty clause in that bill would have required a violator to "forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $1000 and of not more than $50 for each day such failure continues, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States." This bill also died in committee. Finally, in 1938 the sponsors introduced S. 1077, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., the bill that was ultimately enacted. The first version of S. 1077, however, contained the earlier civil penalty clause providing for a flat $500 penalty and an additional penalty of $25 per day for violation of Commission orders. See S. Rep. No. 221, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. (1937). The House Committee objected, apparently considering the penalty too small, and substituted its own version, H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. (1937). Under the House proposal, the maximum penalty would be $5000, but the court could assess lower penalties if the circumstances warranted. The conference committee adopted the House's version without comment, H. Rep. No. 1774, 75th Cong., 3d Sess. (1938), and in that form S. 1077 became law.

The principal debate about § 5(l) occurred in the House of Representatives between the bill's sponsor, Representative Lea, and Representative Kenney, who was urging that the bill be amended to include additional penalties, 83 Cong. Rec. 405–06 (Jan. 12, 1938). Representative Kenney's proposal would have provided for a flat $3000 civil penalty to be imposed on anyone violating § 12, the advertising section of the Act. Representative Lea objected to such a penalty on the basis that it would clog the courts and that it would risk punishing businessmen who inadvertently violated the law but were willing to conform if their violation was pointed out to them by the Commission. "The man with good intentions," Representative Lea remarked, "should not be penalized before he has had a chance to correct his mistake." 83 Cong. Rec. 392. Later in the debate, Representative Lea commented that the proposal to impose a civil penalty directly for violation of the statute "is not the practical way to deal with businessmen. This is going to destroy the principal virtue of the Federal Trade Commission procedure, which is to give the honest businessman a chance to adjust his difference without harassing him or bringing him into court, with the expense involved by such proceedings." 83 Cong. Rec. 406. Representative Halleck was of a similar view, 83 Cong. Rec. 401:

> The very fact that broad language is used [in the statute] should indicate to all of us, it seems to me, that we should not in every case inflict a criminal penalty or a civil penalty of a $3000 fine upon any person who happens unintentionally to violate the act. It is my idea that the committee had in mind when drafting this penalty clause the fact, which I think is clearly evident, that honest business people who are trying to operate honestly and within the law may inadvertently violate provisions of this bill. Certainly those people should not be prosecuted, hauled into Federal court and immediately subjected to the criminal prosecution urged here by some.

We see nothing in any of this to indicate that, in utilizing the historic remedy of a civil penalty for violations of FTC orders, including orders that had become final without having been affirmed by a court, Congress intended to strip the remedy of any of its traditional accoutrements, including the right to a jury trial of fairly disputed issues of fact—not, of course, as to the validity of the order but as to the fact of violation. Congress gravitated between small fixed penalties and a large maximum penalty, [427] apparently without any thought that the difference would have any effect on the procedure to be followed in enforcement actions.[15] If there is a word in the three years of legislative history suggesting that procedure under this penalty statute should differ from that which had been recognized in governmental forfeiture and penalty suits for over a century, we have not found it.

The conclusion that Congress did not intend a change in established practice is fortified by another bit of evidence. In both the reports and the debates, the sponsors of the Wheeler-Lea bill represented that the civil penalty provision was modeled on a similar provision in the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. See S. Rep. No. 1705, 74th Cong. 2d Sess. 7 (1936); H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong. 1st Sess. 4

[15] The Government attempts to distinguish Hepner v. United States, supra, on the ground that it involved a fixed penalty, while § 5(l) permits the district judge to determine the proper penalty up to a statutory maximum. The legislative background, however, demonstrates that Congress replaced the proposed fixed penalty with a variable one in order to give the penalty provision more flexibility, not to avoid the requirement of a jury trial.

(1937); 80 Cong. Rec. 6594 (1936) (Sen. Wheeler); 83 Cong. Rec. 397 (1938) (Rep. Reece). The provision in the Packers and Stockyards Act is clearly criminal and would thus ensure the defendant of a jury trial on demand. Although the dissent argues that the reference to the Packers and Stockyards Act constitutes only a "general reference to the fact that criminal sanctions were included in the Wheeler-Lea Amendments," that section was repeatedly cited as a model for § 5(l). In addition, the sponsors referred to a "similar provision" in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, on which § 5(l) was modeled, 83 Cong. Rec. 397 (1938) (Rep. Reece). Despite the dissent's argument that the reference to the Securities Exchange Act was to the general review provisions, 15 U.S.C. § 78y(b), these would be so clearly irrelevant as to compel a conclusion that the reference was rather to the civil penalty provision, 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(b), added in 1936, establishing a $100 per day statutory penalty for any issuer of stock who failed to file with the Commission the information required in § 15(d) of the Act. Since it is incontrovertible that, under the Hepner line of cases, an issuer who denied liability would be entitled to a jury trial, this affords further evidence that the framers of the Wheeler-Lea amendments were not proposing anything different under § 5(l). A much older and more detailed model for § 5(l) was the civil penalty provision of the Hepburn Act of 1906, 49 U.S.C. § 16(8), which added to the Interstate Commerce Act a provision with language strikingly similar to § 5 (l):

> Any carrier, any officer, representative, or agent of a carrier . . . who knowingly fails or neglects to obey any order made under the provisions of sections 3, 13, or 15 of this title shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $5,000 for each offense. Every distinct violation shall be a separate offense, and in case of a continuing violation each day shall be deemed a separate offense.

The following section, 49 U.S.C. § 16(9) provides that the forfeiture shall be payable to the United States, and "shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States." While the question of jury trial under § 16(8) seems not to have arisen, courts applying similar civil penalty provisions in other contemporaneous railroad regulation statutes have granted jury trials without even questioning their availability. See, e.g., United States v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry., 163 F. 517 (8 Cir. 1908) (Safety Appliance Act); Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. v. United States, 178 F. 12 (8 Cir. 1910) (28-hour law); United States v. Great Northern Ry., 220 F. 630, 136 C.C.A. 238 (7 Cir. 1915) (Hours of Service Law); United States v. Kansas City Southern Ry., 202 F. 828, 835, 121 C.C.A. 136 (8 Cir. 1913) [428] (Hours of Service Law); United States v. Northern Pacific Ry., 293 F. 657 (9 Cir. 1924) (Safety Appliance Act). It is hard to believe that at a time, before the Hepner decision, when the courts were having difficulty in concluding that penalty provisions were not actually criminal in nature, see Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 117 F. 462, 54 C.C.A. 508 (8 Cir. 1902), rev'd on other grounds, 196 U.S. 1, 25 S. Ct. 158, 49 L. Ed. 363 (1904); Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. v. United States, 172 F. 194 (7 Cir. 1909); United States v. Illinois Central R. R., 156 F. 182 (W.D. Ky. 1907), rev'd, 170 F. 542 (6 Cir.), cert. denied, 214 U.S. 520, 29 S. Ct. 700, 53 L. Ed. 1066 (1909), the civil penalty provision in § 16(8) of the Interstate Commerce Act was intended to deprive the defendant not only of his Sixth Amendment right to jury trial but of his Seventh Amendment right as well. Indeed, in the provision of the Hepburn Act for the enforcement of reparation orders, § 16(2), Congress had not gone further than to render the order prima facie evidence in an action where the defendant clearly had a right to jury trial, and the opinion sustaining this made it extremely doubtful the Court would have approved anything more drastic. See Meeker v. Lehigh Valley R.R., 236 U.S. 412, 430–431, 35 S. Ct. 328, 59 L. Ed. 644 (1915).

Subsequent congressional enactments have shed no more light on the problem. In 1959 Congress extended the streamlined enforcement mechanism of the FTC Act to the Clayton Act. In revising § 11 of the Clayton Act, Congress followed the model of the Wheeler-Lea amendments almost to the letter, including the civil penalty provision, which became 15 U.S.C. § 21(l). As in the case of § 5(l), Congress apparently did not expressly confront the jury trial question, although in United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F. Supp. 104, 111 (D. Minn. 1972), aff'd, 493 F. 2d 1259 (8 Cir. 1974), Judge Neville seemed to assume that factual disputes in penalty proceedings under both the Clayton Act and the FTC Act could be tried to a jury. Similarly, in amending § 5(l) last year, see note 1, supra, Congress gave no indication that it had ever intended the civil penalty provision to deny a jury trial when the fact of violation was fairly disputed.

[4] The dissent argues that according a jury trial would be inappropriate in a § 5(l) proceeding, citing one of the three factors referred to a footnote in Ross v. Bernhard, 396 U.S. 531, 538 n. 10, 90 S. Ct. 733, 738, 24 L. Ed. 2d 729 (1970), "the practical abilities and limitations of juries." The argument is that allowing a jury trial of disputed issues of fact would interfere with according appropriate deference to the FTC's determination that a violation had occurred. Reference is made to the recognized principle that much weight is to be given the judgment of the FTC in framing remedial orders, e.g., FTC v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 429, 77 S. Ct. 502, 1 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1957); FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 385, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 13

L. Ed 2d 904 (1965), a principle which, of course, is in no way unique to that agency, see, e.g., Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 198, 61 S. Ct. 845, 85 L. Ed. 1271 (1941); American Power & Light Co. v. SEC, 329 U.S. 90, 115, 118, 67 S. Ct. 133, 91 L. Ed. 103 (1946); NLRB v. Seven-up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346–350, 73 S. Ct. 287, 97 L. Ed. 377 (1953); NLRB v. J. H. Rutter-Rex Manufacturing Co., 396 U.S. 258, 263, 90 S. Ct. 417, 24 L. Ed. 2d 405 (1969).

[5–7] The first point in response is that the footnote in Ross v. Bernhard was part of an argument for applying the Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial where it had not been recognized before the merger of law and equity—not a suggestion that a type of statute which had uniformly been held to carry the right of jury trial should now be construed to eliminate it. A second is that while "the practical abilities and limitations of juries" may present problems in a complex action of accounting, see Dairy Queen v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469, [429] 478, 82 S. Ct. 894, 8 L. Ed. 2d 44 (1962), or in estimating damages awarded in lieu of the injunction in an intricate securities suit, see Crane Co. v. American Standard, Inc., 490 F. 2d 332, at 343–345 (2 Cir. 1973), those problems do not arise when the jury is asked to determine only whether a television commercial has made various forbidden representations. In any event, the "limitations of juries" is only one of three factors mentioned in the footnote, and the two others, custom before the merger of law and equity, and "the remedy sought," here point strongly toward jury trial. A third answer to the dissent is that its argument proves too much; many actions under § 5(l) could present the most elementary factual questions, such as whether the defendant did or did not commit the acts charged (e.g., if defendants here contended that a television station had broadcast commercials in the face of their disapproval.) These issues are the very sort which juries are traditionally called on to resolve.[16] But the fundamental failing in the argument is that Congress has not required deference to an agency's claim that its order has been violated, NLRB v. Dell, 309 F. 2d 867 (5 Cir. 1962) (Tuttle, Chief Judge); indeed, in contempt proceedings the burden on an agency claiming a violation is not the burden usual in civil cases but that of demonstrating a violation by "clear and convincing evidence," NLRB v. Local 282, Teamsters, 428 F. 2d

---

[16] The district judge seemed to recognize that factual questions such as these would call for a jury. She cited two § 5(l) cases from the District of Maryland in which juries had been empanelled, United States v. Americana Corp., Civ. No. 10858 (D. Md. 1960); United States v. Fire Safety Devices, Civ. No. 13254 (D. Md. 1962). She distinguished those cases, on the ground that "they involved the factual question of what oral representations were made by employees of the companies being sued. . . . Here, in contrast, the actual advertisements sued upon are before the court and their dissemination is undisputed." 354 F. Supp. at 533 n. 7. However, when there is a right to a jury trial, it extends to all kinds of questions of fact, not simply to some.

994, 1001–1002 (2 Cir. 1970); NLRB v. Local 825, Operating Engineers, 430 F. 2d 1225, 1229–1230 (3 Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 976, 91 S. Ct. 1200, 28 L. Ed. 2d 326 (1971). While Congress placed the usual substantial evidence rule in § 5(c) of the FTC Act, dealing with judicial review of orders, it made no similar provision in § 5(l) with respect to determining the fact of violation.

This court's statement in United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., supra, 355 F. 2d at 693, that "[t]he duty and responsibility for determining what business practices fall within the purview of Section 5 and for determining whether cease and desist orders issued to eliminate the anti-competitive effects of those practices have been complied with or violated was delegated solely to the FTC," must be read in context. The court was there discussing the division of authority between the Commission and the Attorney General, not the division of authority between the Commission and the judiciary. The next sentence in the opinion makes this abundantly clear:

> While one objective of the 1938 Wheeler-Lea amendment, including Section 5(l), was to "streamline" the procedure for enforcing the Commission's cease and desist orders, it is nowhere indicated that Congress by providing a civil penalty enforcement procedure intended to transfer the responsibility for interpreting and investigating violations of such orders to the Attorney General.

[8] The court was not saying that the FTC was to be judge as well as prosecutor or even that its ex parte determination of violation was entitled to weight in an adjudication proceeding before a court.[17] Initiation of proceedings [430] under § 5(l) does not give the Commission's request a force it would not have in a petition for contempt. That being so, we see no practical difficulty in having a jury decide what television commercials mean—a task for which they have more experience than most judges. See Jaffee, supra note 8. Perhaps it would be wiser for Congress to allow the FTC to impose penalties for violations of its orders, subject to limited judicial review, as it has done in some other cases, see, e.g., § 271 of the Immigration and Nationality

[17] We fail to see what support for the dissent can be found in either Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F. 2d 986 (D.C. Cir. 1973), or Farmington Dowel Prods. Co. v. Forster Mfg. Co., 421 F. 2d 61 (1 Cir. 1970). In Holloway, the court refused to imply a private right of action to enforce the unfair or deceptive practices sections of the FTC Act. There is virtually no discussion of § 5(l), and nothing in the court's opinion suggests that the Act should be read to bar a jury trial in a civil penalty suit. The dissent refers to a passage in which Judge Leventhal notes that the "substantive prohibitions of the statute are inextricably intertwined with provisions defining the powers and duties of [the FTC, which is] charged with its enforcement." 485 F. 2d at 989, but we see nothing in that excerpt either alone or in context to suggest that the FTC's conclusion that a defendant has violated a final cease and desist order should be given controlling weight in a § 5(l) proceeding. Similarly, the excerpt quoted from the Farmington Dowel case, 421 F. 2d at 75, simply recites the settled principle that a defendant in a civil penalty suit cannot collaterally attack the validity of the underlying cease and desist order—a principle which we unqualifiedly accept despite the many contrary intimations in the dissent.

Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1321,[18] predecessors of which were held valid in Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U.S. 320, 29 S. Ct. 671, 53 L. Ed. 1013 (1909), and Lloyd Sabaudo Societa v. Elting, 287 U.S. 329, 53 S. Ct. 167, 77 L. Ed. 341 (1932). What is decisive is that, with that avenue known to be open, and with the Supreme Court having just sustained the provision in the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 authorizing the NLRB to award back pay, NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 48, 57 S. Ct. 615, 81 L. Ed. 893 (1937), Congress in enacting § 5(l) took a course that had been uniformly held to entail a right to jury trial although, of course, only when there was a fair dispute over the fact of violation.

IV. The Existence of Triable Issues of Fact

[9, 10] As noted above, defendants' right to jury trial under F.R. Civ. P. 38(a) would be without consequence for this case if, as the district court held, the Government's suit presented no triable issues of fact.[19] Determination of this question requires consideration of the nature of the issues presented and the proofs submitted.

The issues are of two somewhat different types. One is whether the commercials in question violated the cease and desist order. The other is whether FemIron was within the reach of the order, which applied to "any other preparation of substantially similar composition or possessing substantially similar properties, under whatever name or names sold." The district court held both to be questions of law, 354 F. Supp. at 532, 535.

[11] In actuality both inquiries involve a two-step process—determining [431] what the order means, concededly a task for the court, and deciding whether the accused commercials or product come within the order as so construed. As we said in Artvale, Inc. v. Rugby Fabrics Corp., 363 F. 2d 1002, 1005 (2 Cir. 1966), "[t]he common approach seeking to dichotomize all decisions as either 'law' or 'fact' is too sim-

[19] Since we hold that several of the counts presented triable issues of fact, we would be bound to reverse the award of summary judgment even if jury trial were not required, see 6 Moore, Federal Practice, ¶ 56.02 [7], at 2040 (1972). The difference would simply be that the trial would be to a judge.

There is no question that under F.R. Civ. P. 56, whether in a jury trial or a trial to the court, the party opposing the summary judgment motion has a right to a full evidentiary hearing on all genuine issues of material fact. In a bench trial, this means that if the party opposing summary judgment raises any triable fact questions, he has the right to adduce the expert testimony of live witnesses and cross-examine his opponent's witnesses rather than to have to rely on the affidavits submitted in opposition to the summary judgment motion. Colby v. Klune, 178 F. 2d 872, 873–874 (2 Cir. 1949); Hycon Manufacturing Co. v. H. Koch & Sons, 219 F. 2d 353, 355 (9 Cir.), cert. denied, 349 U.S. 953, 75 S. Ct. 881, 99 L. Ed. 1278 (1955); Hanley v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 433 F. 2d 708, 711 (10 Cir. 1970).

plistic." See also In re Hygrade Envelope Corp., 366 F. 2d 584, 588 (2 Cir. 1966). The different stance of the two issues here stems in part from the fact that with respect to the commercials there is no dispute concerning the meaning of the order; the commercials would clearly be in violation, for lack of the required affirmative statement as to the small proportion of people who suffer from iron deficiency, if they conveyed the impression that Geritol (or FemIron if within the order) would be beneficial generally for relief of tiredness, etc. That issue thus involved less and the FemIron issue more of what a court can determine better than a jury, perhaps about the only satisfactory criterion for distinguishing "law" from "fact." See Traynor, J., dissenting in Loper v. Morrison, 23 Cal. 2d 600, 611–612, 145 P. 2d 1, 6–7 (1944).

[12, 13] In determining whether the order applied to FemIron, the court was justified in giving a broad reading to the words "or any other preparation [of substantially similar composition or] possessing substantially similar properties," 354 F. Supp. at 531. The order must be interpreted in light of its principal purpose, namely, to prevent the company from representing that a product useful only in overcoming problems arising from insufficient iron in the blood will be efficacious when the same symptoms are due to entirely different causes. The order is to be construed as an instrument to that end, not as a pharmacopoeia. It is undisputed that FemIron does not contain the vitamins present in Geritol and that it contains substantially less iron. Through their experts' affidavits, the defendants urged that because of these differences, FemIron was of only "supplemental" value—it could serve only to prevent iron deficiency—while Geritol was "therapeutic"—it could remedy a current deficiency. These differences, however, are not significant in determining whether FemIron is subject to the order. The very argument that FemIron is too mild to treat the syndrome for which Geritol is intended demonstrates that the major difference between the two products is merely one of dosage. It would be senseless to hold that the defendants can avoid the Commission's order simply by a process of dilution and relabeling. For the purpose of determining whether FemIron was within the reach of the order, the defendants' affidavits were thus inapposite. If anything, the lower concentration of iron in FemIron would render any commercials suggesting that it will relieve tiredness even more misleading than similar Geritol commercials. We agree with the district court that defendants' claim that FemIron was not within the order raised no genuine issue of fact and was appropriately decided in the Government's favor on its motion for summary judgment.

[14–16] On the other hand, while we agree with the court's premise that the FTC did not have the burden of showing that the accused commercials, if within the order, were false and deceptive, we are unable to see how this leads to the conclusion, 354 F. Supp. at 535, that:

> Once the Commission establishes that a cease and desist order is in effect and that a particular advertisement has been disseminated which allegedly violates that order, it is for the court to determine as a matter of law whether the oral and/or visual content of the challenged advertisement falls within the scope of the prohibitions in the order.

The general rule is that when the meaning or effect of words or acts is fairly disputed, the question is for the trier of the facts, to be decided after hearing all material evidence, Washington Post Co. v. Chaloner, 250 U.S. 290, 293, 39 S. Ct. 448, 63 L. Ed. 987 (1919) (libel); Albert Dickinson Co. v. Mellos Peanut Co., 179 [432] F. 2d 265, 269 (7 Cir. 1950) (likelihood of confusion). The district court sought to counter this by saying, 354 F. Supp. at 535 n. 11, that the issue was analogous to the interpretation of a writing in a contract action, which is considered to be an issue of law for the court, citing 4 Williston, Contracts, § 616, particularly at 648–649 (3d ed. 1961). However, we pointed out in Meyers v. Selznick Co., 373 F. 2d 218, 221–223 (2 Cir. 1966), after referring to this very passage in Williston, that "the traditional formulation goes considerably beyond the authorities, at least for the federal courts."[20] In addition, the Restatement of Contracts (Second) § 238(2) (Tent. Draft No. 5, March 1970), rejects the absolute position taken by Williston and states that even in the case of an integrated written agreement, interpretation is to be determined by the trier of fact if it depends on the credibility of extrinsic evidence or on a choice among reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom. In any event, the interpretation of television commercials is not a subject on which a judge can do so much better than jurors that the issue should inevitably be taken from them as one of law. Neither is it an issue which, if triable to a judge, lends itself to summary judgment, unless, of course, the evidence would warrant a directed verdict. See Sartor v. Arkansas Natural Gas Corp., 321 U.S. 620, 624, 64 S. Ct. 724, 88 L. Ed. 967 (1944); Empire Electronics Co. v. United States, 311 F. 2d 175, 180 (2 Cir. 1962); American Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Co. v. American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, Inc., 388 F. 2d 272, 279 (2 Cir. 1967); 6 Moore, Federal Practice ¶¶ 56.02 [10], 56.04 [2], 56.15.

[20] The traditional formulation may well have been founded on the illiteracy of juries and, later, on their inability to understand the complex vocabulary characteristic of many written instruments. See S. Weiner, The Civil Jury Trial and the Law—Fact Distinction, 54 Calif. L. Rev. 1867, 1932 (1966). Such considerations obviously have no application to the viewing of television commercials.

The commercials, which we viewed in the presence of counsel[21] can be divided into three groups: Counts 1–4, the AA commercials; Counts 5–9, the "sad-glad" commercials, with Counts 8 and 9 as a sub-group because of their use of the word "power"; and Counts 10–11, the Fem-Iron commercials. Our consideration of these must be conducted in light of the admonition in FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 393, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 1047, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965):

> If respondents in their subsequent commercials attempt to come as close to the line of misrepresentation as the Commission's order permits, they may without specifically intending to do so cross into the area proscribed by this order. However, it does not seem "unfair to require that one who deliberately goes perilously close to an area of proscribed conduct shall take the risk that he may cross the line." Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 340 [72 S. Ct. 329, 331, 96 L. Ed. 367].

[17, 18] In its letters of May 8 and June 6, the Commission indicated that it found nothing wrong with the AA commercials except that each of them twice used the word "power." The first use was in a statement midway through each commercial that "Geritol-iron enters your bloodstream fast carrying its blood-building power to every part of your body." The second, coming at the end of the commercials, was in the statement that Geritol builds "iron power in your blood." The latter claim seems rather innocent; apparently Geritol is effective in combating iron-poor blood, and the cease and desist order does not prevent Williams from advertising this. The remark that Geritol builds "iron power" in the blood is so far from a representation that it is a generally effective remedy for tiredness that the Commission's objections on this score seem rather baseless. Both the Government [433] and the court below relied more heavily on the earlier remark, that Geritol-iron carried its "blood-building power" to every part of the body. The district court stated, 354 F. Supp. at 537, "[t]o say that Geritol builds power in your blood is the effective equivalent of saying that Geritol builds power in you." While this inference may be conceivable, it certainly is not one that a jury would be compelled to draw. It is settled that on a motion for summary judgment a court must draw the inference most favorable to the party opposing the motion, United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 82 S. Ct. 993, 8 L. Ed. 2d 176 (1962); Cali v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 442 F. 2d 65, 71–72 (2 Cir. 1971).

[19] To our minds the only criticism that can fairly be made of the "blood-building power" phrase is that, taken alone, it did not convey with sufficient clarity that Geritol's "blood-building power" was limited to cases of iron deficiency. However, it is no more proper to take one line of a commercial out of context than it is with any other spoken or written utterance. The whole theme of the AA commercials was that Geritol could remedy "iron-poor blood," and the claim of potency would almost certainly be taken in that sense.[22] The serious question with respect to Counts 1–4 thus is not whether summary judgment in favor of the Government was proper, as we think it clearly was not, but whether the Government is entitled to have them submitted to a jury at all.[23] However, defendants did not move for summary judgment on these counts and, although we could nevertheless direct it, see Abrams v. Occidental Petroleum Corp., 450 F. 2d 157, 165–166 (2 Cir. 1971), aff'd sub nom., Kern County Land Co. v. Occidental Petroleum Corp., 411 U.S. 582, 93 S. Ct. 1736, 36 L. Ed. 2d 503 (1973), we think it preferable to leave to the trial judge whether or not to direct a verdict on these counts in light of the evidence that will be presented.

[20] Counts 5 through 7 involve a commercial entitled "Vacation" and Counts 8 and 9 a commercial entitled "Two Women." The appellants have termed these two commercials their "sad-glad" series. The common theme is of a woman who is "sad" because of having discovered, apparently from a medical examination of some kind, that she has "iron-poor blood." She is told not to be sad on that account but to be glad for Geritol, which can remedy the deficiency. A later sequence shows her to be "glad." [24]

The district court found that these commercials violated the cease and desist order, 354 F. Supp. 539–541, on the following basis:

> Her smile may convey to viewers her happiness that she no longer has iron-poor blood, but it definitely conveys something else as well. It shows her in good spirits and makes her look stronger and healthier. The implication is that she was sad not simply because she had iron-poor blood, but because she was feeling run-down as a result of that fact. Now she is smiling not simply because she has iron-rich blood, but because she feels better as a consequence. Thanks to Geritol.

[434] While that is a possible inference, it is by no means the only one. We must confess we had thought that although the script did not demand the inference drawn by the district court, a viewing might

[22] We see no basis for the district court's conclusion, 354 F. Supp. at 537:

> While the advertisement only speaks of the transformation of a person's blood cells, the advertisement strongly implies that the same transformation from paleness, weakness and deformity to red-bloodedness, strength and shapeliness will take place in the person himself.

[23] The Government makes much of the fact that the FTC had conveyed its objections to use of the word "power" and that defendants had agreed to delete them. But the agreement was expressly without concession and the FTC's assertion that use of this word was a violation did not make it so. Whether Williams' continued use of the word for a few weeks was deliberate or negligent, it is entitled to have the fact of violation determined by a neutral tribunal.

[24] As indicated above, the commercials in Counts 8 and 9 include the phrases "blood-building power" and "iron power." Our discussion of these slogans in reference to Counts 1–4 is equally applicable to the later counts.

well do so. To the contrary, the viewing led us to believe the defendants may well have succeeded in drawing the distinction the order demanded. Whether they did or not is for a jury to determine.

[21] We reach a different conclusion with respect to Counts 10 and 11, relating to the FemIron commercials. Here the scripts did not sufficiently disclose that iron deficiency anemia was not present in most women; in fact they claimed "that many healthy young women have little or no iron reserves," a vice similar to the one the Commission had properly found with respect to the commercials submitted in the first compliance report. The FemIron commercials then noted that "some women even risk becoming anemic and tired," followed by a suggestion to take FemIron and "maintain the supply you need to prevent iron shortage." The plain implication of the audio portion of the commercial was thus that FemIron is an effective remedy for tiredness and anemia—a clear violation of the order. In addition, the scripts for the FemIron commercials each directed that the woman prior to taking FemIron should be depicted as a "Tired Mother"; the woman pictured at the end of the commercial is directed to display a "Vital Look." Our viewing convinced us that the producers of the commercial had succeeded all too well in capturing the forbidden "tired-vigorous" dichotomy. We therefore sustain the grant of summary judgment on these counts.

V. The Requirement of Notice

In the interest of continuity, we have postponed consideration of certain arguments by defendants on the score of lack of advance notice of non-compliance and delay in giving such notice.

[22] Appellants' most extreme argument is that penalties under § 5(l) do not begin to accrue until the defendant has been given notice that he is not in compliance and has had a reasonable time to bring himself into compliance. This contention is based on Continental Baking Co. v. Dixon, 283 F. Supp. 285 (D. Del. 1968), a 1959 statement by the FTC's Assistant General Counsel to a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary which we quoted in United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., supra, 355 F. 2d at 695–696, and a remark by Chairman Dixon during the course of the hearing on the appellants' first compliance report.

We find nothing in § 5(l) or in reason that would require such action by the FTC in every case. The statements by the Assistant General Counsel and by Chairman Dixon, if read literally, would be at variance with a public statement by the Commission, 33 F.R. 19097 (1968), that the obligation of firms to comply arises, and liability for penalties may be incurred, on the effective date of the orders and is not suspended or deferred pending the submission of compliance reports or action thereon. Very likely all that was meant was that, as a matter of good practice, the FTC ordinarily would make some effort to induce compliance before invoking the heavy sanctions of § 5(l). Defendants received a full measure of consideration; indeed, the FTC took the rare step of according them a hearing and argument on the first compliance report. Acceptance of defendants' position would severely hamper the Commission in applying § 5(l) to advertising cases generally, since every determination of non-compliance could be countered with some change in the advertising. Both the Eighth and Ninth Circuits have recently held that the Commission is not required to give notice before bringing suit for civil penalties. United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 493 F. 2d 1259 (8 Cir. 1974); United States v. Berkley, No. 73–1070 (9 Cir. Sept. 5, 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 970, 94 S. Ct. 1992, 40 L. Ed. 2d 558 (1974). Defendants further contend that the Commission nev[435]er actually stated that the AA commercial would be violative of the cease and desist order if the word "power" were left in the scripts. They also claim that the Commission's June 6 letter, with its request for a third compliance report, should be read as allowing appellants a reasonable time to remove the word "power" from the AA commercials that they were broadcasting at the time. However, the May 8 letter adequately conveyed the Commission's view that the AA commercials were unsatisfactory as long as they contained references to "power." The June 6 letter formally assured the appellants that they could safely broadcast the AA commercials without the word "power," but it in no way undercut the effect of the May 8 letter in informing appellants that the word "power" had met with Commission disapproval.

[23, 24] Relying on dictum in United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., No. C–1220 (D. Colo. Aug. 2, 1971) (Winner, J.), aff'd and remanded, 485 F. 2d 16 (10 Cir. 1973), cert. granted, 416 U.S. 968, 94 S. Ct. 1990, 40 L. Ed. 2d 557 (1974), defendants contend as an alternative to the extreme position which we have rejected, that any liability on Counts 5–9 should be limited because, although the third compliance report was filed on July 7, 1969, Williams was given no response until September 5, despite the fact that the letter received on that date was prepared by the staff in July and early August. Appellants further contend that any liability on Counts 10 and 11 should be limited because the Commission never responded to the submission of the FemIron commercials on September 8. We agree with Judge Winner that "it would seem unreasonable to permit the commission to knowingly let daily penalties accrue without giving notice of the commission's position at the earliest reasonable time." The difficulty lies in knowing when that occurs. It is undesirable for courts, unacquainted with the Commission's workload, to lay down lines that would necessarily be arbitrary. Although perhaps a case will arise which is so extreme as to demand judicial intervention, the present is not one.[25] This is particularly true since, as we now hold, the Commission could have demanded even larger penalties than it did.

VI. The $5,000-a-day Limitation

[25] As indicated in the statement of facts, for most of the counts the Commission considered all the broadcasts of a particular commercial on a particular day to constitute a single violation; for Counts 8 and 9, however, it charged that each separate broadcast of the commercial was a separate violation. Appellants object to both methods of calculating violations, and insist that $5,000 a day was the maximum, regardless of the number of different commercials or the number of broadcasts on that day.

The language of the statute, note 1 supra, argues against defendants' position. Although the maximum penalty has since been doubled, the version in effect at the time the complaint was filed imposed a penalty of $5,000 "for each violation" and added that "[e]ach separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense." The "day" concept entered only in a clause dealing with the situation where a defendant commanded to do some affirmative act has failed to do anything at all. Appellants say, with some force, that it is anomalous that a defendant who ignores a mandatory or[436]der of the Commission shall be liable for only $5,000 a day but one who affirmatively violates the order in 30 different places on the same day might be held for $150,000. The answer is that, as developed in the next point, Congress relied on the good sense of the FTC in making its certification to the Attorney General and, failing that, on the discretion of the court to prevent such an outrageous result.

VII. Double Penalties Against Williams and Parkson

Defendants object, on two independent grounds, to the award of duplicate penalties against Williams and Parkson.

[26] In the opinion accompanying the initial cease and desist order, the FTC said of Parkson, 68 F.T.C. at 536 n. 2 (1965), "in practicality

[25] A far more extreme case is United States v. American Greetings Corp., 168 F. Supp. 45, 50 (N.D. Ohio 1958), aff'd on opinion below, 272 F. 2d 945 (6 Cir. 1959). There the Commission remained silent for four years after the defendant filed his compliance report before suing for statutory penalties relating to conduct described in the report. Although the court did not hold that the Commission was estopped to assert that the defendant's practice was a violation of the Commission's cease and desist order, it stated that the Commission's actions were "certainly a circumstance to be considered in ascertaining the amount of the penalty to be imposed for violation of the Order." The court assessed only a nominal penalty for that violation.

it is Williams' advertising division. Parkson is completely owned by the stockholders of Williams and advertising Geritol is 95 percent of its business. The president of Parkson is also the vice-president and advertising director of Williams." An uncontradicted affidavit of the chief executive of Williams alleged that the two companies had the same principal officers; that Parkson acted as the advertising division of Williams and neither sought nor had any significant business for any other company; and that he had final authority over advertising for all Williams' products. A similarly uncontradicted affidavit of Williams' and Parkson's chief financial officer explained the raison d'être of Parkson and the business relations between the two companies as follows: The media offer advertising agencies, whether independent or wholly-owned, a price 15% less than a direct-purchasing sponsor. Williams created Parkson to obtain this lower price. However, instead of retaining part or all the discount as would an independent agency, "Parkson acts solely as an agent of Williams and as a conduit for the payment of Williams' advertising expenditures to the media." The officer added that Williams pays Parkson an amount sufficient to cover Parkson's operational expenses and to provide a profit of some $10,000 a year. Parkson's liquid assets as of June 30, 1971, were put at only $66,098, and its furniture, fixtures and leasehold improvements at $310,369.

The district court held that Parkson must nevertheless be treated as an entity separate from Williams. In so ruling, it relied on the letter of § 5(l) which provides that "[a]ny person, partnership, or corporation who violates an order of the Commission to cease and desist after it has become final" (emphasis supplied) shall be liable for the statutory penalties and the fact that the Sixth Circuit had affirmed the order as to both defendants, 354 F. Supp. at 546.

This is not the way courts have dealt with the problem whether two legally separate corporate entities should be regarded as one. As we said in Bowater S.S. Co. v. Patterson, 303 F. 2d 369, 372–373 (2 Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 860, 83 S. Ct. 116, 9 L. Ed. 2d 98 (1962), citing many cases:

> Whether a subsidiary corporation is to be considered a separate entity "cannot be asked, or answered, in vacuo," Latty, The Corporate Entity as a Solvent of Legal Problems, 34 Mich. L. Rev. 597, 603 (1936); the issues in each case must be resolved in the light of the policy underlying the applicable legal rule, whether of statute or common law.

We there rejected the contention that a steamship company under common ownership with a timber operation was not engaged in the latter business and hence was outside the ambit of the Norris-LaGuardia

Act, 29 U.S.C. § 113, in regard to a dispute between the timber operator and its employees. We said:

> Assuming, as we may, that plaintiff and Bowater's Newfoundland had sufficient independence to be regarded, in contract or tort litigation, as separate both from the ultimate parent, Bowater Paper Company, Ltd., and from each other, see Bartle v. Home Owners Cooperative, Inc., 309 N.Y. [437] 103, 127 N.E. 2d 832 (1955), it does not follow that they ought to be so regarded for application of the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

We did not think Congress meant the policies of that act "to be defeated by the fragmentation of an integrated business into a congeries of corporate entities, however much these might properly be respected for other purposes." Still more instructive is Mr. Justice Douglas' opinion in NLRB v. Deena Artware, Inc., 361 U.S. 398, 402–404, 80 S. Ct. 441, 443, 4 L. Ed. 2d 400 (1960), holding that in an enforcement proceeding the Board was entitled to show that a group of "separate corporations are not what they appear to be, that in truth they are but divisions or departments of a 'single enterprise.' "

The same considerations which allowed the Labor Board in Deena to treat as one what nominally were several here require that in decreeing penalties a court should treat as one what nominally are two. It is human beings who cause violations of cease and desist orders; but no one suggests that § 5(l) contemplates a separate penalty against every person who had a hand in the offending commercials. What Congress intended was a single penalty from persons acting under single control. Under the district court's theory, if Williams had had five Parksons, each operating in a different region, there could have been a sextuple penalty for what in every practical sense was conduct by a single corporation. Naturally, a case of violation by a manufacturer and an independent advertising agency would present a different question.

[27] Alternatively, we hold that, under the circumstances of this case, where the FTC requested only a judgment against both defendants "in the total sum of $500,000," the Attorney General was without authority to seek that amount against each under the fair implications of our decision in United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., supra, 355 F. 2d 688. The Government seeks to distinguish St. Regis on the basis that although the FTC there requested action by the Attorney General, see 355 F. 2d at 690 n. 1, it had made no certificate at all, and that the statute, 15 U.S.C. § 56, speaks of certifying "the facts" and not the relief sought. This respects the St. Regis holding but rejects the reasoning that supported it. The thrust of the majority's decision, 355 F. 2d at 695–698, was that Congress had placed the task of determining when and what penalties should be sought in the FTC and not in theAttorney General.[26] The draft complaint forwarded in this case by the FTC to the Attorney General shows that the Commission took seriously its responsibilities concerning the amount of the penalty, notably by assessing penalties for each individual broadcast only in Counts 9 and 10. On the Government's theory the Attorney General would have been at liberty to apply this method to the other counts, as to which the Commission had chosen the more lenient course of charging each day of broadcasting as a single violation. This view is plainly at odds with the rationale of St. Regis. Again, the Chairman's letter referred to the opinion of Commissioner Elman that the defendants "should be held liable for all violations [438] of the order to cease and desist after it became final on December 31, 1967, and that the proceeding should not be limited in scope but should seek civil penalties for each advertisement." On the Government's view the Attorney General was free to take that line, although a majority of the Commission had decided that a lesser amount would serve the purposes of the Act. If the Attorney General could not take either of these courses—and under St. Regis he could not—we fail to see what authority he had to double the Commission's demand of $500,000.[27]

VIII. The Request for an Evidentiary Hearing on the Amount of the Penalties

Not disputing that determination of the amount of penalties within the maximum is committed to the informed discretion of the district judge,[28] see United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 485 F. 2d

[26] The recent amendments to the enforcement provisions of the FTC Act have gone even further in placing responsibility for enforcement in the Commission's hands. Section 16 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 56, has been amended to provide:

> Whenever the Federal Trade Commission has reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is liable to a penalty under section 14 or under subsection (l) of section 5 of this Act, it shall—(a) certify the facts to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause appropriate proceedings to be brought for the enforcement of the provisions of such section or subsection; or
> (b) after compliance with the requirements of section 5(m), itself cause such appropriate proceedings to be brought.

Section 5(m), another new addition, provides that the Commission can appear through its own attorneys in circumstances where the statute requires it to be represented by the Attorney General, if it notifies the Attorney General of its proposed action and gives him 10 days to take the action instead.

[27] Appellants claim that the judgment entered below was "enormous by current standards." While most reported judgments under § 5(l) have been much smaller, see 3 CCH Trade Regulation Rptr. ¶ 9701.40, assessments in excess of $50,000 are not unknown. See, e.g., United States v. Americana Corp., 3 CCH Trade Regulation Rptr. ¶ 9701.40, at 17,83–3 (D. Md. 1965) ($100,000); United States v. Bostic, 336 F. Supp. 1312, 1321 (D.S.C.), aff'd on opinion below, 473 F. 2d 1388 (4 Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 411 U.S. 966, 93 S. Ct. 2146, 36 L. Ed. 2d 686 (1973) ($80,000); United States v. Ancorp National Services, Inc., 367 F. Supp. 1221 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) ($204,200).

[28] There is no need to dispute that assessment of penalties is for the judge rather than the jury.

16, 21 (10 Cir. 1973), appellants contend they were entitled to an evidentiary hearing on such relevant subjects as their good faith belief that the accused commercials did not violate the order and the degree of harm caused by any that did. They argue with force that such a hearing was an indispensable preliminary to the court's findings that broadcasting of the commercials in Counts 1–4 and 8–9 revealed "a total lack of good faith with respect to the dissemination of these advertisements and, if not wilful violations of the order, at least reckless disregard of its prohibitions;" [29] that the broadcast of the commercials in Counts 5–7 "amounted to gross negligence and bordered on recklessness;" and that the FemIron advertisements in Counts 10 and 11 "were in wilful disregard" of the order, 354 F. Supp. at 552–553. In view of our holding that summary judgment was proper only on Counts 10 and 11, it is only the denial of a hearing as to these counts that is now before us, although the issue may arise if the jury should find for the Government on other counts after a trial.

[28, 29] While there appears to be no authority on the point, we would think it desirable that the court accord an evidentiary hearing on the amount of the penalty if this is reasonably and seasonably requested either by the defendants or by the Government. As the court below recognized, the size of the penalty should be based on a number of factors including the good or bad faith of the defendants, the injury to the public, and the defendants' ability to pay. 354 F. Supp. at 548. See United States v. Universal Wool Batting Corp., 1961 Trade Cases ¶ 70,168 (S.D.N.Y. 1961); United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 212 F. Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1962); United States v. Wilson Chemical Co., 1962 Trade Cases ¶ 70,478 (W.D. Pa. (1962), aff'd, 319 F. 2d 133 (3 Cir. 1963); United States v. H. M. Prince Textiles, Inc., 262 F. Supp. 383, 389 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); United States v. Bostic, supra, 336 F. [439] Supp. at 1321. The enormous range of penalties available to the district court in the usual civil penalty case renders it of critical importance that the court have adequate information on the issues to be considered in assessing the penalty. However, we are not disposed to reverse the judgments in this case on Counts 10 and 11 solely because of the denial of a hearing. These commercials would have been clear violations of the order if made with respect to Geritol, and the only possible mitigating circumstance could be defendants' belief that FemIron was not within it. Although on notice of the Commission's contrary view, the appellants proceeded to broadcast commercials for their new product that unquestionably transgressed the restrictions and disclosure requirements of the order. The court had a considerable amount of information about the dispute over FemIron, and it does not seem likely that an evidentiary hearing would have produced any different result.

[29] Not content with this, the judge added that these violations "were only slightly less egregious than if defendants had disseminated the very advertisements relied upon by the FTC when it originally issued the order." 354 F. Supp. at 552. In light of our belief that the AA advertisements in Counts 1–4 would have been submittable to a jury barely, if at all, and that the commercials in Counts 8–9 raised a disputable issue of fact, we consider this, as well, as the characterization quoted in the text to be clearly erroneous.

The judgments against Williams on Counts 10 and 11 are affirmed; all judgments against Parkson are set aside; the judgments against Williams on Counts 1 through 9 are reversed and the cause is remanded for a jury trial on these counts as against Williams only. No costs.

OAKES, Circut Judge (dissenting):

I dissent with all respect. My colleagues' decision today, of importance to the Federal Trade Commission and would-be deceptive American advertisers generally, is a first at an appellate level. They hold that an advertiser subject to a reviewed and final order of the Federal Trade Commission to cease and desist from deception is entitled not only to a plenary trial, but one with a jury, on the question whether the order has been violated by a "new" commercial (see note 10 infra). They reach this decision not only despite lengthy administrative proceedings, at every step of which the advertiser participated adversarily, the proceedings culminating in the order which was finalized after review by another circuit court of appeals. They appear to me for all significant practical purposes to ignore extensive administrative proceedings, formal and informal, subsequent to the judicial upholding of the order, during the course of which additional proceedings the advertiser was given ample opportunity to modify its "new" commercials so as to comply with the outstanding order but chose instead—in defiance of the Commission's warnings—at the very least to skirt the edge of the order's terms. My colleagues give no weight whatsoever to the Commission's—I may say long-restrained—certification of facts of violation to the Attorney General, after a decade of administrative proceedings, in accordance with the prescribed statutory procedure. Their construction of the congressional purpose pulls the teeth of an enforcement statute enacted to ensure compliance with a judicially-reviewed cease and desist order, rendering the statute as ineffective as soft rubber dentures.

I cannot believe that Congress could conceivably have intended to make it so easy to evade Trade Commission orders. I do believe that my colleagues have overlooked the statutory scheme and hence misconstrued the stautory purpose; they have done so, regrettably I think, without support in the legislative history or, with one minor exception discredited in its own circuit, among the judicial authorities. Their underlying rationale escapes me. Hence this dissent.

I. THE "RIGHT" TO A JURY TRIAL

The point of departure for examination of the question whether appellants have a right to a plenary, jury trial under Fed. R. Civ. P. 38(a), which preserves "[t]he right of trial by jury as declared by the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution . . .," is 15 U.S.C. § 45(l),[1] the civil penalty provision under [440] which the Government brought this action. But it is not to be viewed in isolation, as if it were some separate statutory entity. Rather it must be examined in the context of the Federal Trade Commission Act as a whole, taking care to note the statutory scheme and underlying congressional policies concerning the control of deceptive advertising to determine the role and the implementation function of § 45(l). Aside from the general goal of seeking to divine the legislative purpose, there are three good reasons that force consideration of the role played by § 45(l) in the overall regulatory scheme devised by Congress. The first of these is stated in the majority's opinion as follows: "Congress apparently did not expressly confront the jury trial question [with respect to § 45(l)]. . . ."[2] Secondly, with only one exception, and that a case subsequently subjected to severe criticism by its own circuit court of appeals,[3] no case among the many cited in part III of the majority opinion holds that, in an action brought by the United States to recover civil penalties for violation of the valid order of an administrative agency, the defendant has a right to a jury trial as a matter of statutory or constitutional law. Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, we must determine whether the recognition of the right to a plenary, jury trial would tend to subvert the entire statutory structure by which the FTC has been charged with the regulation of false and deceptive advertising[4] [441] The majority opinion attempts to interpret § 45(l) as if it existed in a statutory vacuum. I would reject that approach, relying on the Supreme Court's recent statement that "our task in interpreting separate provisions of a single Act is to give the Act 'the most harmonious, comprehensive meaning possible' in light of the legislative policy and purpose." [5]

[1] Prior to its recent amendment, this section read as follows:

> Any person, partnership, or corporation who violates an order of the Commission to cease and desist after it has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.

This section was recently amended, Act of Nov. 16, 1973, Pub. L. No. 93–153, § 408, 87 Stat. 591–592, for the purpose of ensuring the "prompt enforcement of the laws the Commission administers." Id. at § 408(b), 87 Stat. 591. Although there is no legislative history on this particular amendatory Act, Congress was clearly expressing its dissatisfaction with both the speed and force by which FTC orders were being enforced. There is some indication that Congress viewed § 45(l) proceedings as essentially equitable by importing into those proceedings the power to issue mandatory injunctive relief "and further equitable relief," this power to be exercised by the district courts. Of course, such relief could previously be granted by the court of appeals granting enforcement of the cease and desist order, in this case the Sixth Circuit, so we must assume that Congress had some reason to lodge this same power in the district courts in § 45(l) proceedings.

One possible view is that Congress viewed the record in a § 45(l) proceeding to be more amenable to review by a district court because of the nature of the informal proceedings that constitute a critical portion of that record. See part IIA infra. Regardless of what view is taken, it seems highly doubtful that Congress would have incorporated what are clearly equitable remedies into a § 45(l) proceeding to increase the district court's power to deal with offenders if Congress had realized that § 45(l) carried with it the right to a jury trial. Indeed, the inclusion of injunctive power in § 45(l) as amended lends support to the Government's argument that civil penalties and injunctive relief are in fact alternate remedies.

[2] The absence of direct evidence as to congressional intent leads to the conclusion that intent > must be ascertained by examining the purposes and objectives of the FTCA [Federal Trade Commission Act] as a whole in terms of objective criteria, i.e., the relevant inquiry is "how, one supposes, it [the legislative scheme] * * * would appear to a 'reasonable' interpreter."

Rev. 1, 3 (1965). See also note 28 and accompanying text infra; Holbrook v. United States, 284 F. 2d 747, 752 (9th Cir. 1960) ("a significant consideration . . . is a comparison between the results to which each such consideration would lead").

A. The Statutory Scheme and Administrative Proceedings

Under 15 U.S.C. § 45, the FTC is responsible for making the initial determination that any party may be engaging in unfair or deceptive practices in commerce. Briefly, if the FTC deems a proceeding under § 45(b) "would be to the interest of the public," the party in question is served with a notice, hearings are held, and if the FTC determines from the hearings that a violation has occurred, "it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts and shall issue . . . an order [requiring that party] to cease and desist from using such method of competition or such act or practice." 15 U.S.C. § 45(b). Under 15 U.S.C. § 45(c), any party subject to such a cease and desist order may then obtain review of that order in a court of appeals. The standard of review set forth in the statute to be applied by the circuit courts of appeals is that "[t]he findings of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive." Id.[6]

[3] United States v. Hindman, 179 F. Supp. 926 (D.N.J. 1960), criticized in United States v. Vulcanized Rubber & Plastics Co., 288 F. 2d 257, 258–259 n. 2 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 821, 82 S. Ct. 38, 7 L. Ed. 2d 26 (1961).

[4] Reduced to its simplest terms, the point is that if a court or jury of 12 is given the power to decide de novo the question whether a given advertisement is deceptive, i.e., the "meaning of the commercials." Brief for Applicants at 29, then the FTC, at least insofar as deceptive advertising is concerned, would be stripped of the major function presently performed by it in the regulatory scheme—deciding what is and what is not deceptive advertising. See note 13 infra. Other considerations urged upon us by the Government, such as the need for streamlined procedures commented on by this court in United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d at 693, are also important, but the nub of the problem remains whether the FTC on the one hand, or a judge or jury on the other, is to pass on whether specific advertisements are deceptive under the Federal Trade Commission Act.

[6] This has generally been held to bind the court of appeals to the "substantial evidence" rule. Charles Pfizer & Co. v. FTC, 401 F. 2d 574 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 920, 89 S. Ct. 1195, 22 L. Ed. 2d 453 (1968); Montgomery Ward & Co. v. FTC, 379 F. 2d 666 (7th Cir. 1967).

If either party desires to adduce evidence in addition to that adduced in the hearings, application may be made to the court of appeals which, if it grants the application, orders the evidence to be taken before the FTC.[7] The court of appeals then enters a decree affirming, modifying or setting aside the FTC order and enforcing the order to the extent affirmed. Certiorari to the Supreme Court is available under 28 U.S.C. § 347.

In the case now before us, the above procedures were followed and culminated in the enforcement on review by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, with some modification, of the FTC order directed against appellants here. The original complaint against appellants was issued in December of 1962; the court order granting enforcement was entered August 11, 1967, more than 4½ years later. J. B. Williams Co. v. FTC, 381 F. 2d 884 (6th Cir. 1967) (Williams I). Williams I in short represented the culmination by way of judicial review and sanction of an extended administrative process that had found Geritol commercials to be in violation of §§ 5 & 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[8]

[442] After a cease and desist order is granted enforcement by a court of appeals, and only thereafter, can the FTC move to force compliance or exact penalties for noncompliance. In this case, as the majority opinion points out the FTC and appellants followed the administrative procedure, 16 C.F.R. § 3.61, whereby after issuance of a cease and desist order compliance reports are submitted by appellants to the FTC, and it reviews the reports or institutes proceedings to enforce compliance. The first such report on October 23, 1968, resulted in the calling of a further public hearing by the FTC which was held on November 14, 1968, in which it was determined that appellants' advertising was not in compliance with the cease and desist order.[9] The FTC, rather than moving immediately to force compliance (by way of injunction) or to penalize noncompliance (by way of an action under § 45(l)), gave appellants what amounted to a "second chance," a fair warning that future noncompliance would necessitate more drastic moves by the FTC.[10] It published on December 2, 1968, an opinion which required the submission of a second compliance report. That report, submitted on January 31, 1969, by appellants, dealt with the "AA" commercials before us in counts 1–4 and included the scripts for what before us are the "BB" commercials, counts 5–9. The FTC studied this report and, without holding hearings but after consultation between the FTC staff and appellants' representatives, advised appellants by letter of what steps might be taken to achieve compliance with the order, viz., deleting all references to "power" in the "AA" commercials. By letter dated May 15, 1969, the appellants accepted the Commission's conditions and agreed to remove the word "power." The violations alleged in counts 1–4 occurred between June 10, 1969, and June 20, 1969, more than three weeks after appellants had agreed to stop using them. The "sad-glad" commercials referred to in counts 5–7 were used from and after June 14, 1969, and before they were submitted to the Commission in the third compliance report filed on June 7, 1969; appellants did not request advice from the Commission as to whether such use would constitute compliance. Counts 8–9 are based on "sad-glad" commercials which also use the word "power," and these were disseminated between June 2, and June 6, 1969, over two weeks after the May 15, 1969, letter of appellants. As to counts 10–11, the FemIron counts, [443] the Commission did not even know of FemIron advertising until it appeared on network television; the Commission staff advised on July 16, 1969, the Commission itself on September 3, 1969, in rejecting the third compliance report, that FemIron was subject to the order. These procedures indicate that after cease and desist order has been enforced by a court of appeals, the FTC plays the key role in determining whether its own order has been violated and in seeking sanctions for such violation, and its sound administrative practice as followed here gives a previously deceptive advertiser[11] who is subject to an outstanding order ample opportunity to demonstrate his belated good faith compliance with the Act. Even given some unasserted right of appellants to secure a narrow review by way of a declaratory judgment as to whether a specific commercial is in compliance with such an order,[12] it seems beyond dispute that the FTC is to use its expertise in construing the order and applying it to "new" advertising.[13] Here indeed it did so. To the extent that the majority opinion is a substitution of judicial judgment for that exercise of administrative expertise, it is unsupportable.

[7] "The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 45(c).

[8] Part III of the majority opinion purports to decide the question whether the 11 commercials which are the subjects of this action violated the cease and desist order without so much as a passing reference to the Sixth Circuit decision that gave that order the imprimatur of the judiciary. Regardless whether Judge Motley correctly defined the court's function, she cannot be faulted for her statement that "correct interpretation of the order requires the court to consider not only its plain language, but relevant proceedings before the FTC and the Sixth Circuit's decision as well." United States v. J. B. Williams Co., 354 F. Supp. 521, 532 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) (Williams II).

[9] Those specific advertisements are not the subject of this action, but the Findings and Opinion of the FTC concerning them is most relevant, since the present controversy may not properly be considered in an administrative vacuum. See part II infra.

[10] While the FTC questioned its own hesitation on this question at a later date, the legislative history of § 45(l) indicates that Congress desired disputes between the FTC and advertisers to be worked out without resort to court action where possible. If the outcome of this case is to require the FTC, after 11 years of proceedings, to go before a judge or jury and prove to either, de novo, that certain commercials are false and deceptive, something that it has spent more than a decade and enormous public resources to do, it may well be that the FTC in the future will be forced to resort to the courts more quickly and as frequently as possible. There would appear to be no other way to deal with those advertisers who, as appellants here, can at best be described as intransigent. One cannot help but suppose that the burdens on the federal courts, see H. Friendly, Federal Jurisdiction: A General View Part II (1973), will be further exacerbated with the multiple review Judge Friendly's opinion would propose. Cf. Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 412 U.S. 645, 653, 93 S. Ct. 2488, 2494, 37 L. Ed. 2d 235 (1973): "The deluge of litigation that would follow if 'me-too' drugs and OTC drugs had to receive de novo hearings in the courts would inure to the interests of manufacturers and merchants in drugs, but not to the interests of the public that Congress was anxious to protect . . . ." See also the remarks of Rep. Chapman quoted in the text at note 21, infra.

On November 28, 1969, the FTC, apparently convinced at this point that appellants both had violated—it did not use but could have used the word "flouted"—the cease and desist order and could probably be expected to do so in the future, took the first step necessary to exact penalties for such noncompliance. This step was not, as seems to be suggested by the majority opinion, merely the submission of a "draft complaint" by the FTC for rubber-stamp approval and prosecution by the Attorney General. It was, rather a certification of facts previously found by the FTC transmitted to the Attorney General, "whose duty it shall be to cause appropriate proceedings to be brought for the enforcement [of § 45(l)]." 15 U.S.C. § 56. The importance of this procedure to the functioning of the entire regulatory scheme has been the subject of extensive consideration by this court in United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d 688 (2d Cir. 1966). There, in an opinion rejecting the claim that the Attorney General could himself bring a penalty action under § 45(l) without having had the facts of an alleged violation certified to him by the FTC, the court went carefully into both the sparse legislative history and policy reasons supporting the conclusion that only the FTC has the statutory power to initiate proceedings under § 45(l). The opinion is replete with numerous references to the agency's expertise involved in determining wheth[444]er one of its orders has been violated, but the following passage stands out:

[11] [T]here is substantial evidence to support the finding of the Commission that most tired people are not so because of iron deficiency anemia, and the failure to disclose this fact is false and misleading because the advertisement creates the impression that the tired feeling is caused by something which Geritol can cure.
Williams I, 381 F. 2d at 889.

[12] At least one court has held that the FTC's rejection of a compliance report is subject to review in a declaratory judgment action, but only at the risk of the petitioner, who cannot use that review to stay or otherwise jeopardize the public's interest in securing possible penalties. Floersheim v. Weinberger, 346 F. Supp. 950 (D.D.C. 1972).

[13] The term "new" is used here to describe commercials that were the subject of the cease and desist order but which have been modified to any extent in an attempt to comply with the order. The change of a single word in a commercial might bring that commercial into compliance or might leave it in its prior state of noncompliance. Whatever effect changes might have, the "new" commercial is different from the commercials that were the immediate subjects of the cease and desist order, yet obviously the Commission cannot be required to start its proceedings all over again. The cease and desist order must, therefore, be regarded as a flexible instrument to be interpreted in such a manner that it cannot be flouted by changes in the form of commercials that do not affect the substance of the false or deceptive impression conveyed by those commercials. See FTC v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470, 473, 72 S. Ct. 800, 96 L. Ed. 1081 (1952). This is elementary.

> To relinquish jurisdiction to the Attorney General after the issuance of a cease and desist order would be most unrealistic, for the Commission alone knows the scope of its orders and has been "provided with staffs to institute proceedings and to follow up decrees and police their obedience. . . ."

United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d at 696 (emphasis added), quoting in part United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 640, 70 S. Ct. 357, 94 L. Ed. 401 (1950). Again,

> The duty and responsibility for determining . . . whether cease and desist orders issued to eliminate the anti-competitive effects of [certain] practices have been complied with or violated was delegated solely to the FTC.

Id. at 693 (emphasis added.) This quote is not, as intimated in the majority opinion, being used to support the proposition "that the FTC was to be judge as well as prosecutor." The fact that 15 U.S.C. § 56 requires the FTC to proceed through the Attorney General after a fact certification is itself conclusive that the FTC is neither to be sole judge nor prosecutor. The majority's reference to "ex parte" determinations of violation is inexplicable, given the facts of this case, in which—before the penalty action was initiated—there was a full public hearing and argument on the first compliance report, as well as numerous meetings between the parties and the exchange of correspondence on the second and third compliance reports. And, contrary to the assertion that the agency's determination of violation is "not entitled to weight in an adjudication proceeding before a court," it clearly emerges in the St. Regis opinion that the acknowledged expertise of the FTC in interpreting its own orders is to be given some weight in the § 45(l) action. The underlying premise of the majority that no weight is to be accorded to the FTC's certification of facts in and of itself emasculates the penalty provisions of the Act.

The soundness of the St. Regis opinion has recently been reinforced by the decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F. 2d 986 (1973). There, plaintiffs asserted a private right of action to enforce 15 U.S.C. §§ 45(a), 52(a)(1) and 54(a), existing by implication from the statutory scheme. In rejecting this implied right Judge Leventhal addressed himself to the inseparability of the dual functions of the FTC in determining whether violations had occurred as well as acting in an enforcement capacity: "the substantive prohibitions of the statute are inextricably intertwined with provisions defining the power and duties of a specialized administrative body [the FTC] charged with its enforcement. . . ." Id. at 989 (footnote omitted). See also FTC v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470, 473, 72 S. Ct. 800, 96 L. Ed. 1081 (1952). As pointed out by this court in St. Regis, what would be meat to the FTC might well be poison to the Attorney General. 355 F. 2d at 695. The certification of facts by the Commission to the Attorney General is in and of itself a determination of violation of the cease and desist order.

Section 45(l) having been invoked in this case as one of three possible means of securing compliance with the cease and desist order, the statutory scheme has run full course. The question what right to a plenary or jury trial might exist under § 45(l) cannot be treated, I repeat, without considering the question what weight must be accorded to the "facts" found by the FTC and certified to the Attorney General under 15 U.S.C. § 56.

Appellants here do not claim any generalized right to a jury trial on all disputed issues of "fact" that may arise or did arise in the "compliance" phase of these 11-plus years of administrative and judicial proceedings. Rather, appellants claim a right to a jury trial on two issues which appellants choose to charac[445]terize as factual: (1) the meaning of the commercials and (2) the meaning of the word "properties" as applied to the product FemIron in counts 10–11. The majority ultimately concedes that the latter question is a purely legal question that was in the province of the court below to resolve. In my view, for reasons that will appear below, the court in making that determination should give great deference to the agency's own views on that question. The narrow question remains whether appellants were entitled to a trial de novo (indeed a jury trial) on the "meaning" of the 11 commercials.[14]

B. Expertise and the "Meaning" of Commercials

The principal function performed by the FTC in the administration of the deceptive advertising provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act is the determination of what advertising actually violates that Act. The FTC is also responsible for making broader policy that may affect the whole spectrum of advertising,[15] but the one area in which its expertise has never been seriously questioned is in determining whether a given advertisement is "deceptive."

[14] As the majority opinion at footnote 16 suggests, Judge Motley's opinion below seems to acknowledge that certain factual questions arising out of the compliance phase of the proceedings might, in some instances, require a jury trial. Such a factual question might be on what date, or on how many occasions, a commercial was transmitted to the general public in violation of an order. Even if these issues—which in no way resemble the issue of the meaning of the commercials—were "the very sort which juries are traditionally called on to resolve," Judge Friendly's opinion at 25, it would not mean that Congress did not delegate to the FTC the responsibility for determining such "facts," subject only to review for lack of substantial supporting evidence. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(E).

While due process might mandate that such facts not be determined on completely ex parte basis, the compliance phase of the proceedings were not so conducted. As discussed in the body of this dissent at note 7 supra, there is no reason why a district court in a § 45(l) proceeding could not grant a motion to adduce additional relevant evidence before the FTC, should a party in appellants' position assert such a due process deprivation. Cf. CIBA Corp. v. Weinberger, 412 U.S. 640, 644, 93 S. Ct. 2495, 2498, 37 L. Ed. 2d 230 (1973) ("Cases may arise where there has been no formal administrative determination of the 'new drug' issue, it being first tendered to a district court. Even then, however, the District Court might well stay its hand, awaiting an appropriate administrative determination of the threshold question"). This question is not before us because appellants make no such claim.

The case law on this "expertise" is unequivocal and so voluminous that it is necessary only to illustrate the point. As the District of Columbia Court of Appeals recently stated,

> The Commission has developed a fund of knowledge as to the probable impact upon purchasers of particular advertising representations, and in recent years has been active in the evolutions of new and innovative remedies to correct false advertising and to undo the effects of deceptive trade practices.

Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F. 2d at 998–999.[16] The Supreme Court had earlier stated its view on this precise question:

> This statutory scheme necessarily gives the Commission an influential role in interpreting § 5 [15 U.S.C. § 45] and in applying it to the facts of particular cases arising out of unprecedented situations. Moreover, as an administrative agency which deals continually with cases in the area, the Commission is often in a better posi[446]tion than are courts to determine whether a practice is "deceptive" within the meaning of the Act. This Court has frequently stated that the Commission's judgment is to be given great weight by reviewing courts. This admonition is especially true with respect to allegedly deceptive advertising since the finding of a § 5 violation in this field rests so heavily on inference and pragmatic judgment.

FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 385, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 1042, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965) (emphasis added).

There is no reason of which I am aware that this expertise is suddenly to be discarded once an order has been made and reviewed, as the majority does.[17] Viewing the Federal Trade Commission Act as an integrated whole, see note 2 supra, which is the way Congress viewed it, I simply cannot agree that the storehouse of information acquired, and experience gathered by the FTC on the question of the effect of advertising on consumers, the "meaning of commercials," is to be disregarded, or that Congress intended it to be disregarded, at what might be—owing to the intransigence or greediness of an advertiser—the most critical point of the entire process, that of penalizing those who would defy the will of Congress as expressed in the Act.[18]

[17] Their opinion makes passing reference to the "weight" to be accorded FTC findings of violations in framing remedial orders, but makes no attempt to explain why this expertise is irrelevant in a § 45(l) proceeding.

[18] The majority says that "While Congress placed the usual substantial evidence rule in § 5(c) [15 U.S.C. § 45(c)] of the FTC Act, dealing with judicial review of orders, it made no similar provision in § 5(l) [15 U.S.C. § 45(l)]." But review may be had under the Administrative Procedure Act. 5 U.S.C. §§ 701, 706. See Weinberger v. Bentex Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 412 U.S. at 653–654.

C. The Legislative History

This court has previously referred to the legislative history of § 45(l) as "sparse," United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d at 692, and it is conceded by all that neither the statute itself nor the legislative history make any direct reference to the jury trial question. In such a situation we should be doubly aware of Justice Jackson's admonition in Schwegmann Brothers v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 341 U.S. 384, 396, 71 S. Ct. 745, 751, 95 L. Ed. 1035 (1951), that "to select casual statements from floor debates, not always distinguished for candor or accuracy as a basis for making up our minds what law Congress intended to enact is to substitute ourselves for the Congress in one of its important functions."

I do not draw the same inferences as the majority does from my examination of the legislative history as is available to guide us. The Wheeler-Lea Amendments of 1938 to the Federal Trade Commission Act had a tortured history of congressional inaction and compromise which has been thoroughly recounted elsewhere. See generally Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F. 2d at 992–994. It appears that some members of Congress successfully held up passage of the final bill by their strenuous advocacy of the position that control and regulation of deceptive advertising should be placed within the jurisdiction of the Food and Drug Administration. The opponents, who eventually prevailed, made the argument that the FTC, as a "quasi-judicial" body, was in a better position to deal with this category of practices.[19]

[447] Section 5(l) of the Amendments, now 15 U.S.C. § 45(l), was one of the provisions adopted to make cease and desist orders more effective. Prior to the adoption of the Amendments, enforcement of a cease and desist order could be had only after new proceedings, presumably full-blown hearings, had been instituted to ascertain whether the order had been violated. One of the purposes of new § 5(l) was to streamline the procedure as follows:

> The order of the Commissioner would definitely become final as provided in Section 5 and become operative as to further transgressions without the initiation of new proceedings as now required after the violation occurs.[20]

H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1937). These "new proceedings," at least in the mind of Representative Chapman, represented a frustration of the purposes of the administrative process because of the very nature of the advertising beast:

[19] H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 5 (1937) (emphasis added):

The Federal Trade Commission as an independent, quasi-judicial body, has a procedure better calculated to handle multitudinous types of advertising and to do its work to the greater confidence and satisfaction of the public than any purely administrative body. Its work carries with it the combined elements of searching investigation, orderly procedure, prevention rather than penalization in minor cases, and that judicial fairness essential to the enlistment of confidence by the public.

[20] A similar "streamlining" occurred when Congress adopted the language of § 45(l) into 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), which now governs the enforcement of the Clayton Act. See infra.

> Advertising copy is frequently changed as a matter of good advertising technique. By the time the cease-and-desist order or an injunction becomes effective the advertiser, as a matter of course, will change his copy. He can continue this process indefinitely without running any risk whatever of penalty, and when he has run the gamut of all the claims he can plausibly make for his product, he can then change its composition, as patent-medicine manufacturers have so frequently done, and repeat the process over and over again.[21]

83 Cong. Rec. 400 (1938).

At two points during the House debate, brief comments were made, although not directly referring to the jury trial question, that cast some light on the question why there was any need in the first place for a complex regulatory scheme to prevent and regulate deceptive advertising. Representative Sirovich, relatively early in the debate, made reference to "the American gullible public." 83 Cong. Rec. 394 (1938). Later in the debate, Representative Coffee reiterated and fortified this prior statement by reference to "the gullible people." Id. at 416. Congress, these remarks indicate, was supremely aware that the average American citizen was often unable to discern the false from the true when subjected to the sales pitches of the advertising industry. One might even group within the classification of "gullible" us federal judges.[22] If this be true, it is certainly permissible to draw the inference that a jury would not have been considered by Congress to be the most useful tool to implement the purposes of the Federal Trade Commission Act had Congress directly considered the question.[23]

[448] The only other "clue" in the legislative history derives from a brief reference to the fact that the civil penalty provision was based on similar provisions in the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 1705, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1936). The provision of the former, 7 U.S.C. § 195, is clearly criminal and therefore has no relevance here, unless it is seen as a general reference to the fact that criminal sanctions were included in the Wheeler-Lea Amendments. There is some question as to what provision of the Securities Exchange Act was being referred to, and for what purpose, by the Wheeler-Lea lawmakers in their reports and debate. H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1937), clearly indicates that the reference to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 was to 15 U.S.C. § 78y(a), which is nothing more than the general provision under which decisions or orders of the SEC are subjected to judicial review, as opposed to 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(b) (referred to by the majority opinion). The reference to the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 may thus have been simply a general reference to features incorporated into the Wheeler-Lea Amendments. Specifically, the reference in the House Report goes to the inclusion of a provision making FTC orders final unless appealed within a 60-day period. Neither the remarks of Senator Wheeler, 80 Cong. Rec. 6594 (1936), nor those of Representative Reece, 83 Cong. Rec. 397 (1938), relied upon by the majority, make reference to any specific provision of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. In S. Rep. No. 1705, 74th Cong., 2d Sess. 7, 8 (1936), specific reference is made to 15 U.S.C. § 78y(b) with respect to granting the courts of appeals the power to issue temporary injunctions, and 15 U.S.C. § 78y(a) with respect to the time for appeals. S. Rep. No. 221, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1937), in pertinent part, is merely a reprint of S. Rep. No. 1705, and thus adds no reference to 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(b) or otherwise clarifies this question. None of the sources standing for the proposition that the Congress considered § 45(l) to be patterned on the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 make reference to the majority's § 78ff(b); they refer only to 15 U.S.C. § 78y(a) and (b).[24]

[21] This statement is clearly applicable to the court's disposition of the Femiron "properties" question.

[22] I know of nothing to support the majority's assertion that jurors "have more experience than most judges" when it comes to deciding whether a commercial is "deceptive." In the final analysis I suspect, and I believe Congress insists, that the FTC has the greater expertise and wherewithal to decide that question than "the American gullible public," subject always to review for arbitrary, capricious or unlawful exercise of that function. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A).

[23] As will be discussed, the logic of the majority's position would probably compel reexamination of the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 48, 57 S. Ct. 615, 81 L. Ed. 893 (1937) (jury trial right denied in back pay case), which was recently reaffirmed in Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 94 S. Ct. 1005, 39 L. Ed. 2d 260, 42 U.S.L.W. 4259, 4261 (1974). In Jones & Laughlin, the Court said: "The instant case is not a suit at common law or in the nature of such a suit. The proceeding is one unknown to the common law. It is a statutory proceeding. Reinstatement of the employee and payment for time lost are requirements imposed for violation of the statute and are remedies appropriate to its enforcement. The contention under the Seventh Amendment is without merit." 301 U.S. at 48–49.

D. Reasoning by Reference to Other Statutes

Given the paucity of legislative history bearing on the issue before us, one is tempted to reason by analogy to other statutory provisions that may "look like" § 45(l). But as the foregoing has, I hope, made clear, to reason by analogy is at best dangerous where a statutory penalty provision was adopted as part of and integral to a complex regulatory scheme formulated by Congress with certain objectives in mind, and at worst looking to one's "own heart for his decision" as opposed to "seeking to divine out of the confused, often conflicting and half-conscious aspirations which lie behind a statute some resultant of those forces in keeping with what was consciously contemplated." A. Cox, Hand and the Interpretation of Statutes, 60 Harv. L. Rev. 370, 373 (1947).

[24] Assuming, arguendo, that the reference was in fact to 15 U.S.C. § 78ff(b), and assuming, arguendo, that a violator of that section would be entitled to a jury trial—a question that so far as I know has never been litigated—it is readily apparent that the question to be decided by the jury, i.e., whether certain documents required to be filed by 15 U.S.C. § 78o(d) had in fact been filed, does not involve any prior SEC findings made as the result of formal or informal hearings.

The analogy to the Interstate Commerce Act penalty section, 49 U.S.C. § 16(8), drawn in the majority opinion seems to me not in the least persuasive. This provision is said to be "almost certainly" "the true model" for § 45(l). If this were so, of course, one might have expected some reference to it in the legislative history of § 45(l), especially giv[449]en the apparently inaccurate reference to provisions in the Stockyards Act of 1921 and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Nevertheless, two features of § 16(8) stand out most prominently: first, the question whether the right to a jury trial obtains under that section has never been either litigated or decided; second, the language of § 16(8) is itself sufficiently different from that of § 45(l) to render any analogy without significance.

As for "other contemporaneous railroad regulation statutes," to which the majority refers, perhaps including 49 U.S.C. § 16(2), which deals with civil complaints by persons against carriers in reference to an ICC order for the payment of money, the only thing necessary to say is that what is or was good for the railroads probably has little or nothing to do with the control of deceptive advertising by the FTC.

As to the language of § 16(8) itself, that section differs, inter alia, in that it requires an ICC order to be knowingly violated. Not only does § 45(l) have no such requirement, but the Supreme Court has said flatly that specific intent is not a requisite to violation of an order issued by the FTC in a false advertising case. FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. at 393. It seems evident that the penalty provisions governing ICC orders are plums while here we have a different, if less sweet, fruit.

One analogy, completely neglected by the majority, remains to be explored which should at least theoretically be more fruitful because it involves the incorporation of § 45(l) as an enforcement tool in Clayton Act proceedings. This provision, now 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), as its legislative history shows, was patterned after § 45(l) because the FTC had shown a more than two-decade history of being unable effectively to enforce the Clayton Act with the limited means available. S. Rep. No. 83, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1959). Without detailing the enforcement procedures then existing, suffice it to say that one of the specific objections to the earlier procedure was that "enforcement of the court's order must be secured in a subsequent contempt proceeding, which requires proof that new activities of the respondent have violated the court's order." H.R. Rep. No. 580, 86th Cong., 1st Sess. (1959), U.S.

Code Cong. & Admin. News, p. 1805 (1959) Congress, although it did not confront the jury trial issue directly, can hardly be thought to have wanted to substitute, for an ungainly system of new hearings and review, a procedure that would require the agency in effect to try its whole case de novo before a court or a jury. Now Chief Judge Coffin of the First Circuit captured what I take to be the essence of § 21(l) when he said that "Congress has provided that a final Commission order can be the unimpeachable basis of a Justice Department suit against a defendant for violation of such order, with fines up to $5000 for each violation." Farmington Dowel Products Co. v. Forster Manufacturing Co., 1 Cir., 421 F. 2d 61, 75 (1970). The point here is that once an order of the FTC is final, one subject to such an order has already had his "day in court" and is on notice thereafter that violations are subject to severe penalties without the interposition of renewed hearings and trials of issues that have been previously decided.[25] The unsupported assumption of the district court in United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F. Supp. 104, 111 (D. Minn. 1972), aff'd, 490 F. 2d 332 (8th Cir. 1974), that jury trial is available [450] where there is an issue of material fact, does not control the question. Indeed, in affirming the Beatrice judgment the Eighth Circuit paid no heed to the lower court's dicta regarding a jury trial and examined § 21(l) in much the same light as this dissent examines § 45(l), 490 F. 2d 332. Very clearly were there such an issue the district court could "stay its hand" pending a determination thereof by the agency. Cf. CIBA Corp. v. Weinberger, 412 U.S. 640, 644, 93 S. Ct. 2495, 37 L. Ed. 2d 230 (1973).

E. Judicial Precedent, and, Parenthetically, Constitutionality

As stated, there is only one case that has held that a right to a jury trial obtains in an action under § 45(l). In United States v. Hindman, 179 F. Supp. 926 (D.N.J. 1960), the question was whether an order issued by the FTC prohibiting the use of the label "custom-made" was sufficient to cover a label, "custom-tailored," subsequently adopted for use by the defendant. The totally fallacious premise upon which the district court arrived at its conclusion that a jury trial was required was as follows:

> we must bear in mind the principle that the meaning to be given such representations as these [presumably both "custom-made" and "custom-tailored"] is not

[25] If a modified commercial is within the order, the issue of its "deceptiveness" or "meaning" has already been litigated before the FTC even though that precise commercial was never actually before the FTC prior to the compliance phase of the proceedings. Whether it is within the order is a question in the first instance for the exercise of agency discretion, subject only to review for abuse or if exercised arbitrarily, capriciously or contrary to law, 5 U.S.C. §§ 701, 706. Cf. CIBA Corp. v. Weinberger, 412 U.S. 640, 93 S. Ct. 2495, 37 L. Ed. 2d 230 (1973). See also note 10 supra and the text at note 21 supra.

> the meaning which would be attached to them by experts, but by the average man who would be likely to purchase the articles in question and to whom those representations are thus made.

Id. at 927–928. The statement is a non sequitur in the first place: while the question of deceptiveness relates to laymen being deceived, expertise on what is deceptive is important. Beyond this, according to the Hindman court, neither "expert" testimony nor the expertise of the FTC itself plays any role whatsoever in determining what advertisements are or are not deceptive. One is forced to wonder what the district court thought the FTC was in business to do.

Not surprisingly, the Hindman court's holding was categorically rejected, albeit in dictum, by its own court of appeals in United States v. Vulcanized Rubber & Plastics Co., 288 F. 2d 257, 258–259 n. 2 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 821, 82 S. Ct. 38, 7 L. Ed. 2d 26 (1961). After recounting the facts as presented to the Hindman court, the Third Circuit said that the Hindman court's holding > was erroneous, since the sole issue before the court was whether or not the labeling practice was within the proscription of the order and not whether the labeling practice was deceptive. . . . Moreover, creating an issue of fact as the court did in Hindman, would usurp the function exclusively vested by Congress in the Federal Trade Commission to determine the issue of whether a labeling practice is misleading or deceptive to the public.

(Emphasis added.) As the text of Vulcanized makes clear, the court there based its statement concerning the "sole issue before the court" on its reading of FTC v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U.S. 37, 54, 68 S. Ct. 822, 92 L. Ed. 1196 (1948). In its petition for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court, Vulcanized conceded that to be the correct application of Mr. Justice Black's language in Morton Salt,[25a] but nevertheless argued that the FTC had never passed on the labeling of its combs "rubber-resin"; rather, Vulcanized insisted, the order went only to combs labeled "rubber" or "hard rubber."

Although the Third Circuit remarks with respect to the Hindman case and a jury trial may be "dictum," it is relevant to consider that the Government there had been awarded summary judgment by the district court, which award was affirmed and certiorari denied. Thus, what appellants here would certainly characterize as a "factual" dispute was resolved as a matter of law by all the courts which passed on that issue, even though Vulcanized character[451]ized the dispute, one involving the meaning of an order, as a factual one.[26]

[26] Professor Jaffe, who is right in so many things but like the rest of us not in all, agrees with Hindman, asking "Who better than a lay customer to decide?" L. Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action 319 n. 237 (1965). But like the Hindman court and my colleagues here, the good professor fails to give any weight to—indeed, he does not mention—whatever administrative proceedings, formal or informal, led up to the FTC's certification of facts to the Attorney General or the certification itself. This is what the court in Vulcanized saw, and with it I agree.

There is, of course, a series of cases relied on heavily by the majority, the "leading" one of which we are told is Hepner v. United States, 213 U.S. 103, 29 S. Ct. 474, 53 L. Ed. 720 (1909). These cases generally hold jury trials to be available in actions for civil penalties or forfeitures. In my view they are totally inapposite for in none of them was there a prior administrative proceeding culminating in a judicially upheld administrative order, the violation of which was in issue; in all of them the question of violation of a statute was being tried for the first time and ab initio. Here, however, appellants were long ago found by the FTC, in turn upheld by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals on review, to have engaged in deceptive advertising; the only question is whether a "new," ever so slightly changed commercial is within the reach of that order, not whether there was deceptive advertising in the first instance. Any intimation that Congress was in the Federal Trade Commission Act "opting" for "the Hepner principle" strikes me as, however sophisticated, wholly sophistical.

The most recent discussion by the Supreme Court of the right to trial by jury in civil cases is to be found in Pernell v. Southall Realty, 416 U.S. 363, 94 S. Ct. 1723, 40 L. Ed. 2d 198, 42 U.S.L.W. 4595 (1974). In Pernell, the Court held that an action to recover possession of real property brought in the District of Columbia pursuant to D.C. Code § 16–1501 entailed the right to a jury trial under the seventh amendment. The Court stated that it "has long assumed that actions to recover land, like actions for damages to a person or property, are actions at law triable to a jury." Id. at 4597, 94 S. Ct. at 1727. The Court then went on to distinguish Block v. Hirsh, 256 U.S. 135, 41 S. Ct. 458, 65 L. Ed. 865 (1921), a case relied upon heavily by the lower court in denying a right to a jury trial, in the following way:

> Block v. Hirsh merely stands for the principle that the Seventh Amendment is generally inapplicable in administrative proceedings, where jury trials would be incompatible with the whole concept of administrative adjudication. See Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. at 189 [94 S. Ct. 1005]. See also NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 [57 S. Ct. 615, 81 L. Ed. 893] (1937).

42 U.S.L.W. at 4601, 94 S. Ct. at 1733. The Court pointed out that under the statutory scheme operative in the District of Columbia, no administrative agency was involved either as a factfinder or as an adjudicator, each dispute coming fresh to the courts, and the Court said "We may assume that the Seventh Amendment would not be a bar to a congressional effort" to delegate the resolution of such disputes to an administrative agency without the right to a jury trial being granted. 42 U.S.L.W. at 4601, 94 S. Ct. at 1733. The majority opinion in this case finds "further support" for its holding on the seventh amendment issue in the Pernell decision by stating that § 45(l) "provides for just such a 'civil action.' " Consistent with oversimplification of the application of the Hepner line of cases to this issue, however, the majority ignores the fact that § 45(l) is not an isolated "civil action" provision but rather is a provision conceived with and embedded in a complex statutory scheme that is the very foundation of an administrative agency's power.

[452] In Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 94 S. Ct. 1005, 39 L. Ed. 2d 260, 42 U.S.L.W. (1974), the Court rejected an argument that a damage action brought under § 812 of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. § 3612, was not to be tried to a jury if the defendant timely requested that it be so tried. The plaintiff in Curtis relied heavily on two cases, NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 57 S. Ct. 615, 81 L. Ed. 893 (1937), and Katchen v. Landy, 382 U.S. 323, 86 S. Ct. 467, 15 L. Ed. 2d 391 (1966), to support her claim that the seventh amendment was not applicable to her right of action. In Jones & Lauglin, note 23 supra, the Court had upheld the award of back pay in an NLRB proceeding, rejecting a seventh amendment claim; in Katchen, the Court upheld over a seventh amendment claim the Bankruptcy Act's grant of summary jurisdiction in a trustee's action to compel a claimant to surrender a voidable preference. In commenting in Curtis, Mr. Justice Marshall, writing for a unanimous Court, stated that Jones & Laughlin > stands for the proposition that the Seventh Amendment is generally inapplicable in administrative proceedings, where jury trials would be incompatible with the whole concept of administrative adjudication and would substantially interfere with the [agency's] role in the statutory scheme.

42 U.S.L.W. at 4261, 94 S. Ct. at 1008 (emphasis added). Mr. Justice Marshall then commented on both Jones & Laughlin and Katchen, writing that > These cases uphold congressional power to entrust enforcement of statutory rights to an administrative process or specialized court of equity free from the strictures of the Seventh Amendment. But when Congress provides for enforcement of statutory rights in an ordinary civil action in the district courts, where there is obviously no functional justification for denying the jury trial right, a jury trial must be available if the action involves rights and remedies of the sort typically enforced in an action at law.

Id. (emphasis added) (footnote omitted). The emphasized language above is apparently a reference to one of the three factors listed as critical to determining the "legal" nature of an issue by Mr. Justice White in Ross v. Bernhard, 396 U.S. 531, 538, n. 10, 90 S. Ct. 733, 24 L. Ed. 2d 729 (1970). If one thing stands out from the discussion above of the legislative history of § 45(l), it is that Congress thought its constituents sufficiently "gullible" that to protect them from deceptive advertising, the FTC, as a "quasi-judicial" administrative agency, alone would have the expertise and resources to define and adjudicate what is or is not deceptive advertising. If any aspect of the FTC's role in the statutory scheme is made clear by the cases decided since 1938, it is that the FTC, and only the FTC, is in a position to deal with the question of deceptive advertising which "rests so heavily on inference and pragmatic judgment."[27] Indeed, it is the law of this case as previously determined by the Sixth Circuit, [453] Williams I, 381 F. 2d at 890, that the FTC is not required to "take a random sample to determine the meaning and impact of the advertisements." On the issue of meaning, what would a jury finding be other than a "random" sampling?

The argument is made that the two "other" factors listed in footnote 10 of Ross v. Bernhard, supra, i.e., "the pre-merger custom" and "the remedy sought," are said here to "point strongly toward jury trial." As for the former it is necessary only to reiterate that § 45(l) was and is one part of a complex regulatory scheme that, it so happens, was enacted almost contemporaneously with the merger of law and equity in the federal courts. Thus, the stark fact is that there is no "pre-merger" custom or practice to which we can look for guidance. As to the "remedy sought," here it is a civil penalty, recently raised by Congress to a maximum of $10,000 per violation, that serves the purpose of punishing those who would defy the orders of the FTC. The question of the meaning of the commercials is, in conclusion, not a question for trial de novo, whether by court or jury. It is a question which Congress entrusted to an administrative process and where there is a functional justification for denying the jury trial right. As such the seventh amendment does not apply. NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., supra. See Curtis v. Loether, supra.

II. CONSIDERATION OF THE ELEVEN COUNTS

A. The Function of the District Court

This opinion would be incomplete if I did not delineate what I believe to be the precise function to be played by the district court in a penalty proceeding under § 45(l). Although it could be argued that the underlying administrative law tests, now incorporated in the Administrative Procedure Act, might be read into § 45(l), we are confronted, as with the jury trial question, with the fact that Congress has never directly addressed this question. It would not be amiss to proceed with the words of Professor Llewellyn in mind:

[27] FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 385, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 1043, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965). The majority's statement that jury inadequacy is not a factor "when the jury is asked to determine only whether a television commercial has made various forbidden representations" is surprising. In Crane Co. v. American Standard, Inc., 490 F. 2d 332 (2d Cir. 1973), in considering whether Standard should be accorded a jury trial on the amount of damages recoverable in an "intricate" securities case, Judge Friendly's opinion for the court stated that "It would be hard to think of tasks less appropriate for performance by a jury . . . ." 490 F. 2d 332, 344. One such "less appropriate" task for a jury would be to decide a question that has for all practical purposes, taken 11 years of hearings, meetings, litigation, a full-fledged judicial review, discussion and correspondence, and more hearings, plus the unquestioned application of agency expertise, all at great expense to the public treasury, to decide. It is most difficult to see appellants' claim for a plenary or jury trial as anything other than "the tactics of delay and procrastination" that the Supreme Court tells us have been the hallmark of another industry's efforts to thwart the regulatory efficacy of another agency. See Weinberger v. Hynson, Westcott & Dunning, 412 U.S. at 626–627.

> Here [where Congress did not directly consider a question is passing a statute that has been on the books for many years] the quest is not properly for the sense originally intended by the statute, for the sense sought originally to be put into it, but rather for the sense which can be quarried out of it in the light of the new situation.[28]

This "situation" is "new" only in the sense that no case has ever addressed itself directly to the question what weight is to be accorded the FTC's determination that its cease and desist order has been violated. I view it as nothing more or less than the traditional question of what the scope-of-review is and on what record it is to be based.[29]

As previously noted, see note 8 supra, Judge Motley stated that her consideration was to be based on the plain language of the cease and desist order, the Sixth Circuit's decision enforcing that order, and "relevant proceedings before the FTC." This is eminently sound as a starting point. What, however, are "relevant proceedings before the FTC"? On what type of record is a § 45(l) proceeding brought in the district court to proceed?

Relevant proceedings include, of course, the record generated in the administrative process which led to the enforcement of the cease and desist order, as modified, by the Sixth Circuit. The importance of this record cannot be overemphasized, because as I have recounted at some length both the FTC and appellants litigated, albeit in administrative proceedings, the very questions that are now before this court in the form of modified commercials. This record has already been subjected to "substantial evidence" review in the [454] Sixth Circuit, whose decision binds any future consideration of the implications of that record and the reach of the cease and desist order.

But also before the district court (and hence before us on appeal) are the records of the administrative proceedings that were generated subsequent to the Sixth Circuit decision. These proceedings during the "compliance" phase consisted of public hearings, findings of the FTC, correspondence, meetings between representatives of the FTC and appellants, and the certification of facts by the FTC to the Attorney General along with transmittal of a draft complaint. It may be said that these proceedings are, on balance, informal, as opposed to the formal hearing procedures called for in § 45(c). As previously discussed relative to the adoption of 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), one feature of § 45(l) is to avoid the expense and delay of further formal proceedings after a cease and desist order has become final. At that point, justice must be swift as well as just. This point is nowhere better expressed than by Mr. Chief Justice Warren, writing for the Court in FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co.:

[28] K. Llewellyn, The Common Law Tradition—Deciding Appeals 374 (1960), quoted in Farmington Dowel Prods. Co. v. Forster Mfg. Co., 421 F. 2d 61, 73 (1st Cir. 1970).

[29] As to which see, e.g., 4 K. Davis, Administrative Law chs. 29 & 30; 5 U.S.C. §§ 701, 706.

> If respondents [subject to a final cease and desist order] in their subsequent commercials attempt to come as close to the line of misrepresentation as the Commission's order permits, they may without specifically intending to do so cross into the area proscribed by this order. However, it does not seem "unfair to require that one who deliberately goes perilously close to an area of proscribed conduct shall take the risk that he may cross the line." [30]

I take this passage to indicate the traditional standard of review for both the district courts and appellate courts in a § 45(l) proceeding: great deference is to be accorded to the FTC at this stage in the proceedings. As Mr. Chief Justice Warren made clear, the due process rights of those subject to cease and desist orders are largely protected by the compliance procedures themselves. 380 U.S. at 394 & n. 22.

This type of deference has been the subject of very recent Supreme Court consideration in Camp v. Pitts, 411 U.S. 138, 93 S. Ct. 1241, 36 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1973). There a decision of the Comptroller based on informal procedures [31] was thought by the court of appeals to require de novo review by the district court. In reversing, the Supreme Court held that the review was not to be de novo but rather upon the informal administrative record compiled below, and that review on such a record was to be on the "arbitrary, capricious" standard of 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A) and not on the "substantial evidence" test of 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(E) "which is appropriate when reviewing findings made on a hearing record. . . ." Id. at 141–142.[32] The Court went on to hold that the district court had the power "to obtain from the agency, either through affidavits or testimony, such additional explanation of the reasons for the agency decision as may prove necessary." Id. at 143.

[30] 380 U.S. at 393, quoting Boyce Motor Lines, Inc. v. United States, 342 U.S. 337, 340, 72 S. Ct. 329, 96 L. Ed. 367 (1952).

[31] The procedures there were not unlike those used during the compliance phase of this case. Compare 12 C.F.R. § 4.12(d) (1967) and 12 C.F.R. § 5.4, with 16 C.F.R. § 3.61 and United States v. St. Regis Paper Co., 355 F. 2d at 697.

[32] Nothing in the Camp Court's reference, 411 U.S. at 142, to its decision in Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 415, 91 S. Ct. 814, 823, 28 L. Ed. 2d 136 (1971), is to the contrary. In Overton Park, the Court made clear that, under the Administrative Procedure Act, de novo review is authorized only "when the action is adjudicatory in nature and the agency fact-finding procedures are inadequate . . . [or] when issues that were not before the agency are raised in a proceeding to enforce nonadjudicatory agency action." Id. (emphasis added).

While Camp is not controlling, it serves to point the way.[33] If the dis[455]trict court in a § 45(l) proceeding, after reviewing the record before it and hearing argument, deems the record inadequate for any purpose, there is no reason why it could not entertain a motion by either party for remand to the FTC to adduce the necessary facts and to have the FTC pass on those facts.[34] Such a procedure is already explicitly available to the court of appeals on initial review, and we do no violence to the statutory scheme by "quarrying" out of it this flexible tool. Indeed, the only reason we can perceive for not doing so is that those subject to a cease and desist order might rightly be thought to have the burden ab initio to bring such facts to the attention of the FTC under 16 C.F.R. § 3.61 during the compliance procedure.

If any doubt remained as to whether the district court below was required or empowered to hold a plenary trial on the questions as to which appellants assert a right both to a plenary and jury trial, one need only look to the type of evidence appellants seek to have introduced at such a trial to recognize that the attempt is nothing more than one to secure formal hearings which have been denied by Congress. Appellants demand, inter alia, a trial "in which its [sic] witnesses could be heard and in which it [sic] would have the opportunity to cross-examine Government witnesses taking contrary positions." Brief for Appellants at 23. It is difficult to see how such a proceeding would be anything less than equivalent to formal hearings, albeit before a judge presumably possessing no expertise whatsoever. Congress could have provided for formal hearings or plenary trials ad nauseum; it did not do so. See H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1937).[35]

[33] It might be argued that Camp is irrelevant to the question here because review there is based on the Administrative Procedure Act and that it would be inappropriate to import into the Federal Trade Commission Act concepts of review that are of general applicability. While any such "borrowing" must of necessity be done with great care, I see no reason why it cannot be done as long as the result is consistent with and furthers the purposes of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Moreover, it is not as if the Administrative Procedure Act sprang into life full-blown like Minerva; rather it was the embodiment of an extensive structure of administrative law which the courts and commentators had been constructing, albeit with some confusion and inconsistency, for several decades. As previously noted, see note 12 and accompanying text supra, at least one federal court has asserted jurisdiction under the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 704, to review the FTC's rejection of a compliance report submitted by a party subject to a valid cease and desist order. Floersheim v. Weinberger, 346 F. Supp. at 955. That court took jurisdiction on the basis that an order of the FTC issued in the compliance phase "may have the effect of a supplemental Cease and Desist Order without the benefit to the petitioner of judicial review." Id. Passing the question of the validity of the district court's assertion of jurisdiction, it is still noteworthy that the court sharply restricted its review in a § 45(l) proceeding:

> Review here is confined to a determination whether substantial evidence on the entire record . . . supports the Commission's response to the Report of Compliance so that the response cannot be said to have been arbitrary or clearly wrong.

Id. at 957 (emphasis added). In a penalty action based on the Floersheim violations would not that action be res judicata?

B. The Function of the Appellate Court

Taking the position that the question whether these 11 commercials violated the cease and desist order is a question to be decided without plenary trial to judge or jury, I address briefly the question of what function we perform at [456] the appellate level. As to questions of law decided by the district court, the court of appeals can exercise full powers of review as to the soundness of the conclusions reached. To the extent that any questions decided by the district court implicate the discretion of that court, e.g., the question of amount of penalty assessed, it is our obligation to defer to the decision of the district court unless that discretion has been abused or arbitrarily or capriciously exercised, such deference to be at least as great as in the case of, say, a criminal sentence of a youthful offender where reasons are required to be stated. See United States v. Kaylor, 491 F. 2d 1133 (2d Cir. 1974) (en banc).

C. The Order and the Sixth Circuit Decision

Having set out the pertinent parts of the cease and desist order below,[36] it may not be amiss to quote at some length the Sixth Circuit's summary of that order, by which, of course, this court is bound:

---

[35] Appellants elaborate on the true purpose of this plenary trial by suggesting that the Government has an obligation at this stage in the proceedings to present "experts in advertising, surveys of viewers, or poll or sample evidence." Brief for Appelants at 37. Passing the fact that the law of this case is that the FTC is under no obligation at any time to take a "random sample," Williams I, 381 F. 2d at 890, I am struck by the trial envisioned by appellants and the statement by the majority that deciding the question whether these 11 commercials make "forbidden" representations is a rather easy one after all and quite appropriate for a jury. Maybe my brethren saw something in the commercials we viewed that I did not, but I was impressed by my lack of expertise on the subject of meaning and deceptiveness.

[36] Appellants were prohibited, inter alia, from:

1. Disseminating or causing to be disseminated by means of the United States mails or by any means in commerce, as "commerce" is defined in the Federal Trade Commission Act, any advertisement

* * * * * * *

(b) which represents directly or by implication that the preparation is a generally effective remedy for tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling, nervousness or irritability;

(c) which represents directly or by implication that the preparation is an effective remedy for tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling, nervousness or irritability in more than a small minority of persons experiencing such symptoms;

(d) which represents directly or by implication that the use of such preparation will be beneficial in the treatment or relief of tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling, nervousness or irritability, unless such advertisement expressly limits the claim of effectiveness of the preparation to those persons whose symptoms are due to an existing deficiency of one or more of the vitamins contained in the preparation, or to an existing deficiency of iron or to iron deficiency anemia, and further, unless the advertisement also discloses clearly and conspicuously that: (1) in the great majority of persons who experience such symptoms, these symptoms are not caused by a deficiency of one or more of the vitamins

> The Commission's Order requires that not only must the Geritol advertisements be expressly limited to those persons whose symptoms are due to an existing deficiency [of vitamins or iron] . . . , but also the Geritol advertisements must affirmatively disclose the negative fact that a great majority of persons who experience these symptoms do not experience them because they have a vitamin or iron deficiency; that for the great majority of people experiencing these symptoms, Geritol will be of no benefit. Closely related to this requirement is the further requirement of the Order that the Geritol advertisements refrain from representing that the symptoms are generally reliable indications of iron deficiency.

381 F. 2d at 886–887 (footnotes omitted) (emphasis added). The Sixth Circuit's decision explained that its use of the word "symptoms" included the symptoms of tiredness, loss of strength, rundown feeling, nervousness or irritability. Id. at 886 n. 3.

It is beyond dispute here that in the 11 commercials before this court, no commercial even purported to make the affirmative disclosure required by the order and the Sixth Circuit's reading of that order.[37] At this point, it is obvious [457] that appellants embarked upon a course of action which would, in all probability, bring them "close[r] to the line," see text at note 30 supra, of violating the order than had they decided instead to make the affirmative disclosures required by the order and the Sixth Circuit opinion.[38] Of course, such was their right, but they had been duly warned by the FTC of its determination to ensure that, absent affirmative disclosures, the commercials could not even by inference refer to the "tiredness" symptom.[39] The absence of any such disclosures serves to sharpen focus on the words of the order itself, which forbade representation "directly or by implication that the preparation is a generally effective remedy for tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling . . . ." The precise question for this court, as it was for the court below, is whether appellants came so close to the contained in the preparation or by iron deficiency or iron deficiency anemia; and (2) for such persons the preparation will be of no benefit;

(e) which represents directly or by implication that tiredness, loss of strength, rundown feeling, nervousness or irritability are generally reliable indications of iron deficiency or iron deficiency anemia. . . .

In re J. B. Williams Co., FTC No. 8547 (Nov. 24, 1967) (modified order to cease and desist).

[37] Appellants' use of the affirmative disclosure, "The great majority of tired people don't feel that way because of iron poor blood, and Geritol won't help them," in commercials run prior to the 11 commercials before this court was rejected as insufficient by the FTC in an opinion handed down on December 2, 1968. In re J. B. Williams Co., FTC No. 8547 (Dec. 2, 1968). That decision is not subject to challenge here, but is part of the compliance phase record that was appropriately before the court below and is before this court on appeal.

[38] The Sixth Circuit described the affirmative disclosure provisions as being the "main thrust" of the FTC's order, Williams I, 381 F. 2d at 888. Given this interpretation of the order, it can fairly be said that adoption of a strategy that totally ignored the "main thrust" of the order would necessarily incur a greater risk of noncompliance unless radical changes were made not only in the appearance but in the substance of the commercials themselves.

line as to warrant deference to the FTC's conclusion that the line was crossed, "directly or by implication."

Counts 1–4 involve commercials denominated as the "AA" commercials. The pertinent portion of the commercial that is the basis for count one is set out in the margin;[40] the Government's argument centers on the inclusion of the phrases "iron power" and "blood-build[458]ing power." Appellants were given notice by the FTC prior to the dissemination of these commercials that it was the opinion of the FTC that these commercials violated the cease and desist order and that they would be in compliance with the order if the reference to "power" were deleted. Instead of acceding to this opinion by discontinuing the commercials, or attempting to litigate the issue,[41] appellants assumed the risk that their interpretation of the FTC's cease and desist order would prevail over the interpretation of that order by the very agency that had framed it.

Unless as an appellate court we sit to try de novo, the question before us on counts 1–4[42] is not, as the majority would have it, whether the inference drawn by the district court concerning the use of the word "power"[43] is either the "most likely" or "one that a jury would be compelled to draw." As for the inference being the "most likely," it is clear that such a standard would be in direct conflict with the idea

[40] The stage directions and text of this commercial are as follows:

1. MS ON TED MACK IN LIBRARY, STANDING NEXT TO LIGHT BOX. HE FLIPS SWITCH, LIGHTING UP LEFT HALF OF SHADOW BOX TO SHOW BAD BLOOD CELLS AND TITLE: "IRON-POOR BLOOD BEFORE GERITOL."	1. MACK: (O.C.): Hello, I'm Ted Mack. Your blood-stream has been called your lifeline. Look! You could have iron-poor blood cells like these . . . pale, few in number, badly shaped.
2. DISSOLVE TO FILM CLIP OF "POOR" & "RICH" CELLS. IN THIS SEQUENCE WE WILL USE OUR FILM OF THE BLOOD CELLS FRAMES 2 AND 3.	2. If that's so, take Geritol to build more blood cells . . . better shaped . . . rich in iron . . . like these.
3. CUT BACK TO SHOW MACK STANDING BY LIGHT BOX. HOLDS UP BOTTLE OF TABLETS.	3. There's no finer, more effective way to build iron-rich, red blood than with Geritol.
4. CUT TO TWO BOTTLES, BACK TO MACK.	4. Geritol-iron enters your blood-stream fast carrying its blood-building power to every part of your body.
5. TITLE: "TWICE THE IRON IN A POUND OF CALF'S LIVER."	5. Just 2 Geritol tablets or two tablespoons of Geritol liquid contain twice the iron in a pound of calf's liver.
6. CUT TO BOTTLES SHOT. TITLE: BUILDS IRON POWER FAST.	6. Take Geritol. It builds iron power in your blood fast! Geritol really works!

[42] The commercials involved in counts 2–4 are set out in the appendices to the district court opinion, Williams II, 354 F. Supp. at 554–556; the similarities between those three commercials and the commercial in count 1 are such that they can be considered under the same analysis that applies to count 1. The word "power" is the key to the discussion of all four.

[43] "To say that Geritol builds power in your blood is the effective equivalent of saying that Geritol builds power in you." Id. at 537.

that the FTC functions to protect "the vast multitude which includes the ignorant, the unthinking and the credulous, who, in making purchases, do not stop to analyze but too often are governed by appearances and general impressions." Aronberg v. FTC, 132 F. 2d 165, 167 (7th Cir. 1942). The standard to be applied in a direct review proceeding is whether such an inference might reasonably be drawn by some members of the general public, not by either all members of the general public or by a majority of the public.[44] Neither judges nor jurors are in a position to second-guess the FTC's opinion on this question. Again, the standard that should be applied here is whether the finding by the FTC, that some members of the general public would draw that inference, is arbitrary or capricious.[45]

On its face, the inference drawn by the district court below is unassailable under this standard. The relationship between the word "power" as used in the context of these commercials and the condemned practice of unqualified reference to "tiredness," etc., in the cease and desist order clearly supports the district court's conclusion on these counts.[46]

[459] Counts 5–9 involve commercials that appellants term the "sad-glad" commercials. In counts 5–7, the theme is that a woman has been made "sad" because she has discovered that she has "iron-poor blood." After taking Geritol, this same woman suddenly becomes glad. Appellants argued below that the "sad-glad" theme was essentially a play to "basic human emotion" and "human interest," and that there were no inferences to be drawn between "sadness" and "tiredness," etc. The district court, emphasizing the visual effect of the commercials, stated that the commercials > may be easily perceived as a contrast between feeling weak and run-down and feeling lively. The wife, who looks dreary and perhaps run-down in her "sad"

[44] The argument might be made that we do violence to the standard rule relating to summary judgment that a court must draw the inference most favorable to the party opposing the motion, and the majority's reference to this rule seems to put the argument in those terms. But this argument is based on the erroneous assumptions that the court in a § 45(l) proceeding has been given the authority to draw the "most likely" inference in the first place and that the Government must show, to prevail on its motion for summary judgment, that no other reasonable inferences might be drawn. As demonstrated in the text above, neither of these assumptions is true. The Supreme Court has recently had occasion to comment on the increased flexibility of the use of the summary judgment procedure in a case involving review of an administrative decision where no jury trial right obtained. See Weinberger v. Hynson, Westcott & Dunning, 412 U.S. at 621–622.

[45] Again, the fact that this "finding" was not made after formal hearings is completely irrelevant unless appellants can make an argument that such denial rises to the level of violation of constitutional due process, as to which see note 14 supra.

[46] The majority's opinion at footnote 23 states perfunctorily that "the FTC's assertion that use of this word [power] was a violation did not make it so . . ." amounts to a complete negation of agency expertise in the compliance phase of the proceedings and is a substitution of judgment on a mixed question of law and fact. If a court is dissatisfied with the reasoning, or lack of it, tendered by an agency to support its findings where only informal proceedings have been utilized to produce a record, that court has the power to demand such further evidence as is required for the execution of the court's limited responsibilities. See Camp v. Pitts, supra.

> state at the beginning of the advertisements, looks energetic when she gives a broad smile at the end of the advertisements.

United States v. Williams, 354 F. Supp. 521, 539 (S.D.N.Y. 1973) (Williams II). The district court properly points out that

> The common-sense response of many viewers to the advertisements—that the wife is not sad only because of the knowledge that she has iron-poor blood, but because of the effects that this condition has had and is having on her.

Id.[47] Having introduced into these commercials by implication the very symptoms that were the subject of the cease and desist order, appellants' argument that the commercials are without the order border on the frivolous.[48]

The commercials which are the subjects of counts 8–9 are of the same "sad-glad" motif as those in counts 5–7 and additionally involve the use of the word "power." The district court held, and there can be no doubt, that these commercials clearly violated the order. See Williams II, 354 F. Supp. at 543.[49]

The commercials involved in counts 10–11 present two distinct questions. The first question is whether FemIron comes within the scope of the order as "any other preparation . . . possessing substantially similar properties, [460] under whatever name or names sold." I would affirm the district court's conclusion as well as its reasoning on this point, Williams II, 354 F. Supp. at 531–532, adding only the comment that the marketing of FemIron, in effect, to evade the reach of the order was a strategy addressed specifically by Representative [47] To have "iron-poor blood," as an abstract proposition, would seem to have little or no meaning other than that condition might be thought by the layman suffering from it to affect his life through the symptomatic expression of that condition. This is not to say that some people might not be "sad" merely because a label had been attached to them as the result of a medical examination (which is presumably the only way one would be made aware of one's "condition"). It is to say that the layman's focus is apt to be on the symptoms of the underlying condition rather than on the condition itself. As has been said, "The physician may . . . need to exert the full prestige of his position to induce an asymptomatic individual to alter his habits . . . or to follow a therapeutic program throughout the rest of his life. Harrison's Principles of Internal Medicine 7 (6th ed. 1970). It goes without saying that questions of effect on the viewing public long subjected to deceptive advertising by a particular advertiser are best resolved by the FTC on the basis of its intimate knowledge of and experience in such matters.

[48] Appellants' claim that they thought the "sad-glad" theme would be acceptable to the FTC is quite curious in light of the FTC's prior decision, see note 39 supra, which went out of its way to point out that the "before-and-after" technique employed by appellants was considered to be in violation of the order. App. at 58–59. This finding has never been challenged by appellants, and is one that should be taken into consideration by the district court and this court in judging how close these commercials came to the "border line" of the FTC order. Even in the de novo review engaged in by the majority the December, 1968, decision is relevant.

[49] With respect to counts 5–9, the majority argues that the conclusion of the district court represents only "a possible inference [but] by no means the only one." Supra at 3180. Under the logic of the majority opinion, as discussed supra, an advertiser would always escape penalties for violation of a cease and desist order if more than one plausible inference could be drawn from a given commercial. This argument is untenable.

Chapman during the debate over the Wheeler-Lea Amendments in 1938. See text accompanying note 22 supra.

Thus I join with the majority in agreement that the FemIron commercials violated the order. In these commercials, a "tired mother" was juxtaposed against the "vital look" of a woman who took FemIron, and to this visual counterpoint was added the comment, "You see, some women even risk becoming anemic and tired." I would only add that the "tired-vigorous" dichotomy seen so clearly by the majority opinion in the FemIron commercials seems to this lay observer to be the very same sort of effect created by the "sad-glad" motif of the commercials in counts 5–9. There is perhaps a difference in the degree of success with which the dichotomy was drawn, but the visual impression in the FemIron commercials need not even have been fortified by the "tired" language to bring these commercials within the order, in my view as in the view of the FTC.

The conclusions I would reach are identical to those reached by the district court which apparently did not give any weight to the FTC's finding that the commercials violated the order. But as I have reiterated above, ignoring, as the majority does, the expertise of the FTC at a stage that can only be labeled as critical in the enforcement process runs counter to the entire regulatory scheme put forth in the Federal Trade Commission Act. Particularly with respect to the word "power" as used in counts 1–4, the benefit of the doubt, were there any, would have to go with the FTC, in the light of the history of appellants' advertising. This is not because the FTC is the sole judge of the question, which it is not; it is rather because, assuming the good-faith application of agency expertise during the compliance phase of the proceedings, a good-faith application not directly challenged here by appellants, the FTC has worked closely with the advertising of Geritol for over a decade. If its conclusion as to the inference to be drawn from the word "power" is entitled to any less respect than others it makes during the course of carrying out its assigned tasks, this can only be because that decision was not made as the consequence of formal hearings, but as has been said, Congress intended this to be the case. That Congress has the "leeway" to establish such procedures is beyond dispute. Cf. Weinberger v. Hynson, Westcott & Dunning, 412 U.S. 609, 622, 93 S. Ct. 2469, 37 L. Ed. 2d 207 (1973). The FTC, as its press release of June 25, 1969, makes clear, was at that time and had been throughout the compliance phase unanimously of the view that the use of the word "power" violated the order. The only dissent within the FTC was expressed by Commissioner Elman, joined by Commissioner Nicholson, who criticized his three colleagues for their extraordinary efforts to encourage voluntary compliance rather than instituting court proceedings to force compliance. App. at 104–07. It is nothing other than this unanimous view of the commissioners of the FTC that the majority overturns by suggesting that appellants may be entitled to summary judgment on counts 1–4. This is pure and simple judicial usurpation of the administrative process.

III. NOTICE

Appellants make two arguments concerning notice: (1) that penalties under § 45(l) do not accrue until one subject to an order has been notified by the FTC that he is not in compliance and until a reasonable time has been allotted to bring himself into compliance; (2) that liability on counts 5–11 should be limited because the FTC either failed to respond or delayed response to the submissions of appellants to the FTC in [461] connection with the commercials involved in those counts.

The first argument is based on the language of Continental Baking Co. v. Dixon, 283 F. Supp. 285, 287–288 (D. Del. 1968) (application for stay of penalties under § 45(l) denied), where it was said that penalties under § 45(l) could not accrue until the FTC made a "finding" of noncompliance and this finding, indicating the extent of noncompliance, was communicated to the alleged violator. The court there reasoned that any other interpretaiton would raise "serious questions of due process." Id. at 288. What these "serious questions" might be one is left to ponder, but the appellants' argument here is that a warning of noncompliance is required by the "breadth of the Commission's orders." Brief for Appellants at 40.

But, of course, the Sixth Circuit found that this very order "is not unduly vague and fairly apprises the Petitioners of what is required of them." Williams I, 381 F. 2d at 891. This holding is itself dispositive of appellants' constitutional claim; there is no authority standing for the proposition that due process requires or could be thought to require any additional notice. Certainly if civil rights advocates must contest the constitutionality of a temporary injunction enjoining their demonstration through the courts before disobeying it, Walker v. City of Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307, 87 S. Ct. 1824, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1210 (1967), it can hardly be argued here that appellants' right to engage in activity not protected by the constitution, i.e., dissemination of false and misleading advertising, requires greater constitutional protection.

Appellants' argument based on statutory grounds is equally without merit. The legislative history of § 45(l) reveals that one purpose of that section was to render orders final so that they might "become operative as to further transgressions. . . . " H.R. Rep. No. 1613, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 6 (1937). In floor debate, Representative Lea stated that § 45(l) provided "for making the order of the Federal Trade Commission automatically backed up by the court when it becomes final." 83 Cong. Rec. 392 (1938) (emphasis added). The statement of record by the FTC on this question, 33 Fed. Reg. 19097 (1968), is clearly consistent with § 45(l) and the legislative history of that section.

Appellants' other notice claim—that the FTC failed to respond or delayed response to submissions by appellants to the FTC, thereby somehow exposing appellants to greater penalties than they would conceivably have been subject to had the FTC jumped through their hoop more quickly—is in my view frivolous. It seeks to place on the agency the burden of leading an advertiser subject to a cease and desist order through the mine-field laid by that advertiser's attempts to read the order for as little as it is worth. Taken as an allegation of bad faith on the part of the FTC, it is unsupported and I agree with the majority that we need not comment on what measures a district court might take to remedy such a situation, as where a delay of four years occurred. See generally United States v. American Greetings Corp., 168 F. Supp. 45 (N.D. Ohio 1958), aff'd on opinion below, 272 F.2d 945 (6th Cir. 1959).

Finally, it puts the appellants' notice argument in its true light to recollect as the majority does—I need not repeat here—the facts of the administrative proceedings following the Sixth Circuit's denial of the petition to review the cease and desist order which had become final on December 31, 1967. See Part 1A supra. My only regret is that these proceedings were treated by the majority only in connection with the notice contentions.

IV. PENALTIES

The majority and I agree that § 45(l) as written allows for the imposition of a $5,000 (now $10,000) penalty "for each violation" with each violation being a "separate offense." Appellants argue that the "day of continuance" language should be read to limit penalties imposa[462]ble on any given day to $5,000 regardless of how many times or in how many places a commercial is run during that day. The appellants point out that under this holding, one subject to a mandatory order of the Commission would be liable to a penalty of only $5,000 per day for disobedience, whereas one, like appellant, who violates an order in 30 different places on the same day might be subject to $150,000 in penalties. I am in complete agreement with the majority on this point when it states that "Congress relied on the good sense of the FTC in making its certification to the Attorney General and, failing that, on the discretion of the court to prevent . . . an outrageous result."

This conclusion flows directly from the import of the statutory scheme and particularly 15 U.S.C. § 56, discussed supra. It is also relevant to our disposition of appellants' claims that (1) the Government is limited by the "certification" of the FTC in this case to collecting a maximum of $500,000 in penalties and (2) that the penalties are not assessable against both appellants because they essentially constitute the same entity for purposes of § 45(l).

As for the first question, based on the interpretation of 15 U.S.C. § 56 supra, there is no answer to the proposition that the Government is bound by the FTC's certification of a $500,000 penalty, and no more, if that figure was so certified. My reading of St. Regis Paper Co., supra, almost requires such a result and is supported by Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., supra. The dispute, then, centers on whether such a figure was in fact certified. The certification letter itself, App. at 296–301, indicated no figures for penalties except by reference to a draft complaint submitted by the FTC to the Attorney General, but that clearly limited the certification to "Judgment against defendants in the total sum of $500,000." App. at 324. I do not think we have to accept the reasoning of the district court that the draft complaint "was intended [merely] to facilitate the Attorney General's task." Williams II, 354 F. Supp. at 546. I thus can agree that FTC expertise and discretion were lodged in this decision to seek penalties limited to $500,000, and that this decision should be given force here, that is, that the total sum assessable against both appellants is $500,000.[50]

Because the district court's order was against J. B. Williams for $456,000 and Parkson for $356,000, I would affirm so much of it as pertains to J. B. Williams. The question then would be whether Parkson is liable for the remaining $44,000. These two corporations have, since 1962, represented themselves as separate entities before the FTC and before the Sixth Circuit. The majority would pierce the corporate veil to provide Parkson with immunity. I would not. The reason for not doing so is not merely because J. B. Williams was seeking to avoid the 15 per cent advertising agency fee (taken in the form of a discount by the media to the agency from the price paid by the sponsor). Rather it seems to me that it was well within the exercise of FTC discretion on the basis of the course of appellants' conduct to charge Parkson with responsibility. Its role as a captive, wholly-owned agency was to work out the violative advertising. The "pitch" worked out would—like that of the patent medicine salesman of years gone by—imply a lot and say little and thereby convey a meaning deceptively appealing while hopefully leaving law enforcement holding the bag by little changes in the pitch at the last moment. While the ethics of the independent advertising agencies of Madison Avenue may not necessarily rival those of Calpurnia, particularly when it comes to keeping a big customer's account, one would suppose that their fear, were they in Parkson's situation, of personal (or corporate) liability would result in coun-[463]sel to the client of moderation or restraint in dealing with the Commission's order. Here there was none since the "agency" is not just captive but slave. In Schenley Distillers Corp. v. United States, 326 U.S. 432, 437, 66 S. Ct. 247, 249, 90 L. Ed. 181 (1946), the Supreme Court said:

[50] The logic in the majority's reliance on the certification in this regard but in no other is beyond my capacity to follow.

> While corporate entities may be disregarded where they are made the implement for avoiding a clear legislative purpose, they will not be disregarded where those in control have deliberately adopted the corporate form in order to secure its advantages and where no violence to the legislative purpose is done by treating the corporate entity as a separate legal person. One who has created a corporate arrangement, chosen as a means of carrying out his business purposes, does not have the choice of disregarding the corporate entity in order to avoid the obligations which the statute lays upon it for the protection of the public.

Parkson was subject to the cease and desist order. It violated the order. It should not escape responsibility—in my view to the extent of only $44,000—for that violation. Nor is it an answer to say that J. B. Williams might not have employed any agency; we are not here to deal in hypothetical exercises.

V. THE EVIDENTIARY HEARING

The question of the right of appellants to an evidentiary hearing on subjects such as their alleged "good faith belief" that the commercials did not violate the order is open in my view as to all counts. The question may be addressed in two ways: first, whether there is any right to such a hearing as a matter of law; second, if so, what is the appropriate forum for such a hearing?

The FTC's decision to seek penalties against appellants constituted a decision by it that appellants had not exercised good faith in its attempts to comply with the cease and desist order. In its statement released in June 25, 1969, a majority of the commissioners stated their belief that "the end result of these compliance negotiations will be the cessation of deceptive advertising for Geritol. . . ." App. at 102. The only inference to be drawn from the institution of this action under § 45(l) is that the three-member majority of the FTC that ascribed to the statement above on June 25, 1969, over the vehement objection of Commissioner Elman, joined by Commissioner Nicholson, no longer saw appellants' efforts as exhibiting "good faith" on November 28, 1969, when the certification of facts to the Attorney General took place. Indeed, a review of the relevant documents in this case, including but not limited to that statement, the findings and opinion issued by the FTC on December 2, 1968, and the letter of certification itself, leave no doubt that the FTC exercised a patience toward appellants that in the history of administrative law must be rather remarkable.

Agreeing with the majority's statement that the district court's function with respect to penalties is limited to the prevention of an "outrageous result," there is not one scintilla of support in the evidence proffered by the appellants to be taken in a hearing that could possibly affect the outcome here. But even were this not so, the holding that the FTC exercised discretion in arriving at the $500,000 figure indicates that it is the FTC that is to pass in the first instance on the question upon which appellants now seek an evidentiary hearing in the district court. Who, better than the FTC, is in a position to determine the extent to which appellants exercise "good faith"? In a proper case, and this is not one, the district court has the power to order further evidence to be adduced before the FTC, and to review the FTC's conclusion under the "arbitrary or capricious" standard. As Judge Leventhal said in Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., supra, there are > frequent references in the legislative history [of the Wheeler-Lea Amend[464]ments] to the Trade Commission's expertise in dealing with commercial practices, its abilities to act as a buffer in securing voluntary compliance through informal proceedings, and its sound discretion in determining when formal enforcement measures were necessary.

I would affirm as to J. B. Williams Co., Inc. I would modify, and as modified, affirm the judgment against Parkson Advertising Agency, Inc.

Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F. 2d at 998 (footnote omitted) (emphasis added).

*Not otherwise reported. See also pp. 852, 1107, 1449, 1500 herein.

This matter comes before the Court upon plaintiffs' demand for disclosure of certain documents pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(3)(1970) (hereinafter FOIA).

The facts underlying the instant controversy have been set forth in detail in the Court's previous Memorandum in this case. Control Data Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission, No. 4–74–Civ. 25 (February 28, 1974). The Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter FTC or the Commission) has instituted administrative proceedings against the plaintiffs for alleged violations of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45.

After commencement of those proceedings, the plaintiffs made a motion to the administrative law judge conducting the initial hearing in the matter to dismiss the complaint. They contended that a 13-month lapse between their submission of a proposed consent decree and the Commission's rejection of the proposal and simultaneous initiation of the pending proceedings constituted prejudicial delay. To support their claim, they sought a subpoena duces tecum for FTC documents falling within four designated categories relating to this lapse in time.

The administrative law judge considered the prejudice issue to be premature. Accordingly, he denied granting the subpoena and also denied the motion to dismiss, without prejudice to its renewal subsequently in the proceedings.

The plaintiffs, following FTC procedures, then made a similar demand for the identical documents from the Commission. After two months passed without response from the Commission, the plaintiffs instituted this action.

In their complaint plaintiffs sought declaratory relief pertaining to certain of the Commission's procedural regulations that they claimed deprive them of a fair hearing in the administrative proceedings. They also sought disclosure under the FOIA of the same documents that they had previously demanded from the administrative law judge and the Commission.[1] Their complaint further sought to enjoin the pending administrative proceedings until determination by the Court of their rights under the FOIA.

Following the initiation of this action the FTC responded to the prior request for production of documents. The Commission disclosed a copy of Chapter 3.21 of its Operating Manual, a three-page document dealing with the Commission's general regulations relative to recommendations by its staff that administrative proceedings be initiated.

[1] The following materials were sought from the administrative law judge, the Commission, and then in this action: documents regarding the Commission's practice or policy of preparedness for litigation at the time the Commission's staff recommends issuance of a notice of proposed complaint, documents regarding the time consumed by the Commission in evaluating and passing upon proposed consent decrees, documents regarding the 13-month lapse in time between submission of the proposed consent decree and the FTC's rejection of it, and documents regarding the effects of this time lapse.

The Commission further informed the plaintiffs that it had located two other documents pertinent to their request. But it claimed these documents to be exempt from disclosure under specific exemptions of the FOIA. It also said that no other documents relevant to the request exist.

The Court ruled that plaintiffs' failure to exhaust their administrative remedies precluded granting relief on their fair hearing claim. It further held that it would not enjoin the pending administrative proceedings. The primary basis for this determination was the Supreme Court's opinion in Renegotiation Board v. Bannercraft Clothing Company, Inc., 42 L.W. 4203 (No. 72–822, Feb. 19, 1974), which was decided shortly after the instant case was taken under advisement.

The Court went on, however, to order the Commission to submit in camera the two documents that were claimed to be exempt from disclosure. It also required the Commission to substantiate its claim that no other documents exist relevant to the plaintiffs' request.

The two documents have been submitted and examined in camera. Additionally, the Commission has submitted an affidavit by its secretary supporting the claim that no other pertinent documents exist. (Affidavit of Charles A. Tobin.)

The affidavit demonstrates that the Commission has undertaken a reasonably thorough search for any relevant materials. It further assures that if any such documents do turn up in the future the plaintiffs will be so informed. This affidavit satisfies the Court as to the probable nonexistence of documents other than the one already disclosed and those involved here.

One of the documents claimed to be exempt is a 3½ page memorandum from J. Thomas Rosch, director of the Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection, to the Bureau's professional staff concerning "Trial Preparation; Investigational Procedures" (hereinafter Rosch memorandum). The other is a single paragraph extracted from an 18-page memorandum from Richard C. Foster, assistant director of the FTC's Division of Marketing Practices, to the Commission apparently summarizing the Commission's files involving the instant plaintiffs (hereinafter Foster memorandum). The Court will consider each memorandum separately.

I. The Rosch Memorandum

The Rosch memorandum is divided into two parts. The first portion deals with the "Standard of Preparation" required by the staff before recommending to the Commission that a complaint be issued or a rule promulgated. It sets forth the standard and its underlying strategic rationale.

The second portion of the memorandum, the last 2½ pages, lays out a seven step procedure for conducting formal investigations by the staff. Two introductory paragraphs and three closing paragraphs contain Rosch's reasons for the procedures, means by which they may be implemented, and strategies to be pursued by the staff.

The Commission claims the memorandum to be exempt under two specific exemptions of the FOIA: (b) (2), "related solely to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency;" and (b) (5), "interagency or intra-agency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency."

The FOIA was enacted for the purpose of assuring citizens the right of access to many records of the Federal government. E.g., Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F. 2d 820, 823 (D.C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, No. 73–1107, 42 L.W. 3520 (March 19, 1974); Ethyl Corporation v. Environmental Protection Agency, 478 F. 2d 47, 48 (4th Cir. 1973); Stokes v. Brennan, 476 F. 2d 699, 700–701 (5th Cir. 1973); Soucie v. David, 448 F. 2d 1067, 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1971); Epstein v. Resor, 421 F. 2d 930, 932 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 398 U.S. 965 (1970); Long v. U.S. Internal Revenue Service, 349 F. Supp. 871, 873 (W.D. Wash. 1972); City of Concord v. Ambrose, 333 F. Supp. 958 (N.D. Cal. 1971). In essence, it provides for disclosure of all governmental documents, unless they are covered by one of the nine specific statutory exemptions. Vaughn v. Rosen, supra, 823; Getman v. N.L.R.B., 450 F. 2d 670, 672 (D.C. Cir.), stay denied, 404 U.S. 1204 (1971). The statutory exemptions are exclusive and are to be narrowly construed. Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 88 (1973); Montrose Chemical Corporation of California v. Train, No. 73–1443, 1444, at 5–6 (D.C. Cir. Jan. 21, 1974); Ethyl Corporation v. Environmental Protection Agency, supra, 49.

"In short, the Act makes disclosure the rule and secrecy the exception." Ethyl Corporation v. Environmental Protection Agency, supra, 49. To this end, this Court, within the district in which both of the plaintiffs have their principal places of business, is empowered to conduct de novo review of the FTC's exemption claims. 5 U.S.C. § 552(a) (3). The Commission has the burden of justifying any claim of exemption under the FOIA. Ibid.

Initially, (b) (2) may be discounted as being inapplicable here. In enacting the FOIA the Senate and House had different views of the scope of (b) (2). The Senate considered (b) (2) to be narrowly restricted to relatively routine matters concerning the day-to-day activities of agency employees. In approving the measure, the Senate Judiciary Committee said that (b)(2)— > relates only to the internal personnel rules and practices of an agency. Examples of this may be rules as to personnel's use of parking facilities or regulations of lunch hours, statements of policy as to sick leave, and the like. S. Rep. No. 813, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 8 (1965).

The House Government Operations Committee took a much broader view of (b)(2). It said that it was intended to cover "[o]perating rules, guidelines, and manuals of procedure for Government investigators or examiners . . . ." H.R. Rep. No. 1497, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 10, U.S. Code Cong. & Adm. News, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., 2418, at 2427 (1966).

The cases are not uniform in interpreting (b)(2), but the weight of authority and the better view is expressed in those decisions adopting the more limited Senate version. See Stokes v. Brennan, supra, 702–703; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, 467 F. 2d 787, 796–797 (6th Cir. 1972); Benson v. General Services Administration, 289 F. Supp. 590 (W.D. Wash. 1968), aff'd on other grounds, 415 F. 2d 878 (9th Cir. 1969); Long v. U.S. Internal Revenue Service, supra, 874; Consumers Union of United States v. Veterans Administration, 301 F. Supp. 796 (S.D.N.Y. 1969), appeal dismissed as moot, 436 F. 2d 1363 (2d Cir. 1971); K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, 145, 174–175 (Supp. 1970), updating and republishing his article, The Information Act: A Preliminary Analysis, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 761 (1967). But see Polymers, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 414 F. 2d 999 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1010 (1970); Tietze v. Richardson, 342 F. Supp. 610 (S.D. Tex. 1972); cf. City of Concord v. Ambrose, supra.

There are three primary reasons for considering the Senate's view as more accurate. First, the language of the exemption suggests concern with the conditions of employment, not matters of policy. Additionally, adopting the House's version would lead to conflicts with other portions of the FOIA, notably (a)(1)(C) (requiring publication, inter alia, of agency "rules of procedure" in the Federal Register) and (a)(2)(C) (requiring that certain staff manuals and instructions be made available to the public). Moreover, the Senate's version was before the House when the House approved (b)(2) in the identical language as the Senate had passed. See Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, supra, 797; Stokes v. Brennan, supra, 703.

Treated in the narrow sense, compatible with the Senate's version, (b)(2) is inapplicable to the Rosch memorandum. This document sets out standards and procedures to be followed by the FTC staff in conducting the Commission's official functions. It has no bearing on the "employee-employer type concerns" that were central to the Senate's interpretation of the exemption. Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, supra, 797.

Attention must, therefore, be directed to whether the memorandum is exempt under (b)(5). In dealing with this provision, the Supreme Court has recognized that differentiating "between what may be withheld and what must be disclosed is not without difficulties." Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 86.

On its face (b)(5) could "encompass nearly anything an agency puts in writing." Note, The Freedom of Information Act and the Exemption for Intra-Agency Memoranda, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, 1048–1049 (1973). Despite its open-ended language, the provision is limited by its two underlying policy considerations: preventing premature disclosure that might unduly impede the proper functioning of the administrative processes,[2] and preventing inhibition of the free, frank exchange of information and recommendations among governmental personnel.[3]

Additionally, the exemption by its terms is limited to documents that "would not be available by law to a party . . . in litigation with the agency." § 552(b)(5). The language and legislative history of the provision demonstrate that (b)(5) was intended to incorporate "the same flexible, common-sense approach that has long governed" the discovery of Government documents by private parties engaged in litigation with Government agencies. Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 91.[4]

In Mink, the Supreme Court approved of the dichotomy that had developed in cases under the FOIA between "materials reflecting deliberative or policy-making processes on the one hand, and purely factual, investigative matters on the other." 410 U.S. at 89. Under Mink, the former may be withheld, while the latter, the "purely factual," is not within the purview of (b)(5) and hence is not exempt from disclosure. Furthermore, if matters reflecting the deliberative processes and those of a factual nature both appear in a memorandum, the factual information must be disclosed if it is severable from the deliberative items. Ibid., 91; Vaughn v. Rosen, supra, 825.

[3] See, e.g., Stokes v. Brennan, supra, 703; International Paper Company v. Federal Power Commission, 438 F. 2d 1349, 1358–1359 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 827 (1971); Ackerly v. Ley, 420 F. 2d 1336, 1341 (D.C. Cir. 1969); S. Rep. No. 813, supra, p. 3; H.R. Rep. No. 1427, supra, p. 10; Note, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, supra, 1049.

[4] While principles of discovery are to govern disclosure under the FOIA, there are several significant differences between the two. A person need not be engaged in litigation in order to seek disclosure under the FOIA. The FOIA explicitly compels disclosure to "any person." § 552(a)(3). See Bannercraft Clothing Company v. Renegotiation Board, 466 F. 2d 345, 351–352 (D.C. Cir. 1972), rev'd on other grounds, 42 L.W. 4203 (No. 72–822, Feb. 19, 1974).

Unlike discovery, a claimant's need for access to the material he seeks is not a factor in disclosure under the FOIA. Sterling Drug, Inc. v. F.T.C., 450 F. 2d 698, 704–705, (D.C. Cir. 1971) (apparently rejecting dictum in American Mail Line, Ltd. v. Gulick, 411 F. 2d 696, 703 (D.C. Cir. 1969); see also Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 86; H.R. Rep. No. 1427, supra, p. 10; Note, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, supra, 1051, n. 22. But see International Paper Company v. Federal Power Commission, n. 3, supra, 1359. Thus, if access is granted here, the documents at issue would be available to all members of the public, without any restriction or limitation on usage or dissemination. City of Concord v. Ambrose, supra, 959.

The Rosch memorandum as a whole is not readily susceptible to classification along the lines of the Mink dichotomy. The bulk of the document contains reasons and strategies underlying standards and procedures to be followed by the FTC staff. These segments, "work product" in the parlance of civil discovery, clearly do reflect Rosch's mental processes and would not be discoverable. Thus, these portions are within the (b)(5) exemption.

But the guidelines themselves, both as to the standard of preparation and investigative procedures (except for the first step in the investigative process) are neither reflective of "deliberative . . . processes" or "purely factual" in the sense that these terms are used in Mink and other (b)(5) cases. E.g., Vaughn v. Rosen, supra (evaluations of certain agencies' personnel management programs; held, remanded with directions to determine if exemption applies); Ethyl Corporation v. Environmental Protection Agency, supra (medical and scientific data considered in connection with issuance of proposed lead regulations under the Clean Air Act; held, "purely factual," and thus not exempt).

Because the Mink dichotomy is inapplicable to these portions of the Rosch memorandum, the question is whether (b)(5) was aimed at shielding only matters relating to deliberative processes, or whether it was intended to compel disclosure of only the "purely factual." If the former, the segments here in question would have to be disclosed because they are not reflective of deliberative processes; if the latter, they would not have to be divulged because they are not "purely factual."

The legislative history surrounding (b)(5) and the cases construing the exemption suggest the appropriateness of the former approach. Congress sought to shield from disclosure only those matters reflective of the deliberative processes; all else was intended to be outside the ambit of (b)(5). See Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 89–91; Ethyl Corporation v. Environmental Protection Agency, supra, 49; Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp. v. Renegotiation Board, 425 F. 2d 578, 570 (D.C. Cir. 1970); S. Rep. No. 813, p. 9; H.R. Rep. No. 1497, p. 10.

These portions of the Rosch memorandum set forth objective criteria pertaining to the conduct of the Commission's work. They do not contain any advice, recommendations, opinions, or other subjective ideas that reflect policy-making processes within the scope of (b)(5). See Bristol-Myers Company v. F.T.C., 424 F. 2d 935, 939 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 284 (1970); Ackerly v. Ley, n.3, supra, 1341; Souci v. David, supra, 1077–1078; see also Carl Zeiss Stiftung v. V.E.B. Carl Zeiss, Jena, 40 F.R.D. 318, 324 (D.C. Cir. 1966), aff'd 384 F. 2d 979 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 952 (1967); H.R. Rep. No. 1427, 89th Cong., 2d Sess., supra, p. 10; Note, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, supra, 1049–1050.

Rather than being intertwined with the decision-making processes, these few segments contain the ultimate decisions themselves. Disclosing them would not violate the "bar against probing the mental processes of an executive branch decision-maker." Montrose Chemical Corporation of California v. Train, supra, 12. Since they set forth guidelines that presumably are being followed by the staff, access to them would not offend the policies against premature disclosure and freedom from inhibition underlying (b)(5).[5] The portions reflecting the reasoning processes by which these guidelines were reached may be severed from the rest of the document in order to preserve the privilege of confidentiality that attaches only to the advisory and consultative facets of administrative decision-making. See Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 86.

[5] The disclosable portions of the Rosch memorandum comprise less than one-third of the overall length of the document; about two-thirds is exempt as reflective of his mental or deliberative processes. Disclosure of the entire memorandum, including the "deliberative" portions, would be compelled if the Court were to consider it within the "adopted as policy" doctrine.

Under this standard, documents containing statements of policy actually adopted or followed by an agency are not exempt, even if they contain segments that reflect deliberative processes that would otherwise fall within (b)(5). Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp. v. Renegotiation Board, supra, 482 F. 2d at 718–720; Sterling Drug, Inc. v. F.T.C., n. 4, supra, 706–708; 713, n. 8 (Bazelon, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); American Mail Lines, Ltd. v. Gulick, n. 4, supra; Note, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, supra, 1057–1058.

Although not expressly dealing with this issue, the Commission maintains that the Rosch memorandum merely sets forth his own personal views and does not purport to establish the policy of the Commission proper. Defendants' Supplemental Memorandum in Support of Their Motion for Summary Judgment, 8.

But a policy need not be formally or officially adopted by the agency in order to come within this doctrine. As long as it is adhered to in a de facto fashion by the agency, it is not exempt, regardless of how it came to be followed. See, Sterling Drug, Inc. v. F.T.C., n. 4, supra, 713, n. 8 (Bazelon, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see also General Services Administration v. Benson, 415 F. 2d 878 (9th Cir. 1969), aff'g 289 F. Supp. 590 (W.D. Wash. 1968); Note, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 1047, supra, 1062–1063.

From all appearances, the guidelines set forth in the Rosch memorandum were intended to be, and presumably have been, adhered to by the staff. In that sense, they have been "adopted" for functional purposes by the Commission.

But these guidelines do not contain the "policy" of the Commission in the sense that that phrase is used in the cases that have followed this doctrine. The standard has been employed in cases involving substantive policies of an administrative agency. In contrast, the Rosch memorandum pertains to internal operations of the Commission's staff. The "adopted as policy" doctrine, therefore, is inapplicable.

Apart from the unwieldy treatment of the Rosch memorandum under the Mink dichotomy, what really is at issue here is whether an agency can avoid disclosure of its operating procedures under the guise of the exemption of (b) (5). Merely because the information has been put in the form of an intra-agency memorandum does not necessarily shield it from public disclosure under (b) (5). See Bristol-Myers Company v. F.T.C., supra, 939; cf. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corp. v. Renegotiation Board, 482 F. 2d 710, 717 (9th Cir. 1973).

In Long v. U.S. Internal Revenue Service, supra, (b) (5) was ruled inapplicable to two documents used by Internal Revenue agents in entering closing agreements with taxpayers. One of the documents was a purely factual statistical study, the other was an instructional handbook. 349 F. Supp. at 874. The nearest analogue of the handbook in Long is the Chapter of the Operating Manual that has already been disclosed here by the Commission. The information in the Rosch memorandum elaborates, in part, on portions of the guidelines in the Operating Manual. Although the Rosch memorandum differs somewhat from the handbook in Long, there is one critical similarity: both documents set forth fundamental operating procedures for the conduct of the official functions of an administrative agency.

In setting the standards by which the FTC carries out its investigations and initiates administrative proceedings, the Rosch memorandum contains the kind of information that the public has a right to know under the FOIA.[6] This material should be made available even though it is put in the form of an intra-agency memorandum specifically addressed to agency personnel. See Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, supra, 795; K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, supra, 137.

It is difficult to envision how disclosure of the limited segments setting forth the guidelines for the staff can seriously harm the Commission. Compare City of Concord v. Ambrose, supra, 959. They merely lay out a timetable for the conduct of administrative investigations and proceedings.

By excising those portions reflecting Rosch's reasoning processes, disclosure will not be "injurious to the consultative functions of government" that (b) (5) was intended to protect. Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 87, quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem- ical Corp. v. United States, 141 Ct. Cl. 38, 49, 157 F. Supp. 939, 946 (1958).

[6] The Commission has not argued that the Rosch memorandum is law enforcement in character, rather than administrative in nature, and hence not subject to disclosure under § 552(a) (2) (C). This provision mandates making available for public inspection and copying "administrative staff manuals and instructions to staff that affect a member of the public." See Stokes v. Brennan, supra, 701–702; Hawkes v. Internal Revenue Service, supra, 795. Even if it were not characterized as administrative in nature, a question the Court does not pass upon, it would still be subject to disclosure under §552(a) (3) unless it satisfied one of the specific exemptions of § (b). See Long v. U.S. Internal Revenue Service, supra.

The Commission, therefore, will be required to provide plaintiffs with a copy of the Rosch memorandum, subject to the deletion of certain portions indicated by the Court thereon that are exempt because they reflect the deliberative processes of the declarant Rosch.[7]

II. The Foster Memorandum

According to the affidavit of the Commission's secretary, the single paragraph submitted from the 18-page Foster memorandum is the only portion of the document pertinent to the 13-month time lapse concerning which plaintiffs have requested disclosure. Affidavit of Charles A. Tobin, p. 2, n. 1. In this seven sentence paragraph Foster mentions the form of the complaint that he recommends and alludes to some of the means by which the complaint was compiled.

The secretary's averment and the information contained in the paragraph itself establish that in camera inspection of the document as a whole is not needed here. See Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 93.

Unlike the portions required to be disclosed in the Rosch memorandum, this paragraph exclusively reflects Foster's deliberative processes. His recommendations and advice are interspersed with other comments bearing upon the internal policy-making processes of the Commission. In sum, the whole paragraph contains the kind of consultative materials that (b)(5) was intended to protect.

The Foster memorandum also is exempt under (b)(7), which provides for nondisclosure of "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes except to the extent available by law to a party other than an agency." The test for determining the applicability of this provision is whether the materials sought "relate to anything that can fairly be characterized as an enforcement proceeding." Aspin v. Department of Defense, No. 72–2147, at 6 (D.C. Cir. Nov. 26, 1973), quoting Bristol-Myers Company v. F.T.C., supra, 939.

The Foster memorandum apparently summarizes the Commission's files pertaining to the plaintiffs herein. It is dated August 30, 1973, nearly a year after submission of the proposed consent decree and about seven weeks prior to the FTC's rejection of the proposal and commencement of the administrative proceedings. It appears to have been used in connection with the FTC's preparations for those proceedings.

[7] The Court has prepared an edited version of the Rosch memorandum, deleting all of the exempt portions of the document. In order to preserve the confidentiality of the entire memorandum should an appeal be taken of this decision, the edited copy is being submitted to the Commission, which in turn will then be required to transmit it to the plaintiffs. Additionally, the memorandum in its full original form will be marked and sealed as Court Exhibit No. 1. The Foster memorandum will be marked and sealed as Court Exhibit No. 2.

Being properly classifiable as part of the FTC's "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes," the exemption automatically attaches. This is so regardless of the needs of the claimants, Weisberg v. U.S. Department of Justice, No. 71–1026, at 9 (D.C. Cir. Oct. 24, 1973); see also Environmental Protection Agency v. Mink, supra, 86; and also regardless of whether the Government would in fact be harmed by disclosure. Ditlow v. Brinegar, No. 73–1984, at 3 (D.C. Cir. Feb. 27, 1974).

The exemption retains its applicability even though the FTC has already brought proceedings against the plaintiffs herein. Aspin v. Department of Defense, supra, 11; see also Frankel v. S.E.C., 460 F. 2d 813, 817 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 889 (1972).

The exception contained in the last phrase of (b)(7) is inapplicable here. Under that provision, disclosure must be made "to the extent available by law to party other than an agency." But this phrase is not intended to change procedures otherwise established or give earlier or additional access to investigatory files than a party could obtain while directly involved in litigation with the agency. H.R. Rep. No. 1427, p. 11. See also Frankel v. S.E.C., supra, 818; Evans v. Department of Transportation of United States, 446 F. 2d 821 (5th Cir. 1971); Benson v. United States, 309 F. Supp. 1144, 1146 (D. Neb. 1970); Cooney v. Sun Shipbuilding Co., 288 F. Supp. 708 (E.D. Pa. 1968). The Foster memorandum would not be available at this stage of the administrative proceedings and hence does not fall within the exception to (b)(7).

Accordingly, IT IS ORDERED:

That the Commission promptly provide the plaintiffs with a copy of the Rosch memorandum, subject to certain deletions, attached herein as Appendix A.*

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED:

That the Rosch memorandum in its entirety be marked and sealed as Court Exhibit No. 1 and that the Foster memorandum be marked and sealed as Court Exhibit No. 2.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED:

That plaintiffs' other requests for disclosure be, and they hereby are, denied.

Civ. A. No. 74 Civ. 1751. F.T.C. Docket No. 8916.

(United States District Court, Southern District of New York, May 16, 1974)

On a motion to enjoin the Commission from proceeding in Docket 8916, court held that the alleged injuries were premature because plaintiffs failed to exhaust their administrative remedies and would not cause them irreparable harm. Motion to enjoin denied and Commission motion to dismiss granted.

Before FRANKEL, District Judge.

In this action plaintiffs seek (1) to halt an adjudicatory proceeding of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) that has been under way for well over a year (in fact, practically speaking, for nearly two years), (2) to bar enforcement of an FTC rule promulgated three years ago, (3) to force the FTC to hold new rule-making proceedings, and to block or limit the agency's action in other, related aspects. The suit seems on its fact to collide with fundamental obstacles barring judicial interference with the administrative process at intermediate stages. Further study confirms this initial apprehension. For reasons outlined below, plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction will be denied and defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint will be granted.

Late in 1969 the Commission initiated a rule-making proceeding by publishing a proposed rule designed to regulate retail food store advertising. With evidently particular concern about alleged practices of retail food chains, and spurred by evidence reflected in a staff report on the subject, the agency proposed to provide in its rule that it would be "an unfair method of competition and/or an unfair or deceptive act or practice" for a chain to (1) advertise a product at a stated price "in an area served by any of its stores which do not have such products in stock, and readily available to customers in self-service areas of such stores" or (2) "[f]ail to make the advertised items conspicuously and readily available for sale at or below the advertised prices. . . ." During proceedings in which both plaintiffs herein took part, along with other industry members and trade associations, the plaintiff National Association of Food Chains (NAFC) proposed its different version of the rule, including phrases now said to be unconstitutionally vague. Plaintiff Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company, Inc. (A & P), likewise failed to perceive the vagueness problem of which a great deal is made now. In any event, in May of 1971, the FTC promulgated the rule in its final form, effective July 12, 1971, adhering to the original in part and adopting in part some of the key language the NAFC had proposed. 16 C.F.R. § 424.1 (1973) (referred to hereinafter as Rule 424).*

*Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. ¶75,080 at 96,814 (1974-1 Trade Cases). For case before the Commission, see 85 F.T.C. 622.

Surveys and tests in late 1971 and 1972 produced evidence of compliance and noncompliance which is discussed some in the papers before us, but is a more appropriate subject for debate before the defendant agency in the hearing plaintiffs desire to prevent. Acknowledging the agency's primacy at least to this extent, an affidavit for the movants says "That A&P's scores were middling—better than those of many chains, worse than those of others." An affidavit in opposition characterizes A&P's showing less agreeably—as "not the worst of all . . . chains" surveyed in November 1971, but "clearly the worst of all surveyed chains for which a reasonably large number of advertised items (i.e., over 300) were surveyed." Similarly, from a later survey by law students in February and March, 1972, the Commission's affiant reports that "A&P's combined availability and overpricing average . . . was . . . the poorest performance of all chains surveyed."

At any rate, the Commission determined in 1972 that it should proceed against A&P to extirpate what it charged as unfair advertising and pricing practices. On July 26, 1972, A&P was sent a proposed complaint with an opportunity under the agency's procedures to enter into efforts toward a consent order. Such efforts were taken, but proved unsuccessful. A formal complaint, commencing the proceeding now in progress, was served on February 16, 1973. The pleading steps, various motions before the administrative judge, allied moves against Rule 424, and sundry other steps in the agency litigation are recounted in the papers, but need not be detailed here. Suffice it to say that a schedule prescribed by the administrative judge by order of January 17, 1974, set May 21, 1974, as the day to start trial hearings.

*The Rule reads in part as follows:

"In connection with the sale or offering for sale by retail food stores of food and grocery products or other merchandise, subject to the jurisdictional requirements of Sections 5 and 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, it is an unfair method of competition and an unfair or deceptive act or practice to:

(1) Offer any such products for sale at a stated price, by means of any advertisement disseminated in an area served by any of its stores which are covered by the advertisement which do not have such products in stock, and readily available to customers during the effective period of the advertisement. (If not readily available, clear and adequate notice shall be provided that the items are in stock and may be obtained upon request.)

Provided, however, that it shall constitute a defense to a charge under Part (1) of the rule, supra, if the retailer maintains records sufficient to show that the advertised products were ordered in adequate time for delivery and delivered to the stores in quantities sufficient to meet reasonably anticipated demands.

(2) Fail to make the advertised items conspicuously and readily available for sale at or below the advertised prices.

Unless, in each of the above cases, there is clear and conspicuous disclosure in all such advertisements as to all exceptions and/or limitations or restrictions with respect to stores, products or prices otherwise included within the advertisements." [Notes omitted.]

The instant suit was filed April 19, 1974, and plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction was filed April 23, noticed for May 1, 1974. Answering papers and a cross-motion were served May 1, and plaintiffs served additional papers on May 9, 1974. The matter comes on, then, on the brink of the administrative trial and amidst the usual press of other things in this forum. Fortunately, the papers are learned and the ultimate questions, despite the heft of the materials, seem few and uncomplicated. Referring mostly to the briefs for the pertinent authorities, this court sketches briefly the grounds of its decision.

1. The case is within the still clear reach of Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 36 (1938). The limited grounds on which the exhaustion requirement may be overleaped are not present here. Valiant, imaginative, sometimes tortured attempts to portray such grounds have proved totally unconvincing.

2. Plaintiffs argue at length that the Commission is using an adjudicatory proceeding as a mistaken and unlawful device to amend Rule 424. Though it is said a good deal, the point is not made and cannot now be made. The A&P is evidently charged with violating Rule 424. (As plaintiffs, in the complaint filed here, put it, the FTC proceeding against A&P "is implicitly based on Rule 424.") As is not unheard of, the determination of the charge will or may require construction and application of the rule. As is also familiar, the rule may in the process become clearer, more precise, more specifically defined—as has been true, say, of endless statutes, the Constitution, and other administrative rules in many settings. To predict the rule will inevitably be "amended" is at this point an empty form of words. There is thus no foundation for the conclusion that the agency cannot adjudicate the case before it but must, as the A&P steadily repeats, hold "an amendatory rule-making proceeding."

3. It is said Rule 424 is so vague as to violate due process, and that things must get worse rather than better if the agency is allowed to proceed with such a poisonous uncertainty in the atmosphere. The argument itself waxes vague sometimes, but it is not weighty in any event. To begin with, as has been noted, the claim of vagueness is remarkably tardy and unimpressive on its face. It is, moreover, an unattractive novelty to insist that the agency may not consider in an adjudication the precise and detailed meaning of its own regulation. Plaintiffs stress that agency counsel have predicted that there may be issues in the adjudication proceeding as to the meaning and application of Rule 424. This, it is argued, amounts to a "concession" that the rule is so vague as to be unconstitutional. Leaving out other things that could be said about this, it is a patent fallacy to say that a statute or rule is demonsrated to be unintelligible because lawyers and litigants find themselves in disputes over its meaning.

4. The A&P worries variously that (a) it is being singled out from among all its competitors to be put at arbitrary disadvantage and (b) other chains, not in the pending proceeding, will be bound by determinations the FTC makes in deciding this case. Both spectres are discoverable in almost any administrative proceeding. Neither is more than a figment in the circumstances disclosed here. The A&P fastens upon complaint counsel's proposed order, says it is broader than the rule (presumably in the rule's intelligible parts), and predicts that this complaining "guinea pig" of a chain is thus threatened with severe disadvantage vis-à-vis competitors bound only by the rule. But all this predicting of what the agency may do that is wrong, and how this will or will not affect other companies before neither agency nor court, could serve as an object lesson vindicating the still live and salutary essence of the exhaustion doctrine.

5. It is argued that the FTC's complaint "fails to state a cause of action" under § 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and that at best the agency "is attempting a novel application of Section 12 . . . ." It follows for plaintiffs that the agency is exceeding its jurisdiction. As a supposed basis for circumventing the exhaustion requirement, the argument is frivolous.

6. Plaintiffs invoke ideas of "equity" long ago exploded in cases of this kind, and they present a "balance of hardships" said to favor their suit. They argue such things as the anticipated expense of the agency hearing, the probability of their own success in this case, and the threat of adverse publicity. As has appeared, this court finds the prediction of success much too sanguine. For the rest, it is unnecessary to recite the familiar precedents nullifying such arguments in a case of this nature.

The motion for a preliminary injunction is denied. The cross-motion to dismiss is granted. The complaint is dismissed.

It is so ordered.

mission's failure to reopen and modify order to conform it to allegedly less restrictive order of competitor was reviewable in district court under the Administrative Procedure Act, under court's general equity powers, and under standards established by case law.

2. GRANTING ACCESS TO JUDICIAL REVIEW OF ADMINISTRATIVE ORDER MUST BE LIBERAL

[774] Access to judicial review of administrative orders must be liberally granted.

3. WAIVER OF JUDICIAL REVIEW PROVISION OF ORDER APPLIED ONLY TO REVIEW OF SUBSTANTIVE TERMS OF ORDER

Provision of FTC consent order whereby grocery store operator waived judicial review applied only to review of substantive terms of that order and not to subsequent causes of action arising out of Commission's breach of agreement contained in that order.

4. ADMINISTRATOR'S DENIAL OF MOTION TO REOPEN PROCEEDING FOR PURPOSE OF MODIFICATION IS GENERALLY NOT SUBJECT TO JUDICIAL REVIEW

Generally, administrator's denial of motion to reopen proceeding for purpose of modifying FTC order is not subject to judicial review, but, where order contained most fávored nation clause, order contemplated reopening if and when competitor received more favorable treatment from FTC.

5. SECOND ORDER, CONTAINING NO REQUIREMENT FOR PRIOR APPROVAL OF ACQUISITIONS AND SHORTER TIME PERIODS FOR GIVING NOTICE, WAS LESS RESTRICTIVE ON ITS FACE THAN THE FIRST ORDER

Where order issued pursuant to consent decree in FTC proceeding involving grocery chain provided that FTC had veto as to acquisitions or mergers and that grocery chain had to give 60 days' advance notice before any merger or acquisition, and subsequent order against another grocery chain did not require prior approval of merger or acquisition except in states where chain was doing business and contained shorter time periods for giving notice, for purposes of application of most favored nation clause contained in first order, second order was less restrictive on its fact.

6. SECOND ORDER, REQUIRING DIVESTITURE OF CERTAIN ACQUISITIONS, WAS NOT NECESSARILY MORE RESTRICTIVE THAN EARLIER ORDER ISSUED AGAINST COMPETITOR WHICH DID NOT REQUIRE ANY DIVESTITURE

Where order issued by FTC against second grocery chain was less restrictive on its face, for purpose of application of most favored nation clause in earlier order which was issued against another grocery chain and which did not require any divestiture, fact that second order required divestiture of certain acquisitions did not cause second order to become more restrictive than earlier order.

7. F.T.C. ORDERS AGAINST COMPETING FIRMS DOES NOT GENERALLY ENTITLE FIRMS TO COMPETITIVELY EQUAL TREATMENT

Firms subject to FTC order are generally not entitled to competitively equal treatment.

8. FACT THAT FIRMS DID NOT HAVE STORES IN A GIVEN AREA DID NOT MEAN THEY WERE NOT IN COMPETITION WITH ONE ANOTHER TO ACQUIRE STORES IN SUCH AREA FOR PURPOSE OF APPLICATION OF MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSE

For purpose of application of most favored nation clause contained in FTC order issued against grocery chain, fact that such chain and another chain against which second order was issued did not have stores in given area did not mean that they were not in competition with each other to acquire stores in such area.

9. COURTS WILL, WHEN F.T.C. CONSENT DECREE CONTAINS MOST FAVORED NATION CLAUSE, ENFORCE IT SO THAT NO PARTY IS PLACED AT A COMPETITIVE DISADVANTAGE

   When FTC consent decree contains most favored nation clause, courts will enforce it so that one party to it will not be placed at disadvantage to competitors.

10. RECORD ESTABLISHED ARBITRARY AND CAPRICIOUS ACTION BY COMMISSION IN REFUSING TO REOPEN AND MODIFY ORDER

    Record established that FTC's refusal to reopen and modify order issued against grocery chain pursuant to consent decree which contained most favored nation clause was arbitrary and capricious in view of order issued against another grocery chain.

11. COURT MUST GO BEHIND COMMISSION ACTION IN DETERMINING IF SAID ACTION IS ARBITRARY AND CAPRICIOUS

    Fact that FTC held hearings and wrote opinion with care did not mean its action was not arbitrary and capricious, and court must go behind Commission action to determine if it is arbitrary and capricious.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 377 F. Supp. 733)

On action to enjoin F.T.C. from enforcing certain parts of cease and desist order and to reopen proceeding for modification of the order, court held that it had jurisdiction to entertain proceeding; the Commission's refusal to reopen and modify the order was arbitrary and capricious; and that the order issued against a second grocery chain was less restrictive.

ORDER AND INJUNCTION

CHARLES R. SCOTT, District Judge.

[775] This case involves a consent order entered by the defendant Federal Trade Commission (sometimes hereinafter Commission and sometimes FTC), against plaintiff Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. (W-D), in 1966, and the effect to be accorded the terms of the order and the agreement upon which it was based.

Plaintiff has asked this Court (a) preliminarily and permanently to enjoin defendants from enforcing certain portions of the modified cease and desist order entered against Winn-Dixie, 73 F.T.C. 1056 (1968); (b) to order defendants to reopen the proceeding which led to the order and modify the order so as to make it conform to the order entered against one of Winn-Dixie's competitors, The Kroger Company, 79 F.T.C. 636 (1971); and (c) to declare certain of defendants' actions to be arbitrary, capricious and unlawful.

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule 65(a)(2) plaintiff moved that the hearing on the application for preliminary injunction be consolidated with trial on the merits and that the trial be advanced. Defendants consented to this procedure, and all parties presented their cases on the merits at the time of the hearing on the application for preliminary injunction. Therefore, the Court finds it appropriate to consider the case on its merits at this time.

I. FACTS

Following an investigation by the FTC of several acquisitions made by Winn-Dixie which the Commission had reason to believe violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, the Commission, pursuant to its consent order procedure (16 C.F.R. § 2.31 et seq.) accepted an agreement, dated July 26, 1966, between W–D and counsel for the Federal Trade Commission. Pursuant to the agreement, the Commission, on September 14, 1966, simultaneously issued its complaint and final order to cease and desist, whereby W–D agreed, inter alia, not to make any acquisition, directly or indirectly, of any retail food or grocery stores in the United States without prior approval of the Commission. 70 F.T.C. 611–19 (1966). Among other things, that order provides,

> It is ordered, That for ten (10) years from the effective date of this Order, respondent shall not, without prior approval of the Federal Trade Commission, make any acquisitions, directly or indirectly, of any retail food or grocery stores in the United States.

The agreement further contains two provisions relevant to the instant controversy.

First, it contains a "most favored nation" clause which in substance provides that the Commission, upon application by Winn-Dixie, shall reopen the proceeding to modify the order if it is found to be more restrictive than an order or Rule subsequently issued involving mergers or acquisitions by a grocery chain.

Second, the agreement also states that Winn-Dixie "waives: . . . (c) All rights to seek judicial review or otherwise to challenge or contest the validity of the Order entered into pursuant to this Agreement".

Since the entry of the original order, Winn-Dixie has filed with the Commission three separate requests for reopening of the proceeding to modify the order. On February 17, 1967, it sought a modification on the basis of the FTC's "Enforcement Policy With Respect to Mergers in the Food Distribution Industries", which the Commission by order and opinion of April 17, 1967, denied.

On February 21, 1968, Winn-Dixie again requested a reopening of the proceeding to modify the order. The Commission by order of June 24, 1968, reopened the proceeding and modified the above order because it found its order entered against the Grand Union Company (hereinafter called Grand Union) to be less restrictive. 73 F.T.C. 1050 (June 21, 1968). This modified order is now in force against W-D.

[776] On May 3, 1972, Winn-Dixie petitioned the Commission to reopen the proceeding and further modify the cease and desist order outstanding against Winn-Dixie to conform to an order entered by the FTC against The Kroger Company, which order Winn-Dixie alleged to be less restrictive than the modified order against Winn-Dixie. The request was opposed by the Federal Trade Commission.

By Order of November 6, 1972, the Commission, in response to Winn-Dixie's request of June 20, 1972, agreed to hear oral argument concerning Winn-Dixie's request for further modification. On March 28, 1973, oral argument was heard before the Commission, and on May 30, 1973, an order was issued, accompanied by an opinion, denying reopening and modification. This lawsuit then was commenced.

II. JURISDICTION

At the outset the Court is faced with the perennial threshold question of whether or not it has jurisdiction to hear and determine the controversy. Defendants have moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction in this Court on the theory that there can be no judicial review of the FTC's denial of Winn-Dixie's motion to reopen and modify the existing consent order. In the alternative, the FTC argues that, even if there is judicial review of the Commission action, the proper forum for such review is the court of appeals rather than the district court.

[1] This Court finds that the Commission's failure to reopen and modify the Winn-Dixie order to conform it to an allegedly less restrictive order of a competitor is reviewable in the district court under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA), 5 U.S.C. § 701 et seq., under the Court's general equity powers, and under the standards established in Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 87 S. Ct. 1507, 18 L. Ed. 2d 681 (1967), and Air Line Pilots Assoc. Int'l. v. Federal Aviation Administration, 446 F. 2d 236 (5th Cir. 1971).

[2] The APA expressly provides for judicial review of administrative action which is arbitrary, capricious or an abuse of discretion. 5 U.S.C. §§ 701–706. Section 703 of the APA provides for review of agency action (a) in a court specified by statute, or (b) in any court of competent jurisdiction. Furthermore, access to judicial review must be liberally granted. Chicago v. United States, 396 U.S. 162, 90 S. Ct. 309, 24 L. Ed. 2d 340 (1969); Brownell v. WeShung, 352 U.S. 180, 77 S. Ct. 252, 1 L. Ed. 2d 225 (1956); Shaughnessy v. Pedreiro, 349 U.S. 48, 75 S. Ct. 591, 99 L. Ed. 868 (1955); Heikkila v. Barber, 345 U.S. 229, 73 S. Ct. 603, 97 L. Ed. 972 (1953); United States v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 337 U.S. 426, 69 S. Ct. 1410, 93 L. Ed. 1451 (1949).

In Abbott Laboratories, supra, the government argued, as it does here, that since the statute (in that case the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act; in this case the Federal Trade Commission Act) includes a specific procedure for review, other types of review are excluded. The court rejected that assertion, holding that the district court had jurisdiction to review the agency action and grant injunctive relief where it is appropriate. The court further held that, "... only upon a showing of 'clear and convincing evidence' of a contrary legislative intent should the courts restrict access to judicial review". 387 U.S. 136 at 141.

In Air Line Pilots Assoc. Int'l. v. FAA, supra, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit concluded that reviewability was determined by meeting the two-prong test developed in Abbott Laboratories, supra, of " 'whether the issues tendered are appropriate for judicial resolution' " and " 'whether hardship [would result] to the parties if judicial relief [were] denied' ". 466 F. 2d 236, 241. In the instant case Winn-Dixie meets the reviewability test developed in Abbott Laboratories and Air Line Pilots Association. Plaintiff's challenge to the Commission's failure to reopen and modify the order against W–D is ready and [777] appropriate for judicial resolution, and no alternative means of resolving the dispute is available. Therefore, for the reasons outlined herein, the Court holds that the Commission's order of denial is subject to and appropriate for judicial review.

The second prong of the Abbott Laboratories test is also met because Winn-Dixie will suffer hardship and be irreparably injured if judicial review is denied, since the Commission's denial of reopening and modifying the order places W–D at a distinct disadvantage to competitors.

[3] It is apparent to the Court that the provision of the original consent order whereby Winn-Dixie waives judicial review applies only to review of the substantive terms of that original order and not to subsequent causes of action arising out of the Commission's breach of the agreement contained in that order. Winn-Dixie seeks review of the breach of the agreement to modify and does not seek review of the substantive terms of the consent order as originally entered.

[4] While it is a general rule of administrative law that an administrator's denial of a motion to reopen a proceeding for the purpose of modifying a Commission order is not subject to judicial review, Securities and Exchange Commission v. Louisiana Public Service Commission, 353 U.S. 368, 77 S. Ct. 855, 1 L. Ed. 2d 897 (1957); Martin Marietta Corp. v. FTC, 376 F. 2d 430 (7th Cir. 1967), in this case the order itself contemplates reopening if and when another grocery chain receives more favorable treatment from the FTC. See, e.g., Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 335 U.S. 303, 69 S. Ct. 93, 93 L. Ed. 24 (1948); Chrysler Corp. v. United States, 316 U.S. 556, 62 S. Ct. 1146, 86 L. Ed. 1668 (1942).

Winn-Dixie might never have agreed to the original consent order if the "most favored nation" clause had not been included in it. Such a clause necessarily implies the right to reopen and modify the consent order, and the Commission cannot have the discretion to arbitrarily and capriciously refuse to reopen. If such discretion were vested in the Commission and there were no judicial review of the exercise thereof, the presence of the "most favored nation" clause in the order would be meaningless.

Defendants rely heavily on the case of Martin Marietta, supra, which the Court finds to be clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. That case involved a request for modification of the terms of the consent order itself and did not contain a "most favored nation" clause agreement for reopening and modification. There the court properly refused to reopen and modify the original consent order. Here Winn-Dixie seeks only to enforce the agreement to reopen and modify which is contained in the original order. The absence of a most favored nation clause in that case gave an aura of greater finality to those orders than exists in this case. There it was likely that no need to modify the consent orders would ever exist. In this case it was contemplated and anticipated by the parties from the outset that modification of the order might become necessary.

Defendants next contend that even if the Commission's action is reviewable, the plaintiff should have sought review in the court of appeals rather than in the district court, because the Federal Trade Commission Act provides for review in the courts of appeal.

In support of this contention defendants rely on the case of Floersheim v. Engman, 494 F. 2d 949 (D.C. Cir. 1973), where the court held that neither the court of appeals nor the district court had subject matter jurisdiction under the Federal Trade Commission Act or the APA to review the FTC's determination that action proposed by Floersheim would violate the outstanding cease and desist order. The court reasoned that where a cease and desist order of the FTC has been affirmed in an action before the court of appeals any question of the order's meaning should be heard by [778] the court of appeals that enforced it, rather than by the district court. See also, Regal Knitwear Co. v. N.L.R.B., 324 U.S. 9, 65 S. Ct. 478, 89 L. Ed. 661 (1945); 15 U.S.C. § 21 (c), (d) and § 45(c).

In contrast to the Floersheim case, the consent order in this case has never been before the court of appeals nor does plaintiff seek review of Commission denial of plaintiff's proposed actions. What plaintiff seeks is an order compelling the Commission to perform what it agreed to do in the consent order; i.e., to reopen the proceeding and modify the order.

The Floersheim case stands for the general proposition that where a court of appeals affirms an agency order, any review of that order is in the court of appeals. It does not support the defendant's contention that, in any case, review of the FTC's denial of a motion to reopen an order is in the court of appeals.

So far as the question of district court jurisdiction is concerned, the Floersheim case holds that the district court has no jurisdiction to review the Commission determination that Floersheim's proposed course of action would violate the cease and desist order already enforced by the court of appeals.

All parties agree that, assuming the Court has jurisdiction to review the agency action, the scope of review is to determine whether or not the FTC has acted in a manner which is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law". 5 U.S.C. § 706.

This Court finds that it has jurisdiction to review the allegedly arbitrary and capricous agency action which, plaintiff contends, constitutes an abuse of discretion. Elmo Division of Drive-X Co. v. Dixon, 121 U.S. App. D.C. 113, 348 F. 2d 342 (1965); Elmo Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 128 U. S. App. D.C. 380, 389, F. 2d 550 (1967). Therefore, defendants' motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of jurisdiction over the subject matter should properly be denied.

III. MERITS OF THE CONTROVERSY

On October 16, 1971, the Federal Trade Commission entered a consent order against The Kroger Company (hereinafter called Kroger) involving a merger or acquisition by a grocery store chain. 79 F.T.C. 636 (1971). Winn-Dixie contends that the order issued by the FTC against Kroger is less restrictive with regard to mergers and acquisitions than is the order which is now in effect against W-D.

This condition, Winn-Dixie alleges, violates the letter and the spirit of the so-called "most favored nation" clause contained in the agreement entered into between W-D and the Commission in 1966, which provides,

> [I]n the event that the Federal Trade Commission issues any Order or Rule which is less restrictive than the provisions of this Order, in any proceeding involving mergers or acquisitions by a grocery store chain, then the Commission shall, upon the application of respondent, pursuant to rule 3.28 of the Commission's Rules of Practice, reopen this proceeding in order to make whatever revisions, if any, are necessary to bring the restrictions imposed upon respondent herein into conformity with those imposed upon its competitors.

On May 3, 1972, Winn-Dixie applied to the Commission requesting revision of the W-D order to conform it to the allegedly less restrictive terms of the Kroger order. This request was based on the revision agreement of 1966, with its most favored nation clause. On May 30, 1973, after hearing, the Commission, Commissioner Dennison dissenting, issued an order and opinion denying W-D's application.

Winn-Dixie then brought this action alleging that the Commission's failure to reopen and modify the 1968 W-D order is arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion and fails to comply with the agreement entered into between Winn-Dixie and the Commission in 1966. [779] Therefore, W-D claims, the Commission's order denying reopening and modification should be set aside, and the Commission should be enjoined from enforcing against Winn-Dixie so much of the 1968 order as is more restrictive than the Kroger order.

Before the Court can properly grant the relief sought by Winn-Dixie, the following three questions must be answered in the affirmative: (1) Does the Kroger order involve a "merger or acquisition by a grocery store chain" as that phrase is used in the 1966 agreement? (2) Is the Kroger order less restrictive than the Winn-Dixie order as modified after Grand Union? (3) Is modification necessary to bring the Winn-Dixie order into conformity with the Kroger order?

(A) Does the Kroger Order Involve an Acquisition?

It is not disputed that the Kroger order involves an acquisition by a grocery store chain. The order against Kroger was in response to Kroger's acquisition of leased food departments in three Gold Circle stores in Dayton, Ohio.

(B) Is the Kroger Order Less Restrictive?

The question of whether or not the Kroger order is less restrictive than the Winn-Dixie order is the most hotly contested issue of this case. The thrust of the Federal Trade Commission's argument, and the theory on which it based its order denying reopening and modification, is that, although part of the Winn-Dixie order may be more restrictive than part of the Kroger order, taken as a whole, the Kroger order is more restrictive than the W–D order. This conclusion is reached by the Commission by comparing the factual situations which gave rise to the Commission's orders in these two cases. Vicksburg v. Henson, 231 U.S. 259, 34 S. Ct. 95, 58 L. Ed. 209 (1913); Virginia Excelsior Mills v. Federal Trade Commission, 256 F. 2d 538 (4th Cir. 1958); Ostler Candy Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 106 F. 2d 962 (10th Cir. 1939).

The Commission entered its order against Kroger in response to Kroger's acquisition of the leased food departments in the aforesaid three Gold Circle stores. Kroger was already the leading food marketer in the Dayton area, so these three acquisitions involved a comparatively small, strictly horizontal,[1] acquisition in a single market. The order required total divestiture of the leased food departments.

The activities giving rise to the original complaint against Winn-Dixie were W–D's acquisition of the 35-store Hill Grocery chain in 1962, which was operating in northern central Alabama, and Winn-Dixie's subsequent acquisition in 1963 of nine grocery stores operated by Colonial Stores, Inc., in Birmingham, Alabama. These acquisitions were charged in the Commission's complaint as essentially geographic market extensions,[2] although they did have horizontal aspects. The consent order did not require Winn-Dixie to divest itself of any stores but provided that, for a ten-year period, W–D was prohibited from making any acquisition of any retail food or grocery store without prior Commission approval. Subsequently the Grand Union order was entered and, in response thereto, the Commission modified the order in force against Winn-Dixie to impose the "5–5–5"[3] criteria.

The Kroger and Winn-Dixie orders differ in three major respects. First, the Kroger order does not require prior Commission approval of a food store [780] merger or acquisition, however large, except in approximately 20 states where that company presently does business. Winn-Dixie, on the other hand, is subject to an absolute Commission veto as to such acquisitions throughout the entire United States. Second, the Kroger order establishes shorter time periods than the Winn-Dixie order for giving notice of proposed mergers or acquisitions. In the "5–5–5" or larger category, Kroger must give the Commission

[1] A horizontal acquisition is an acquisition by a company in an area where it is already engaged in that business. In contrast, a geographic acquisition is an acquisition by a company in an area where it does not already engage in business.

[3] The "5–5–5" category refers to mergers or acquisitions involving five or more states, or more than five million dollars of annual sales involving more than five percent of food store sales in any city or county.

60 days prior notification except that, when Kroger's time schedule does not permit such notice, Kroger is required to give 30 days notice following consummation of a merger or acquisition, whereas the Winn-Dixie order requires 60 days advance notice without exception. 73 F.T.C. 1056 (1968). The orders in Winn-Dixie, Grand Union and Kroger may be summarized as follows:

	Duration of order	Area	60-d notice 5–5–5
			Mergers or acquisitions [1]	10-d [2] notice	30-d [3] notice
Original order against Winn-Dixie.	10 yr	Entire United States.	No [4]	No [4]	No.[4]
Grand Union order.	do	do	Yes	No	No.
Modified Winn-Dixie order after Grand Union (now in force).	do	do	Yes	No	No.
Kroger order	do	Limited to 20 States.	Yes	Yes	Yes.

[2] This requirement is defined in the Kroger order and provides for 10-d notice after a merger or acquisition if Kroger's time schedule does not permit a longer notice period.

[3] This requirement is defined in the Kroger order and provides for 30-d notice of mergers or acquisitions involving 4 or less stores or less than $5,000,000 in annual sales.

There are certain other differences between the Winn-Dixie order and the Kroger order, but no one contends that the agreement upon which this case is based requires exact identity of restrictions. Thus, Winn-Dixie does not seek [781] complete conformity of its order to the Kroger order, but only seeks substantive compliance with the agreement of 1966.

The Commission recognizes that the most favored nation clause must be honored. In granting Winn-Dixie's application for modification after Grand Union, the Federal Trade Commission both adhered to its commitment in the agreement underlying the Winn-Dixie order and carefully tailored the 1968 modification to the terms of a less restrictive order entered against a competitor.

The Commission claims the fact that the Kroger order only requires approval of horizontal mergers is an appropriate outcome of the Kroger case, and the fact that the Winn-Dixie case included market extension mergers made the provision for prior approval of such extensions appropriate. The 1966 agreement, however, makes no distinction between the types of mergers or acquisitions involved but apparently covers any mergers or acquisitions. This issue was clearly analyzed and properly resolved by Commissioner Dennison in his dissenting opinion in this case.

> In the opinion denying modification, great significance is given to the fact that the respective orders were designed in response to entirely different circumstances. Winn-Dixie involved a geographic market extension-type merger, while Kroger was a straight horizontal acquisition. While this is certainly true, I question the relevancy of this fact and how it would change the outcome dictated by the original consent order.[1] A most favored nation provision requires the Commission to modify the Winn-Dixie order where there is a less restrictive order issued in any proceeding involving mergers or acquisitions by a grocery store chain. The provision is not limited to geographic market extension-type mergers nor did the Commission in any way reserve discretion in the matter.
> [fn. Apparently this distinction failed to impress the Commission at the time of the first modification of the Winn-Dixie order to conform to the Grand Union order. Docket C–1350, 73 F.T.C. 1050 (1968). The Grand Union case involved a horizontal acquisition.]

[5] The Commission argues that the Kroger order is not less restrictive than the Winn-Dixie order either on its face or in its operative effect. The question of whether or not it is less restrictive on its face is here resolved by the Court in favor of Winn-Dixie. On the basis of the comparison of the two orders previously made by the Court herein, there can be no doubt that the restrictions on Winn-Dixie which appear on the face of its modified consent order are substantially more burdensome than are the restrictions imposed upon Kroger. The question of whether or not Winn-Dixie's order is less restrictive in its operative effect is the vital argument of this lawsuit, and the Court will now consider that issue.

In its opinion in this case the Commission held that the Kroger order was not less restrictive than the Winn-Dixie order because (1) the Kroger order not only bans future acquisitions, as does the Winn-Dixie order, but also requires divestiture of three food departments leased by Kroger, and (2) Winn-Dixie was charged in the Commission's complaint with essentially geographic market extensions having some horizontal aspects, whereas the complaint charged Kroger with a horizontal merger.

Winn-Dixie concedes that it is not required by the consent order to divest itself of any stores, as was Kroger by the consent order in its case. The Kroger most favored nation clause, unlike the Winn-Dixie agreement, represents the sort of limitation to industrywide principles which the Commission contends should apply here. In Kroger, modification is to occur only in the event a less restrictive trade regulation rule is promulgated, whereas in Winn-Dixie modification is to occur whenever a less restrictive order or rule is entered. Thus, [782] the Commission has demonstrated a capacity to negotiate for and write a narrower modification clause if it so desires.

[6] The Commission urges the Court to weigh the added burden on Winn-Dixie of seeking prior approval of its initial entry by acquisition into a new geographic market against the onus on Kroger of divestiture of acquired properties in 1971. This method of balancing would require the Court to give the term "restrictive" in the most favored nation clause a retrospective meaning. The fact that Kroger in 1971 was required, as part of a consent order, to take the single action of divesting itself of three leased food departments should not thereafter act to bar Winn-Dixie from enforcing the terms of its agreement. If this interpretation were to be placed on the agreement, Winn-Dixie would be at a competitive disadvantage to Kroger; the very position it sought to prevent by negotiating the most favored nation clause into the agreement in 1966.[4] Therefore, the Court concludes that the divestiture requirement did not cause the Kroger order to become more restrictive than the Winn-Dixie order, and any other conclusion would place Winn-Dixie at a competitive disadvantage to Kroger.

[7] Although firms subject to Commission order are generally not entitled to competitively equal treatment, Federal Trade Commission v. Universal-Rundle Corp., 387 U.S. 244, 87 S. Ct. 1622, 18 L. Ed. 2d 749 (1967); Moog Industries v. Federal Trade Commission, 355 U.S. 411, 78 S. Ct. 377, 2 L. Ed. 2d 370 (1958), the parties in this case provided for a means of assuring equal treatment with regard to mergers and acquisitions of food stores by including the most favored nation clause in their agreement. Winn-Dixie sought to prevent itself from being at a disadvantage when attempting to merge with or acquire another food store or chain. Nevertheless, the flexible notification provisions available to Kroger, and the fact that Kroger's order only applies in states where it presently does business places Winn-Dixie at a disadvantage.

For example, if Winn-Dixie and Kroger each seek to acquire a food store outside either of their present geographic areas, Kroger may offer to purchase the store immediately, whereas before Winn-Dixie can make an offer to purchase, the Commission must give its approval. Thus, Winn-Dixie cannot bargain with the same swiftness nor certainty as Kroger, and it is not unlikely that a food store or chain owner might be willing to accept a lower price from Kroger for a quickly effected sale rather than wait for Commission approval of an offer from Winn-Dixie. The Commission could later decide to bring an action to set aside the Kroger acquisition of such a store, but merger challenges are based upon a full blown adjudication of issues and the consideration of the record as a whole. Prior approval of acquisitions, in contrast, is based on standards of evidence far less stringent than those applied to adjudication.

[4] Without the agreement with its most favored nation clause, Winn-Dixie argues, it would never have consented to entry of the cease and desist order in 1966.

[8] The Commission contends Winn-Dixie is at no "competitive" disadvantage to Kroger in the states where neither company presently operates food stores, because Kroger by definition is not competing in those areas. Thus, the Commission argues, the prior approval requirement is not a more restrictive provision imposed upon Winn-Dixie than "those imposed upon its competitors", as contemplated by the most favored nation clause. This argument is not persuasive. The fact that neither Winn-Dixie nor Kroger has any stores in a given area at present does not necessarily mean they are not in competition with each other to acquire stores in that area. They may compete, not only in food sales, but also in attempting to acquire food stores.

[783] [9] The law is clear that when a consent decree contains a most favored nation clause the courts will enforce it so that one party to it will not be placed at a disadvantage to competitors. Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 335 U.S. 303, 69 S. Ct. 93, 93 L. Ed. 24 (1948); Chrysler Corp. v. United States, 316 U.S. 556, 62 S. Ct. 1146, 86 L. Ed. 1668 (1942). In both Chrysler and Ford the Supreme Court held that the crucial fact was not the degree of disadvantage, but the persistence of an inequity against which protection has been secured in a well understood and carefully drawn decree. In this case we have such a decree which the Court must enforce.

(C) Is Modification Necessary?

Winn-Dixie does not contend that the order issued against Kroger was inappropriate to deal with Kroger's alleged violation, or that the order issued against Winn-Dixie was inappropriate to deal with its alleged violations. Winn-Dixie only claims that it is entitled to every competitive advantage available to Kroger because it bargained for and won that right when the most favored nation clause was included in the original consent decree.

The plain meaning of this clause must be observed and enforced. The Supreme Court in United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 91 S. Ct. 1752, 29 L. Ed. 2d 256 (1971), in holding a consent decree did not prohibit Armour from being acquired by the Greyhound Bus Line, declared,

> [T]he scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it. Because the defendant has, by the decree, waived his right to litigate the issues raised, a right guaranteed to him by the Due Process Clause, the conditions upon which he has given that waiver must be respected, and the instrument must be construed as it is written. . . .

402 U.S. 673 at 682, 91 S. Ct. 1752 at 1757, 29 L. Ed. 2d 256.

The essence of Winn-Dixie's argument in support of its position is that the plain language of its consent agreement mandates the requested modifications, and that no other reasonable position can be taken if the Commission stays within the "four corners" of the consent agreement.

In this regard the Court fully agrees with the statement of Commissioner Dennison, in his opinion dissenting from the Commission's order denying Winn-Dixie's petition for reopening and modification.

> The respondent has persuasively argued that the order against the Kroger Company (Docket No. C-2067) is less restrictive than the order against it. This point notwithstanding, the majority would have us look behind the plain reading of the order to determine whether the Winn-Dixie and Kroger factual situations were substantially similar before invoking the most favored nation provision. Why it is necessary to create a "principle of conformity" and to look at the competitive circumstances giving rise to the respective orders, is unclear. The words employed in the provision are neither unclear nor ambiguous. The clause itself, taken as a whole, is clear in its meaning and its import is patent. Most favored nation provisions have always been strictly construed. Koloprct [Kolovrat] v. Oregon, 266 [366] U.S. 187 [81 S. Ct. 922, 6 L. Ed. 2d 218] (1961); Lukrich [Lukich] v. Department of Labor and Industry, 176 Wash. 221, 29 P. 2d [388] 288 (1934). However, such provisions have always been construed from the four corners of the agreement. See Sanprovincenzo [Santovincenzo] v. Eggan [Egan] 284 U.S. 30 [57 S. Ct. 81, 76 L. Ed. 151] (1931); Mentula v. State Land Board, 244 Or. [229] 299, 419 [417] P. 2d 581.

Winn-Dixie is presently at a disadvantage to its competitors because an inequality in treatment exists between W-D and Kroger. Not only is this discrimination in treatment of competitors sub[784]ject to careful scrutiny, Morey v. Doud, 354 U.S. 457, 77 S. Ct. 1344, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1485 (1957); Hartford Steam Boiler Inspection Ins. Co. v. Harrison, 301 U.S. 459, 57 S. Ct. 838, 81 L. Ed. 1223 (1937); Mayflower Farms v. Ten Eyck, 297 U.S. 266, 56 S. Ct. 457, 80 L. Ed. 675 (1936), but the disadvantage in this case is caused by the failure of one party to adhere to its judicially enforceable agreement.

> Consent orders, agreed to by both the respondent and the Commission, are binding decrees. If the respondent is to be bound, usually at its detriment, then the Commission must likewise be bound; sometimes to its detriment. If the Com> mission wanted to limit the most favored nation treatment to only geographic market extension cases, it should have insisted upon this narrower language in the consent negotiations. It did not and must now live with the broader language.

In re Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., F.T.C. Docket No. C-1110 (May 30, 1973), Dissenting Opinion of Commissioner Dennison.

Since the Kroger order is framed to require prior Commission approval of food store acquisitions by Kroger only in those states or subdivisions where Kroger presently operates such stores or departments, the Winn-Dixie order should be conformed so as to adopt the same approach.

[10, 11] Therefore, the Court finds that the action of the Commission in denying Winn-Dixie's petition for reopening and modification is arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion. The fact that the Federal Trade Commission held hearings and wrote an opinion with care does not mean its action was not arbitrary and capricious. Just saying a decision is careful does not make it so. Federal Trade Commission v. Crowther, 139 U.S. App. D.C. 137, 430 F. 2d 510 (1970). The Court must go behind the Commission action to determine if it is arbitrary and capricious. Greater Boston Television Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission; 143 U.S. App. D.C. 383, 444 F. 2d 841 (1970).

The Court further finds that Winn-Dixie is irreparably injured, aggrieved and adversely affected by defendants' action in denying its petition. Unless immediate relief is obtained, plaintiff will be at a severe competitive disadvantage, in direct contravention of the terms of the agreement between it and the Federal Trade Commission.

In summary, the consent order requiring modification is clear on its face. By its actions after Grand Union the Commission has established the proper procedure for complying with the modification provision of the most favored nation clause. The harm to public confidence in consent orders and decrees, which make up the vast majority of settlements in the anti-trust field, will be substantial if the requested modification is denied in contravention of an expressed provision of the order. Furthermore, Winn-Dixie will be at a distinct competitive disadvantage unless and until the arbitrary and capricious action of the Commission in failing to reopen and modify the Winn-Dixie order is remedied.

Therefore, it is Ordered:

1. Defendant's motion, filed herein January 15, 1974, to dismiss the complaint of Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., is hereby denied.

2. Stipulation regarding discovery and witnesses, filed herein March 28, 1974, is hereby adopted and confirmed by the Court.

3. By consent of all parties, plaintiff's motion, filed herein January 30, 1974, for advancement of the cause and consolidation of trial on the merits with hearing on application for preliminary injunction, is hereby granted.

4. This memorandum opinion constitutes the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law; and, it is further

Ordered and adjudged:

That the Federal Trade Commission and its members, Lewis A. Engman, [785] Paul Rand Dixon, Mary Gardiner Jones, David S. Dennison, Jr., and Mayo J. Thompson, be and hereby are permanently enjoined and restrained from enforcing the order against Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., in F.T.C. Docket No. C–1110, insofar as that order requires that approval of the Federal Trade Commission be obtained prior to the consummation of any food or grocery store acquisition or merger by plaintiff Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., in any city or county in which Winn-Dixie is not doing business at the time of such merger or acquisition; and, it is further

Ordered and adjudged:

That the Federal Trade Commission and its aforesaid members be and hereby are permanently enjoined and restrained from enforcing the order against Winn-Dixie in F.T.C. Docket No. C–1110, insofar as that order requires Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., to notify the defendant Commission of food store mergers or acquisitions on any different schedule than The Kroger Company is required to notify the Federal Trade Commission of mergers or acquisitions under the terms of the order entered in F.T.C. Docket No. C–2067 (October 26, 1971); and, it is further

Ordered and adjudged:

That the Federal Trade Commission and its aforesaid members be and hereby are permanently enjoined and restrained from failing to reopen the proceeding involving Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., in F.T.C. Docket No. C–1110, and upon such reopening to effect such modifications of the order entered therein as will conform such order to that order entered by the Federal Trade Commission against The Kroger Company in F.T.C. Docket No. C–2067 (October 26, 1971); and, it is further

Ordered and adjudged:

That the action of the Federal Trade Commission and its aforesaid members in denying Winn-Dixie Stores' request for reopening of the proceeding and modification of the order in F.T.C. Docket No. C–1110 was arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion and that plaintiff is entitled to such requested reopening and modification.

ADOLPH COORS COMPANY v. F.T.C.*

No. 73-1567. F.T.C. Docket No. 8845.

(United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, June 4, 1974)

1. UNDER BOTH THE SHERMAN ANTITRUST ACT AND THE F.T.C. ACT, PRICE FIXING IS ILLEGAL PER SE

   Price fixing is illegal per se under both the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act.

2. PRICE FIXING AGREEMENT RENDERS A CONSPIRACY ILLEGAL

   Agreement to fix prices renders a conspiracy illegal.

3. SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES AS WELL AS ACTS AND CONDUCT OF PARTIES CAN INFER OR IMPLY AGREEMENT TO FIX PRICES

   Agreement to fix prices may be inferred or implied from the acts and conduct of the parties, as well as from the surrounding circumstances.

4. IF RECORD AS A WHOLE SUPPORTS FINDINGS OF F.T.C., COURT OF APPEALS MUST ACCEPT THEM

   Findings of the Federal Trade Commission must be accepted by Court of Appeals if there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support them.

5. OVERRULING OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW JUDGE'S RULING BY F.T.C. DOES NOT REQUIRE A VERY SUBSTANTIAL PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE

   Federal Trade Commission's overruling of law judge's findings on the credibility of two witnesses was not required to be supported by a very substantial preponderance of the evidence.

6. F.T.C. IS NOT PREVENTED FROM DRAWING ONE CONCLUSION WHERE THERE IS A POSSIBILITY OF DRAWING TWO INCONSISTENT INFERENCES FROM EVIDENCE

   Where there is a possibility of drawing two inconsistent inferences from the evidence, the Federal Trade Commission is not prevented from drawing one.

7. WELL SUPPORTED INFERENCE DRAWN BY F.T.C. CANNOT BE SET ASIDE EVEN THOUGH COURT CAN DRAW A DIFFERENT INFERENCE

   If the inference drawn by the Federal Trade Commission from the evidence is supported by substantial evidence, it cannot be set aside even though the court could draw a different inference.

8. FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS OF ADMINISTRATIVE LAW JUDGE ARE NOT SACROSANCT NOR NECESSARILY BINDING ON F.T.C. OR COURT

   Federal Trade Commission must consider the initial decision of the law judge and the evidence in the record on which it was based, but the findings and conclusions of the law judge are not sacrosanct and are not necessarily binding on the Commission or the court; they are part of the record to be considered on appeal.

*Reported in 497 F. 2d 1178 (1974). Cert. denied; January 13, 1975, 419 U.S. 1105, 95 S. Ct. 775. For case before the Commission, see 83 F.T.C. 32; modified, 85 F.T.C. 185.

9. Even Though Law Judge's Findings Should Be Given Reasonable Weight if They Differ With the Conclusions of the Commission, It Does Not Modify the Substantial Evidence Rule

[1179] When the law judge and the Federal Trade Commission reach opposite results, the law judge's findings should be considered on review and given such weight as they merit within reason and the light of judicial experience, but this does not modify the substantial evidence rule in any way.

10. Findings of Price-Fixing Agreements and a Resale Price Maintenance Program Were Supported by Substantial Evidence on the Record as a Whole Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supported the Federal Trade Commission's findings of price-fixing agreements between beer brewer and its distributors; likewise, there was substantial evidence to support the finding that the brewer had a resale price maintenance program and that it had in some cases secured adherence to its suggested retail prices by unlawful means.

11. A Violation of the F.T.C. Act and Sherman Antitrust Act Occurs if Manufacturer Takes Affirmative Action To Secure Compliance With Its Prices

If a manufacturer advances beyond a simple refusal to deal and takes affirmative action to secure compliance with its prices, a combination in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act occurs.

12. Trespassing on Wholesaler or Resaler Independence To Set Own Prices Is a Violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act

Any trespass on the independence of a reseller or wholesaler to set his own prices is a violation of the Sherman Act.

13. Use of Concerted Effort To Interfere With Distributors' Pricing Independence and Compel Adherence to Suggested Prices Violates Sherman Antitrust Act

A seller may refuse to deal with one failing to adhere to its specified prices, but where a concerted effort is used to interfere with distributors' pricing independence and to compel them to adhere to suggested prices, there is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

14. Barring Conduct With Monopolistic Purposes, a Manufacturer May Choose Those to Whom It Will Sell

A manufacturer may choose those to whom it will sell as long as its conduct has no monopolistic purposes.

15. Where Manufacturer Parted With Dominion Over Its Product, Further Effort To Restrict Those to Which It Could Be Transferred Would Be Illegal per se Under the Sherman Act and F.T.C. Act

Where beer brewer parted with title and risk to its product when it sold and delivered the beer to distributors, and thus parted with dominion over the product, its further effort to restrict the territories or persons to whom the product could be transferred was a per se violation of the Sherman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act.

16. SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE ON THE RECORD SUPPORTED F.T.C.'S FINDING OF COMBINATIONS IN VIOLATION OF THE F.T.C. ACT

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supported Federal Trade Commission's finding that beer brewer combined with its distributors in the practice of encouraging and coercing retailers to sell the brewer's draught beer to the exclusion of light draught beer competitors in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

17. FORECLOSURE AGREEMENTS ARE UNLAWFUL

Agreements foreclosing a competitor's products are unlawful.

18. FINDING THAT ACTIONS OF MANUFACTURER IN PROHIBITING CENTRAL WAREHOUSE SALES OR REQUIRING WHOLESALE PRICES TO EQUAL THOSE OF OTHER ACCOUNTS WAS SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE TO BE AN UNFAIR METHOD OF COMPETITION

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supported Federal Trade Commission's findings that beer brewer's prohibition of central warehouse sales, or a requirement that wholesale prices to those accounts equal those to other retailers, was a substantial restraint on the capacity of the distributor to resell to whomever he chose and threatened the same anticompetitive results as other illegal restraints on alienation; thus, the practices were unfair methods of competition in violation of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

19. FINDING OF COMMISSION THAT MANUFACTURER USED THREAT OF SPEEDY CONTRACT TERMINATION TO FORCE ANTICOMPETITIVE BEHAVIOR WAS SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supported Federal Trade [1180] Commission's findings that beer brewer used the threat of speedy contract termination to force its distributors into anticompetitive behavior.

20. MANUFACTURER COULD NOT USE CONTRACT TERMINATION PROVISIONS TO FORCE DISTRIBUTORS INTO ANTICOMPETITIVE BEHAVIOR

Beer brewer had the right to terminate distributors according to the contract provisions which the distributors agreed to, but it could not use contract termination provisions to force its distributors into anticompetitive behavior.

21. CONTRACT TERMINATION PROVISIONS OF MANUFACTURER AND ITS DISTRIBUTORS WAS A MATTER OF PRIVATE CONTRACT AND NOT SUBJECT TO THIRD-PARTY INTERFERENCE

Contract termination provisions of beer brewer and its distributors, based upon their contractual obligations, were a matter of private contract and not subject to interference by third parties.

22. CONTENTION RAISED IN COURT BUT NOT IN ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDING BEFORE COMMISSION IS NOT PROPERLY BEFORE COURT OF APPEALS

Contention not raised in administrative proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission was not properly before the Court of Appeals.

23. AFFIDAVIT REFUTED CLAIM THAT F.T.C. STAFF ATTORNEY PERFORMED INVESTIGATIVE AND PROSECUTING FUNCTIONS IN PREPARING CASE, AND THAT HE PARTICIPATED IN REVIEW OF CASE AS ATTORNEY-ADVISOR TO NAMED COMMISSIONER

Beer brewer's claim that a staff attorney of the Federal Trade Commission performed investigative and prosecuting functions in preparing the case against the brewer, and that he also participated in the review of the case as attorney-advisor to named commissioner in violation of statute, was refuted by an affidavit of the attorney stating that, upon leaving the staff of the Commission, he did not discuss the merits of the brewery case with any of the commissioners or the Commission's trial staff.

24. Unless Choice of Remedy Has No Reasonable Relation To Unlawful Practices Found, Choice of F.T.C. Will Not Be Disturbed Because F.T.C. Is Vested With Wide Discretion in Coping With Unlawful Practices

    Federal Trade Commission is vested with wide discretion in its choice of remedies to cope with unlawful practices, and its choice will not be disturbed unless it has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found.

25. All Doubts About Commission Remedies Are To Be Resolved in Its Favor Once the Government Has Borne Its Burden of Establishing Violations of Law

    Once the government, in an anticompetitive practices case brought before the Federal Trade Commission, has borne its burden of establishing violations of the law, all doubts about the Commission's remedy are to be resolved in its favor.

On petition to review cease and desist order issued by the F.T.C., court held that (1) substantial evidence supported F.T.C.'s findings of illegal price-fixing agreements, (2) once manufacturer parted with dominion over its products, further efforts to restrict to whom the product could be transferred were a per se violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the F.T.C. Act, and (3) substantial evidence on the record supported finding of combination and coercion to sell brewer's draught beer to the exclusion of light draught beer competitors, and (4) findings that manufacturer used threats of speedy contract termination to force its distributors into anticompetitive behavior was supported by substantial evidence on record as a whole.

Adolph Coors Company appeals an Order to Cease and Desist issued by the Federal Trade Commission. The FTC filed a complaint alleging that Coors was engaged in anticompetitive practices in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.[1] An Initial Decision was issued by the Administrative Law Judge after hearings were conducted in Denver extending over a period of thirty days. The Law Judge found that Coors had not violated the Act. He recommended that the complaint be dismissed. The FTC appealed the Initial Decision to the five-member Federal Trade Commission. The Commission substituted its findings for those of the Law Judge and found, as a matter of law, that Coors had violated Section 5 of the Act.[2]

[1] Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 45, provides in part:

(a)(1) Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful.

* * * * * * *

(6) The Commission is empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations, ... from using unfair methods of competition in commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce.

[2] The Commissioners ordered that Coors cease and desist from:

1. Entering into, maintaining or enforcing any contract, agreement, combination, understanding or course of conduct which has as its purpose or effect the fixing, maintaining, establishing or setting of the prices at which distributors sell Coors beer to retailers or the prices at which retailers sell Coors beer to consumers.

2. Publishing, disseminating or providing any price list or other document indicating suggested or mandatory prices for the sale of Coors beer by any distributor to any retailer or any price list or other document indicating suggested or mandatory prices for the sale of Coors beer by any retailer to any consumer. * * *

3. Publishing, disseminating or providing to any distributor or any retailer any information or suggestions concerning what Coors may believe to be an appropriate or proper mark-up or profit for Coors beer when the distributor sells to the retailer or when the retailer sells to the consumer or a mark-up or profit below which the distibutor or retailer is advised not to sell Coors beer. * * *

4. Refusing to sell beer to any Coors distributor or terminating or threatening to terminate any Coors distributor because:

A. the distributor has in the past or might in the future sell Coors beer at prices, mark-ups, or profits different from those approved or recommended by respondent;

B. one or more of the distributor's customers sold Coors beer or advertised Coors beer for sale at prices, mark-ups or profits different from those approved or recommended by respondent;

C. the Coors distributor sold Coors beer to another distributor or to a retailer whose business is located outside of the territory granted to the distributor; or

D. the Coors distributor distributes, has distributed, or proposes to distribute in the future the product of another brewer.

5. Entering into, maintaining or enforcing any contract, agreement, combination, understanding or course of conduct to fix, establish, limit or restrict the territory in which or the persons to whom a distributor may sell Coors beer. * * *

6. Allocating Coors beer among its distributors in times of beer shortage at the Coors brewery, by any means other than by allocating shares to distributors equal to their proportionate purchases of Coors beer from the brewery during the last three months before the allocation or when the distributor has not been in business for more than a year as a Coors distributor, on some other equitable basis.

7. Refusing to deliver all of a distributor's order because the distributor has made sales to customers outside of the territory granted the distributor or because the distributor or the distributor's customer is selling Coors beer at prices, mark-ups or profits lower than those approved by respondent.

8. Prohibiting its distributors from selling for central warehouse delivery; provided, however, that respondent can establish refrigeration standards for the central warehouse which are substantially similar to those established for distributors and can require its distributors to be responsible, directly or indirectly, for maintenance of such refrigeration standards and for rotation of Coors beer in the central warehouse and at the Adolph Coors Company, a Colorado corporation, is engaged in brewing, dis[1182]tribution and sale of beer, using the trade name of "Coors". Coors has one brewery in Golden, Colorado, and distributes its beer in an eleven-state area. The beer is sold to the distributors who in turn sell to retailers. While Coors is the fourth largest beer brewer in the United States, it alone among the nation's some 70 brewers is a "shipping" brewery, i.e., Coors ships all of the beer brewed at its single "regional" brewing plant at Golden, Colorado, F.O.B. to the various distributors in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas (some counties only), Utah and Wyoming. In 1971 the average barrel of Coors beer traveled 961 miles to its market place.

The beer is made by the aseptic brewing process which requires refrigerated marketing. It is uncontroverted that Coors beer is substantially more expensive than any other beer consumed in the United States, and yet because of its popularity, Coors has climbed from the 49th largest brewery in 1948 to its number 4 position today. Coors maintains market leadership in total sales against all competitors except in its territory served in Texas. Because of the delicacy of the product, it is essential that the refrigeration controls and expeditious marketing techniques be strictly monitored. Once the beer is delivered to the distributors, this obligation is assumed by them under an agreement with Coors. It is the distributor who is required to protect the "integrity" of the Coors beer quality by guarding against a retailer's failure to rotate the beer, and failure to insure proper refrigerated storage. Coors beer retained over 90 days must be destroyed.

9. Entering into, maintaining or enforcing any contract, agreement, combination, understanding or course of conduct with its distributors which has as its purpose or effect requiring that retailers serve Coors draught beer as their only light-colored draught beer.

10. Entering into, maintaining, or enforcing any contract, agreement or understanding, or taking any action or course of conduct with any of its distributors which has as its purpose or effect the requirement that the distributor eliminate, or refrain from obtaining and handling rival brands of beer in order to become or remain a Coors distributor.

11. Hindering, suppressing or eliminating competition or attempting to hinder, suppress or eliminate competition between or among distributors or between or among retailers handling Coors beer.

Coors has 35 area representatives to help market the product. Each representative is assigned certain distributors to work with and to see that Coors' Policy Manual is followed. The price Coors charges to its distributors is set by Coors. Coors suggests to its distributors and retailers the price at which to sell its beer.

Each distributor is assigned a territory in which to market Coors' products. Coors may reduce the territory or add distributors to a particular territory. There are 166 independent distributors and one wholly owned subsidiary company.

In 1964 Coors eliminated sales to central warehouse accounts. Central warehouse accounts are either retailers such as large chain supermarkets who buy for redelivery to their own outlets, or independents who purchase for redelivery to nonaffiliated retail outlets or retailer warehouses.

Coors favors draught accounts. It has a draught policy in which tavern owners are given 30 days to discontinue handling other brands of light draught beer. If the owner-retailer continues to sell another brand of light draught beer, Coors discontinues its supply of light draught beer to the tavern.

The contract between Coors and the distributors enables Coors to cancel its contract for any breach by the distributor, with a five-day notice. Either Coors or the distributor may cancel the contract without cause with a 30-day notice.

Coors contends that: (1) it did not engage in wholesale or retail price fixing; (2) its vertically imposed territories are reasonable and legal; (3) it has no policy of requiring exclusive draught accounts; (4) it has the right to protect its quality product and not distribute its beer through central warehousing; (5) [1183] its contract termination rights are reasonable and legal; (6) the provisions of the Commission's Order are not supported by substantial evidence, are not reasonable, and are in conflict with important public policies; (7) the FTC internal procedures have prejudiced its right to a fair hearing; and (8) this court must exercise its power and set aside the Commission's Order.

I.

Coors contends that it did not engage in price fixing agreements with its distributors. Its practices are set out in the Coors Policy Manual which states as follows:

> In order to maintain a successful wholesale or retail business, pricing integrity is essential. Pricing integrity will result in an adequate and equitable profit to both Distributor and retailer and is fair to the ultimate consumer.
> It is the policy of the Adolph Coors Company to suggest, if it so chooses, to either the wholesaler or retailer level, suggested minimum pricing. We reserve the right to further that policy by simply refusing to deal with anyone who doesn't adhere to said policy.
> The Adolph Coors Company and its agents must only state the policy. They cannot make agreements, threaten, coerce, or intimidate wholesalers or retailers in any manner. They can enforce the policy only by reserving the right to refuse to deal with those who don't adhere to the suggested prices.

Coors' sales manager, Harvey Gorman, testified that the product is controlled by agreeing individually with each distributor. This policy is enforced by a provision in the contract between Coors and the distributor enabling Coors to terminate a distributorship in 30 days without cause. Since there are about 7,000 applicants for distributorships, any distributor who does not conform to Coors' pricing policies could readily be replaced. Coors' area representatives constantly obtain wholesale price information and send the information to the home office in Golden. The area representatives also resolve any conflicts between the prices proposed by a distributor and those suggested by Coors.

John Hemphill, a former Coors distributor, testified that he would only go so far in making a request to use his own prices, knowing that Coors could terminate him in 30 days. He also testified that a Coors' area representative told him that the best thing for him to do is not to be a distributor if he could not agree to Coors' policies on pricing and territories. The Law Judge had questioned Hemphill's credibility because of a suit he has pending against Coors, but the Commissioners rejected this fact as bearing on the issue of credibility.

Jay Wagnon, a Coors' distributor, testified that Coors insisted on controlling distributor price increases and that when he refused to adopt wholesale prices suggested by the Coors' area representative he was summoned to Golden and requested to change his prices. He stated that Coors' personnel told him to bring his prices in line with Coors' recommendations or they could put another distributor in his area. He testified that he was afraid; that he had been threatened; and that he therefore conformed to the suggested prices. The Law Judge did not find Wagnon's testimony credible. The Commissioners, on the other hand, found that his testimony was credible.

Jay Thurman, a former distributor, testified that he was given pricing sheets by the area representative which were to be followed. He was told that if the prices were changed, it would go through Mr. Straight, a Coors official, who, in turn, would determine if the changes were justified.

Peter Tinetti, a former distributor, testified that Coors sent him the prices at which to sell Coors beer.

The area representatives submitted reports to the Golden headquarters [1184] about agreements or understandings they had made with distributors on wholesale prices.

[1–3] Price fixing is illegal per se under the Sherman Antitrust Act. 15 U.S.C.A. § 1; Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 4–5, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Price fixing is also illegal per se under Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. 15 U.S.C.A. § 45. Prices are fixed when they are agreed upon. United States v. Masonite Corporation, 316 U.S. 265, 276, 62 S. Ct. 1070, 86 L. Ed. 1461 (1942). The agreement to fix prices renders the conspiracy illegal. The agreement may be inferred or implied from the acts and conduct of the parties, as well as from surrounding circumstances. Pearl Brewing Co. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 339 F. Supp. 945 (S.D. Tex. 1972); National Macaroni Manufacturers Association v. Federal Trade Commission, 345 F. 2d 421 (7th Cir. 1965).

> . . . the test . . . is whether the agreement, or conduct, interferes with the freedom of sellers or traders in such a manner as to prohibit or restrain their ability to sell in accordance with their own judgment, and not what particular effect the agreement or conduct, has on the actual prices.

[4–7] The findings of the Commission must be accepted by this court if there is substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole to support them. Universal Camera Corp. v. National Labor Relations Board, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S. Ct. 456, 95 L. Ed. 456 (1951). The Commission's overruling of the Law Judge's findings on the credibility of two witnesses is not required to be supported by a very substantial preponderance of the evidence. Federal Communications Commission v. Allentown Broadcasting Corp., 349 U.S. 358, 75 S. Ct. 855, 99 L. Ed. 1147 (1955). And where there is a possibility of drawing two inconsistent inferences from the evidence, the Commission is not prevented from drawing one. National Labor Relations Board v. Nevada Consolidated Copper Corp., 316 U.S. 105, 62 S. Ct. 960, 86 L. Ed. 1305 (1942); National Macaroni, supra. If the inference is supported by substantial evidence, it cannot be set aside even though the court could draw a different inference. National Macaroni, supra.

[8, 9] The Commission must consider the initial decision of the Law Judge and the evidence in the record on which it was based. Cinderella Career and Finishing Schools, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 138 U.S. App. D.C. 152, 425 F. 2d 583 (1970). But the findings and conclusions of the Law Judge are not sacrosanct and are not necessarily binding on the Commission or the court; they are part of the record to be considered on appeal. OKC Corp. v. Federal Trade Commission, 455 F. 2d 1159 (10th Cir. 1972). When the Law Judge and the Commission reach opposite results, the Law Judge's findings should be considered on review and given such weight as they merit within reason and the light of judicial experience. But this does not modify the substantial evidence rule in any way. OKC Corp., supra.

[10] There is substantial evidence from the record as a whole to support the Commission's findings of price fixing agreements between Coors and its distributors.

Coors also challenges the Commission's finding that Coors has a resale price maintenance program and that it has in some cases secured adherence to its suggested retail prices by unlawful means. There is substantial evidence to support the Commission's finding.

Coors' policy is to establish pricing integrity which means that a certain profit is allowed on each level of resale. Pricing integrity is not possible with price discounting. Coors implements pricing integrity by refusing to deal with anyone not adhering to its price [1185] suggestions. A Coors' area representative threatened to refuse further sales to an offending retailer unless he would adhere to the prices suggested by Coors. Coors used its distributors to secure retailers' adherence to suggested minimum prices. One area representative reported that a retailer was cut off by a distributor because the retailer was advertising Coors beer at cut prices. Another area representative reported that a distributor planned to take appropriate action against a retailer who refused to sell at suggested prices. A distributor reported that Coors beer was not delivered to a retailer who cut prices. An area representative reported that action would be taken against a retailer who refused to raise his prices to a profit level.

Mr. Letcher, a retailer, testified that he was selling Coors at special weekend prices and that he was warned by the Coors distributor to discontinue the practice. Letcher refused to cooperate and the distributor terminated deliveries to his store. The distributor told Letcher that deliveries would be received if he would agree not to discount the beer, and that Letcher might lose the retail account if he continued to discount the beer. Letcher was also told by the distributor that Coors does not tolerate price cutting. Letcher sold his business. The distributor resumed deliveries to the new owners who agreed not to discount the beer. The distributor did not act independently in cutting off Letcher as Coors suggests, but cut him off in accordance with Coors' pricing policies.

[11–14] United States Supreme Court decisions hold that if a manufacturer advances beyond a simple refusal to deal and takes affirmative action to secure compliance with its prices, a combination in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act occurs. United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 80 S. Ct. 503, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505 (1960); Federal Trade Commission v. Beech-Nut Packing Company, 257 U.S. 441, 42 S. Ct. 150, 66 L. Ed. 307 (1922). Any trespass on the independence of a reseller or wholesaler to set his own prices is a violation of the Sherman Act. Pearl Brewing Co., supra. A seller may refuse to deal with one failing to adhere to its specified prices, United States v. Colgate & Company, 250 U.S. 300, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992 (1919), but where a concerted effort is used to interfere with the distributors' pricing independence and to compel them to adhere to suggested prices, there is a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. A manufacturer may choose those to whom it will sell to as long as its conduct has no monopolistic purposes. Colorado Pump & Supply Company v. Febco, Incorporated, 472 F. 2d 637 (10th Cir. 1973), cert. denied 411 U.S. 987, 93 S. Ct. 2274, 36 L. Ed. 2d 965 (1973).

The Commission found that:

> . . . [Coors] has pursued a policy of fixing, controlling and maintaining prices at which Coors beer is sold at both the wholesale and retail level, that in furtherance of this policy it has engaged in various acts and practices such as: suggested resale prices to both distributors and retailers, checking prices at which distributors and retailers sell Coors beer, advising distributors and retailers that it is contrary to Coors pricing policy for them to deviate from prices approved by respondent, threatening to terminate distributorships and threatening to force distributors to sell their businesses for refusing to adhere to suggested retail prices, entering into agreements and understandings with distributors as to the wholesale prices which the distributors will charge for Coors beer, joining with distributors in attempting to coerce retailers to refrain from selling Coors beer at prices below those approved by respondent, encouraging distributors to prevent retail price cutting by refusing to deliver Coors beer to price cutters, or to reduce the amount of beer delivered, and entering into agreements and understandings with retailers as to the retail prices or [1186] range of prices at which such retailers will sell Coors beer.

There is substantial evidence in the record to support the Commission's findings.

II.

Coors alleges that its vertically imposed territories are reasonable and legal. The Commission held that Coors vigorously enforces its territorial restrictions and that it has engaged in unlawful price fixing which is:

> . . . [s]trong grounds for presuming that the most injurious effects of vertical territorial divisions may be operative, and, therefore, for holding the entire arrangement of territories with price fixing illegal per se.

The Coors' distributor contract provides, in part, as follows:

> While this agreement is in effect the Distributor will conduct the business of wholesale distribution of Coors Beer in the above territory only . . . .

In United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S. Ct. 1856, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1249 (1967), the United States brought an antitrust action against Arnold, Schwinn & Co., an association of Schwinn distributors and a Schwinn distributor, seeking a declaratory judgment to invalidate the distribution franchising system of its products. Schwinn bicycles are shipped directly to franchised retailers who agree to sell only to ultimate consumers. Schwinn also distributed its bicycles to franchised distributors who agreed not to resell to anyone outside their assigned territories. The Court held that:

> Under the Sherman Act, it is unreasonable without more for a manufacturer to seek to restrict and confine areas or persons with whom an article may be traded after the manufacturer has parted with dominion over it. White Motor, [Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 83 S. Ct. 696, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738 (1963)]; Dr. Miles [Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911)]. Such restraints are so obviously destructive of competition that their mere existence is enough. If the manufacturer parts with dominion over his product or transfers risk of loss to another, he may not reserve control over its destiny or the conditions of its resale.
> 388 U.S. at 379.

The rule of law in Schwinn is clear and unequivocal.

> Once the manufacturer has parted with title and risk, he has parted with dominion over the product, and his effort thereafter to restrict territory or persons to whom the product may be transferred—whether by explicit agreement or by silent combination or understanding with his vendee—is a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. 388 U.S. at 382.

See Federal Trade Commission v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 247, 92 S. Ct. 898, 31 L. Ed. 2d 170 (1972); United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., 405 U.S. 596, 92 S. Ct. 1126, 31 L. Ed. 2d 515 (1972); Williams v. Independent News Co., Inc., 485 F. 2d 1099 (3rd Cir. 1973); Warriner Hermetics, Inc. v. Copeland Refrigeration Corporation, 463 F. 2d 1002 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. denied 409 U.S. 1086, 93 S. Ct. 688, 34 L. Ed. 2d 673 (1972); Beverage Distributors, Inc. v. Olympia Brewing Co., 440 F. 2d 21 (9th Cir. 1971), cert. denied 403 U.S. 906, 91 S. Ct. 2209, 29 L. Ed. 2d 682 (1971); Fontana Aviation, Inc. v. Beech Aircraft Corporation, 432 F. 2d 1080 (7th Cir. 1970), cert. denied 401 U.S. 923, 91 S. Ct. 872, 27 L. Ed. 2d 826 (1971). Cf. Carter-Wallace

Inc. v. United States, 449 F. 2d 1374, 196 Ct. Cl. 35 (1971); Tripoli Company v. Wella Corporation, 425 F. 2d 932 (3rd Cir. 1970), cert. denied 400 U.S. 831, 91 S. Ct. 62, 27 L. Ed. 2d 62 (1970); LaFortune v. Ebie, 26 Cal. App. 3d 72, 102 Cal. Rptr. 588 (Cal. Ct. App. 1972).

[15] Coors, a manufacturer, enters into an agreement with its distributors [1187] to distribute Coors beer in the assigned territory only. Coors maintains that the territorial restrictions are necessary to retain the quality and proper refrigerated handling of its beer, and that the territorial restrictions are legal. However, since Coors parts with title and risk to the product when it sells and delivers the beer to distributors, and thus has parted with dominion over the product, its further effort to restrict the territories or persons to whom the product can be transferred is a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Coors may still condition its sales to distributors and others upon maintenance of procedures necessary to control the quality of the product.

Although we are compelled to follow the Schwinn per se rule rendering Coors' territorial restrictions on resale illegal per se, we believe that the per se rule should yield to situations where a unique product requires territorial restrictions to remain in business. For example, speed of delivery, quality control of the product, refrigerated delivery, and condition of the Coors product at the time of delivery may justify restraints on trade that would be unreasonable when applied to marketing standardized products. La Fortune v. Ebie, supra. Perhaps the Supreme Court may see the wisdom of grafting an exception to the per se rule when a product is unique and where the manufacturer can justify its territorial restraints under the rule of reason. White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 83 S. Ct. 696, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738 (1963).

The dissenters in Schwinn contended that the new per se rule cannot be justified, automatically invalidating vertical restraints in a distribution system based on sales to wholesalers and retailers.

> . . . the Court has, sua sponte created a bluntly indiscriminate and destructive weapon which can be used to dismantle a vast variety of distributional systems—competitive and anticompetitive, reasonable and unreasonable.

388 U.S. at 394.

Thus we are foreclosed from considering the reasonableness of the restriction or its business justification. We are cognizant of the unpredictability which is created in relationship to the Coors operation.

III.

[16] Coors contends that it has no policy of requiring exclusive draught accounts. The Commission found that Coors combined with its distributors in the practice of encouraging and coercing retailers to sell Coors draught beer to the exclusion of light draught beer competitors in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Mr. Coors testified that exclusive draught accounts were desirable. Several distributors testified that the purpose of obtaining exclusive draught accounts is to encourage draught customers to buy beer to take home. To implement the policy, Coors threatened to terminate a retailer's supply of Coors draught beer unless he eliminated competitive draught beers within 30 days. Coors' distributors did, in fact, take out their Coors draught beer if the retailer did not comply with the policy.

[17] Agreements foreclosing a competitor's products are unlawful. Federal Trade Commission v. Brown Shoe Co., Inc., 384 U.S. 316, 86 S. Ct. 1501, 16 L. Ed. 2d 587 (1966); Fashion Originators' Guild of America, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 312 U.S. 457, 668, 61 S. Ct. 703, 85 L. Ed. 949 (1941); Standard Fashion Company v. Magrane-Houston Company, 258 U.S. 346, 42 S. Ct. 360, 66 L. Ed. 653 (1922). The policy of pursuing an exclusive draught policy violates Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. There is substantial evidence in the record to support the Commission's finding.

IV.

[1188] [18] Coors asserts that it has the right to protect its quality product and not distribute its beer through central warehousing. The Commission held that Coors' prohibition of central warehouse sales, or a requirement that wholesale prices to those accounts equal those to other retailers is a substantial restraint on the capacity of the distributor to resell to whomever he chooses and threatens the same anticompetitive results as other illegal restraints on alienation. Therefore, the Commission found that the practices are unfair methods of competition in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

The central warehouse method of distribution involves purchase by the warehouser of beer from the brewer or the distributor. The beer is delivered by the retailer to its outlets. This method of distribution could cut the price of the beer to the retailer and consumer. Coors eliminated sales to central warehouse accounts in 1964. The distributors viewed central warehousing as a threat to the integrity of their territorial restrictions. Coors alleges that sales to central warehousers affects the quality of its beer because of poor procedures used by the warehousers.

The Order imposed by the FTC does not prevent Coors' distributors from conditioning its sales to central warehouse accounts on the maintenance of procedures necessary to the quality control of its products. The Order only enjoins Coors from requiring its distributors from refusing to sell to central warehouse accounts. The restriction by Coors, limiting those with whom the distributors may deal, amounts to a restriction on resale and violates the mandates of Schwinn and the Federal Trade Commission Act. There is substantial evidence in the record to support the FTC's finding.

V.

Coors alleges that its contract termination rights are reasonable and legal and that its conduct in the rare instances of its use has been proper and legal in every respect. The Commission held that:

> Whether or not any actual terminations of Coors distributors, or sales forced by threat of termination can be ascribed entirely, solely and unambiguously to the failure of the terminated or coerced distributor to participate in an antitrust violation, it is abundantly clear from the record in this case that Coors representatives have used the explicit or implicit threat or speedy termination is often successful in efforts to force the acquiescence of its distributors in anticompetitive behavior.

The Coors distributor contract provides in part as follows:

> This agreement and any supplements now or hereafter effective (whether fixing prices and terms to the Distributor, or otherwise) may be cancelled in entirety at any time by the Company for any breach by the Distributor on five (5) days' written notice to the Distributor. This agreement and such supplements may be cancelled in entirety by either party without cause upon the giving of notice to that effect to the other party, in which event termination shall become effective thirty (30) days after delivery or the mailing of the written notice of cancellation, whichever first occurs. * * *

[19] The Commission held that Coors used the threat of speedy termination to force its distributors into anticompetitive behavior. There is substantial evidence in the record to support the Commission's holding.

[20] Coors has the right to terminate distributors according to the contract provisions which the distributors have agreed to. Bushie v. Stenocord Corporation, 460 F. 2d 116 (9th Cir. 1972). However, it may not use the contract termination provisions to force its distributors into anticompetitive behavior.

[1189] [21] The Law Judge was correct in stating that the termination provisions of Coors and its distributors, based upon their contractual obligations, are a matter of private contract and are not subject to interference by third parties. The termination provisions are reasonable but may not be used by Coors to force any unlawful conduct. Therefore the Commission's attempt to rewrite Coors' contract termination provisions in paragraphs 12 and 13 of its Order must be set aside. The contract termination provisions do not violate Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

VI.

Coors alleges that FTC internal procedures have prejudiced its right to a fair and impartial hearing. Coors asserts that Mr. Steinitz, a staff attorney of the FTC, performed investigative and prosecuting functions in preparing the case against Coors, and that he also participated in the review of the case as attorney-advisor to Commissioner Paul Rand Dixon in violation of 5 U.S.C.A. § 554(d) and 16 CFR 4.7(a).

[22, 23] Coors' contention was not raised in the administrative proceeding and therefore is not properly before this court. Moog Industries, Inc. v. Federal Trade Commission, 355 U.S. 411, 78 S. Ct. 377, 2 L. Ed. 2d 370 (1958). In any event, Coors' contention has no merit because Mr. Steinitz, in an affidavit in the record, states that upon leaving FTC's staff he did not discuss the merits of the Coors case with any of the Commissioners or the Commission's trial staff. There was no error.

VII.

Coors alleges that the provisions of the Commission's Order are not supported by substantial evidence, are not reasonable, are in conflict with important public policies, and must be rejected. It alleges that Paragraphs 4C, 5 and 7, if adopted, would force it to abandon its right to choose those it will authorize to serve as its distributors in its marketing area, eliminating its ability to obtain required market penetration for its survival. Coors states that Paragraph 6, a formula devised by the FTC for beer rationing, is too simplistic to work effectively for Coors.

[24, 25] The Order by the Commission is reasonably related to the violations by Coors. The Commission is vested with wide discretion in its choice of remedy to cope with unlawful practices, and its choice will not be disturbed unless it has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found. Federal Trade Commission v. Mandel Brothers, Inc., 359 U.S. 385, 79 S. Ct. 818, 3 L. Ed. 2d 893 (1959); Jacob Siegel Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 327 U.S. 608, 66 S. Ct. 758, 90 L. Ed. 888 (1946). Once the Government has borne its burden of establishing violations of the law, all doubts about the remedy are resolved in its favor. United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 81 S. Ct. 1243, 6 L. Ed. 2d 318 (1961).

We hold that paragraphs 1 through 11 of the FTC's Order are enforced; paragraphs 12 and 13 of the FTC's Order are set aside.

HOLLOWAY, Circuit Judge (concurring in part and dissenting in part):

I fully concur in the well-reasoned opinion of the court in upholding paragraphs 1 through 11 of the Commission's order and disagree only as to the setting aside of paragraphs 12 and 13.

It is true that paragraphs 12 and 13 require a substantial change in the contract provisions on termination of distributorships. However, the Commission has found that it is abundantly clear that Coors representatives have used the explicit or implicit threat of speedy termination in efforts to force acquiescence of its distributors in anticompetitive behavior. We are agreed that there is substantial evidence in the record to support the finding.

The Commission has wide discretion in its choice of a remedy deemed adequate to cope with unlawful practices in [1190] this area of trade and commerce. See Siegel Co. v. FTC, 327 U.S. 608, 611, 66 S. Ct. 758, 90 L. Ed. 888. The courts interfere only where there is no reasonable relation between the remedy and the violation. Atlantic Refining Co. v. FTC, 381 U.S. 357, 377, 85 S. Ct. 1498, 14 L. Ed. 2d 443. And orders affecting contractual relationships have been upheld where unlawful practices involved similar subtle pressures and threats of termination of dealers' leases. Id. at 374–375.

On this record and the findings made I would uphold as reasonable the Commission's choice of a remedy to cope with the unlawful practices.

1. SCOPE OF COURT'S REVIEW IS NARROW IN CASES OF TRADE REGULATIONS AND MUST BE BASED ON ADMINISTRATIVE RECORD

   Scope of federal court's review of a trade regulation promulgated by the Federal Trade Commission is a narrow one and must be based on administrative record compiled by the commission.

2. WHETHER RULE IS ARBITRARY, CAPRICIOUS, AN ABUSE OF DISCRETION, OR NOT IN ACCORDANCE WITH LAW ARE STANDARDS OF REVIEW FOR FEDERAL COURT TO USE IN REVIEW

   Standard of review for federal court is whether Federal Trade Commission's rule is arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.

3. ACTION FOR REVIEW OF F.T.C. RULE NEITHER REQUIRED NOR NECESSITATED DISCOVERY

   Discovery was neither required nor necessary in action for review of a trade regulation rule promulgated by the Federal Trade Commission.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 392 F. Supp. 1052)

On review of trade regulation rule promulgated by F.T.C., court held that extensive discovery requested by plaintiff was neither required nor necessary, and that scope of court's review of trade regulation rule is narrow, based only on administrative record compiled by Commission.

Before ROBINSON, District Judge.

AUBREY E. ROBINSON, JR., District Judge.

This is an action for review of a trade regulation rule promulgated by the Federal Trade Commission. See 340 F. Supp. 1343 (D.D.C. 1972), reversed, 157 U.S. App. D.C. 83, 482 F. 2d 672 (1973). cert. denied 415 U.S. 951, 94 S. Ct. 1475, 39 L. Ed. 2d 567 (1974). The matter is now before the Court on Plaintiffs' request for extensive discovery of the "whole record" which they claim underlies the administrative proceedings herein. Plaintiffs seek to depose the former Chairman of the Commission and at least one former staff member who participated in the internal processes leading [1053] to promulgation of the rule under review here. In addition, Plaintiffs seek production of every document generated within the Commission in connection with the promulgation of the rule here challenged. Defendants vigorously oppose this discovery, contending that it is inappropriate under Rule 26, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, as irrelevant and not calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence herein.

[1] Essential to resolution of the present dispute is definition of the scope and basis of this Court's review herein. If wide-ranging de novo review were appropriate, discovery might well be allowed. Defendants contend, however, that the scope of review is a narrow one and that the Court must base its review on the administrative record compiled by the Commission. The Court finds defendants' position well taken.

The informal rule-making proceedings here under review were initiated pursuant to Section 4 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 553. The section requires only that the agency publish notice of proposed rule-making, provide opportunity for the presentation of views and comments by interested parties, and, after "consideration of the relevant matter presented," incorporate in the rules adopted a statement of their basis and purpose. There is no statutory provision requiring that F.T.C. rules be made on the record after hearing such that the more stringent, formal rule-making procedures of Sections 7 and 8 of the APA, 5 U.S.C. §§ 556 and 557, would apply.[1]

[2] In this context, it is clear that the standard of review for the Court is whether the Commission's rule is "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A), Camp v. Pitts, 411 U.S. 138, 140–142, 93 S. Ct. 1241, 36 L. Ed. 2d 106 (1973), Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 416, 91 S. Ct. 814, 28 L. Ed. 2d 136 (1971).

> To make this finding the court must consider whether the decision was based on a consideration of the relevant facts and whether there has been a clear error of judgment. . . . Although inquiry into the facts is to be searching and careful, the ultimate standard of review is a narrow one. The court is not empowered to substitute its judgment for that of the agency. Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, supra, at 416, 91 S. Ct. at 823 (citations omitted).

It is equally evident that the basis for review in the present case is limited to the administrative record compiled by the Commission[2] Camp v. Pitts, su[1054]pra, 411 U.S. at 142, 93 S. Ct. 1241, Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, supra, 401 U.S. at 420, 91 S. Ct. 812.

Plaintiffs have briefed extensively several major cases which deal generally with the adequacy of an administrative record. The short answer to this presentation is simply that each of these cases is distinguishable on its face as involving a specialized agency proceeding where important requirements were found to be imposed by statutes other than the APA.[3] Both Camp and Overton Park, on the other hand, involved informal proceedings solely under the APA, as does the present case. The Court finds, therefore, that the limited scope and basis of review set forth in Camp and Overton Park is applicable herein.

[1] United States v. Florida East Coast Railway Co., 410 U.S. 224, 93 S. Ct. 810, 35 L. Ed. 2d 223 (1973). There is indication in the Complaint herein and the Court of Appeals, decision, 482 F. 2d at 674, n. 2, that Plaintiffs claim entitlement to a full administrative hearing on statutory (Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45) and Constitutional due process grounds. If Plaintiffs intend to pursue this point, it is a purely legal issue going to the merits of the case rather than to the present discovery issues.

[2] Plaintiffs repeatedly emphasize the necessity of bringing the "whole record" before the Court, expressly suggesting that the Commission may have considered as material various undisclosed information developed through staff investigations or ex parte contacts. Plaintiffs seek to explore this possibility in order to bring the "whole record" before the Court. The term "whole record" apparently derives from 5 U.S.C. § 706, which sets forth the standard of review herein. Yet Plaintiffs have offered no authorities for the proposition that the term "whole record" means anything other than the administrative record as compiled by the agency. It is apparent, for example, that the Supreme Court in Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, equated the "whole record" requirement with "the full administrative record" on which the challenged decision is based. 401 U.S. at 420, 91 S. Ct. 814.

In Appalachian Power Co. v. E.P.A., 477 F. 2d 495, at 507 (4th Cir. 1973), the Court stated that it "must have before it the record of expert views and opinions, the technological data and other relevant material, including the state hearings, on which the Administrator himself acted" yet the context reveals that the Court was simply requiring that the entire administrative record developed before the agency be submitted for review, and the Court so indicated in requiring (at 507) that "the full administrative record" be certified to the Court. The agency had sought to confine the Court to the "four corners" of an administrative order, and the Court quite properly refused to be so confined.

Further, in those cases[4] where the administrative record was found inadequate, the remedy was not discovery, but remand to the agency for supplementation of the record. The discovery requested here would take place prior to review of the administrative record on the merits, while the remands in said cases took place only after the Court had determined on such review that the administrative record was inadequate. In only one case, Overton Park, has discovery at the judicial level been considered as an alternative, and there was allowed only as an expedient,[5] in sharply limited situations.[6] Even there, moreover, the Court expressly indicated that the District Court was not "required" to resort to testimonial procedures.[7]

The Commission's rule will stand or fall on the basis of the administrative record herein, which, it should be noted, is 2100 pages in length, including a statement of basis and purpose. If on reviewing the merits of this action the Court should find the record inadequate the possibilities include invalidation of the rule or remand for supplementation of the administrative record. In no event, however, does the Court foresee the type of de novo trial rejected in Camp, nor the probing of the mental processes of decisionmakers abjured in Overton Park.

[3] Plaintiffs will have ample opportunity to demonstrate the weaknesses [1055] of the present record. The absence of discovery need not limit judicial review. Discovery here is neither required nor necessary.

Defendants will be granted a protective order from discovery herein.

Civ. A. No. 19051. F.T.C. Docket No. 8890.

(United States District Court, Northern District of Georgia, Atlanta Div., June 26, 1974)

1. IN PROCEEDINGS BY F.T.C. TO SEEK ENFORCEMENT OF SUBPOENAS "DUCES TECUM," FOURTH AMENDMENT OBJECTIONS COULD BE RAISED

[1053] Fourth Amendment objections of defendants, in petition brought by Federal Trade Commission seeking an order requiring defendants to appear and produce documentary evidence in a Commission adjudicative hearing pursuant to certain subpoenas issued by the Commission, could be raised in the proceedings.

2. F.T.C. BEHAVIOR INFERRING INTENTIONAL PERVERSION OF LEGAL DISCOVERY PROCESS ENTITLED DEFENDANTS DISCOVERY AGAINST VARIOUS COMMISSION OFFICIALS ON QUESTION OF COMMISSION BEHAVIOR

Where combination of failure of Federal Trade Commission to rule on defendants' motions to quash July, 1968 subpoenas before their date of return, along with subsequent issuance of a possible invalid order denying motions to quash, raised inference that the Commission might have intentionally perverted the legal discovery processes available to it in order to obtain and examine corporate records of defendants pending defendants' attempt to secure their return, defendants were entitled to conduct discovery against various Commission officials on the question of whether the Commission's behavior in 1968 was so egregious as to taint the present subpoenas.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 378 F.Supp. 1052)

On petition of F.T.C. seeking enforcement of subpoenas duces tecum issued against defendants, and on counter-motion of defendants seeking dismissal of petition or in the alternative, discovery against the Commission, court held that because Commission behavior in issuing subpoenas against defendants in 1968 was possibly so egregious as to taint the present subpoenas, defendants were entitled to conduct discovery against various Commission officials on the question of previous Commission behavior.

Ruling deferred until discovery completed, motion of Commission for a protective order denied.

*Reported in 378 F. Supp. 1052 (1974). On December 19, 1974, this case was dismissed with prejudice in accordance with a motion filed by the Commission, pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 41(a)(2).

RICHARD C. FREEMAN, District Judge.

This is a petition brought by the Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter, the "FTC", or the "Commission"), for an order requiring respondents to appear and produce documentary evidence in an FTC adjudicative hearing pursuant to certain subpoenas duces tecum issued by the FTC. The subject matter jurisdiction of this court is grounded upon Section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (hereinafter, the "FTCA"), 15 U.S.C. § 49, which authorizes the FTC to issue subpoenas ad testificandum and duces tecum in connection with any matter under investigation by the FTC, and provides that a federal district court may, in the event of default, compel compliance therewith. Respondents have moved to dismiss the petition, or alternatively, for an order compelling discovery as against the FTC. Petitioner has responded by moving for a protective order against such discovery.

On February 27, 1974, this court denied two of respondent's objections to the instant subpoenas but requested additional briefs regarding the applicability of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures to the present proceedings. Specifically, the court wanted to consider (1) the traditional use of federal courts as forums in which to raise Fourth Amendment objections to administrative subpoenas and (2) the impact of the recent case of United States v. Calandra, 414 U.S. 338, 94 S. Ct. 613, 38 L. Ed. 2d 561 (1974) upon that use. After careful consideration of these issues, the court has concluded that the petition should not be granted at this time and that respondents are entitled to discovery from the FTC.

Before proceeding to the merits of the present dispute, it may be helpful to recapitulate the procedural setting from which it has arisen. Section 5 of the FTCA, 15 U.S.C. § 45, declares unlawful unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, and provides that whenever the FTC suspects that a party may be engaged in such behavior, it shall issue a complaint stating the charges and requiring the party to appear at an adjudicative hearing. The purpose of such a hearing is to determine whether or not the FTC shall issue a cease and desist order restraining the party from committing such unlawful acts in the future. Pursuant to § 3.34 of the FTC Rules of Practice, 16 CFR 3.34, both sides are en[1054]titled to apply for subpoenas ad testificandum and duces tecum to the Administrative Law Judge. In June of 1972, the FTC initiated, pursuant to § 5 of the FTCA, 15 U.S.C. § 45, an administrative proceeding entitled In the Matter of Frozen Food Forum, Inc., et al., Docket No. 8890, by filing a complaint against various distributors of grocery products. The complaint alleged that the corporate respondents herein, and others, had engaged and were engaging in the illegal pricing, price discrimination, and payment or receipt of unlawful brokerage fees, in violation of § 2 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, and § 5 of the FTCA. Specifically, it alleged that corporate respondent Frozen Food Forum, Inc. (hereinafter, "FFF") a grocery products distributor to institutions owned by 72 stockholder-members, contracted with suppliers to package grocery products under its own labels for sale by the suppliers to FFF's stockholder-members. It further alleged that corporate respondents Winton Sales Company, Carper Sales Company, and at one time Stewart-Tucker, Inc. (not a respondent herein), acted as brokers for FFF by purchasing grocery products on FFF's behalf and received brokerage fees from suppliers in excess of actual services rendered, in violation of § 2(c) of the Clayton Act. The complaint also alleged that FFF and its stockholder-members violated § 2(c) by receiving valuable brokerage services from its brokers without paying for such services, despite the fact that the brokers received compensation as such from suppliers.

On February 6, 1973, the FTC caused subpoenas duces tecum to be issued to Julius Levitt, individually and in his capacity as a corporate officer of FFF; to the corporate officers of FFF's alleged brokers, Carper Sales Company and Winton Sales Company; and to the corporate officers of four of FFF's stockholder-members, Arrow Food Distributors, Inc., Hardin's, Inc., Capitol Fish Company, and Bob Blanke Sales Company, Inc. The subpoena issued to FFF requests the production of material relating to acquisition and distribution of grocery products. The subpoenas issued to the four stockholder-members of FFF requests material relating to the relationships between the stockholder-member, FFF, and the three named brokers. The subpoenas issued to the brokers request material relating to their orders of grocery products for FFF from certain suppliers.

On February 20, 1973, respondents moved to quash the subpoenas. The motions were subsequently denied by the Administrative Law Judge one month later. In dismissing the motions to quash, the Administrative Law Judge ordered respondents to appear before him in Atlanta, Georgia, on April 3, 1973. Each respondent thereupon filed an affidavit stating his intention not to appear on April 3 in compliance with the subpoena. No proceedings were convened on April 3, and on April 16, government counsel filed a request for enforcement of the subpoenas with the Administrative Law Judge. Respondents were found in default for failure to comply with the subpoenas, and the matter was certified to the FTC for enforcement. The present proceedings were brought pursuant to this alleged default and certification.

Respondents have refused to comply with the present subpoenas on the grounds that they are the product of a prior illegal seizure of FFF's corporate records in August of 1968. Respondents contend that enforcement of the subpoenas would give judicial sanction to the FTC's prior unlawful actions, and request the invocation of the "exclusionary rule" to deny the present petition.

The history of the FTC's allegedly unlawful acquisition of FFF's corporate records commenced in July of 1968, when the FTC caused investigatory subpoenas duces tecum to be issued to Julius Levitt (individually and as an officer of FFF), to Ms. Joyce Alexander (individually and as an employee of FFF), and to George T. Stewart (of Stewart-Tucker, Inc., FFF's alleged bro[1055]ker). As in the present case, the government suspected FFF of violating Section 2 of the Clayton Act and Section 5 of the FTCA, but unlike the present case, it had yet to issue a formal complaint. Respondents made timely motions to quash the subpoenas.

Ms. Alexander's subpoena required her appearance before an FTC hearing examiner in Atlanta, Georgia, on August 14, 1968. The motion to quash had not been decided by that date, however. Ms. Alexander was unable to appear because of an illness in her family, but her counsel nevertheless requested a ruling on the pending motion to quash. The hearing examiner ruled that in the absence of a definitive FTC ruling on the motion, the subpoena was still in force. Corporate records of FFF requested by Ms. Alexander's subpoena were then tendered, under protest of counsel, by a Mr. Herbert Oliver. Mr. Oliver, an employee of FFF, testified in Ms. Alexander's stead regarding the tendered records, subject to her later confirmation.

On the following day, August 15, counsel for respondents received word by telephone that the FTC had denied their motions to quash, and several days later received in the mail what purported to be an order denying the motions. Counsel for respondents contended then, as they do today, that the order was invalid because it was not properly signed by the Secretary of the Federal Trade Commission. Further attempts by the FTC to secure compliance on the subpoenas were not successful, and proceedings to compel enforcement were brought in federal court.

During the course of proceedings before the Hon. Sidney O. Smith, U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, the FTC was ordered to return the papers and allow the respondents a limited opportunity to depose FTC officials regarding the allegedly invalid order denying the motion to quash. See, FTC v. Kujawaski et al., 298 F. Supp. 1288 (N.D. Ga. 1969). Upon the FTC's subsequent motion to dismiss and over the objections of respondents' counsel, the court dismissed the enforcement proceedings on August 6, 1969. Identical subpoenas duces tecum were issued to Julius Levitt and Joyce Alexander the following day, on August 7. Again, the respondents moved to quash.

This time, the motion was denied before respondents were required to testify, but respondents still refused to do so and were held in default. No further action was taken by the FTC to enforce this second set of subpoenas.

If the purpose of today's proceedings were to enforce the identical subpoenas served upon respondents in July of 1968 (and again in August of 1969), then the court would not hesitate in granting the present petitions, regardless of whether the Commission had previously obtained FFF's corporate records in an illegal fashion. This conclusion would necessarily follow from the lack of any connection between the FTC's alleged prior unlawful behavior and the present subpoenas. But respondents assert the existence of such a connection in the present case. Although Judge Smith eventually ordered the Commission to return FFF's records, respondents contend that while the records were in the Commission's possession, they were closely studied and analyzed, and that the information gleaned therefrom was used to draft the present subpoenas. For its part, the Commission has not denied the existence of a link between the drafting of present subpoenas and its analysis of the previously obtained corporate records. Respondents infer unlawfulness from the FTC's failure to rule on the motions to quash the July, 1968, subpoenas before the date of their return, and from the FTC's subsequent issuance of an allegedly invalid order denying the motions to quash. It is therefore urged that if the records had been obtained unlawfully, then any information produced by the present subpoenas would necessarily be tainted as the fruit of a poisonous tree.

Respondents base their Fourth Amendment argument upon Silverthorne [1056] Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385, 40 S. Ct. 182, 64 L. Ed. 319 (1920), in which the Supreme Court reversed a district court's judgment of contempt which had imposed a fine on a corporation and had imprisoned one of its officers. In that case, federal officers, after arresting Silverthorne and his father pursuant to an indictment, had unlawfully searched the offices of the Silverthorne Lumber Co. and seized certain documents. A new indictment was then handed down. The district court held the search unconstitutional and ordered the papers returned, but subpoenas were served on Silverthorne and the corporation requiring the production of the originals. The respondents refused to comply and were held in contempt. The Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that the subpoenas were drafted with the assistance of information gleaned from evidence seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. As stated by the Court:

> The essence of a provision forbidding the acquisition of evidence in a certain way is that not merely evidence so acquired shall not be used before the Court, but that it shall not be used at all.

251 U.S. at 392, 40 S. Ct. at 183. Although Silverthorne clearly stands for the proposition that Fourth Amendment objections may be raised in proceedings other than criminal trails (such as proceedings to enforce subpoenas duces tecum), it did not address the issue of whether such objections may be raised where the evidence is destined for ultimate use in an administrative, rather than a criminal proceeding.

This question was considered in Knoll Associates, Inc. v. F.T.C., 397 F. 2d 530 (7th Cir. 1968), wherein the Seventh Circuit set aside a cease and desist order issued by the FTC which was in part based upon evidence stolen by a former employee of Knoll Associates, Inc., for the purpose of assisting the FTC in its administrative prosecution of that company. The Commission unsuccessfuuly urged affirmance of its order on the grounds that Fourth Amendment objections could not be asserted by a corporation in its appeal of an administrative adjudication. The Court of Appeals rejected both the proposition that Fourth Amendment rights did not obtain in an administrative adjudicatory proceeding, as well as the proposition that a corporation had no standing to assert such rights therein. The Court reasoned that the purpose of the Fourth Amendment—that is, deterrence of governmental lawlessness—would be served by application of the exclusionary rule regardless of the criminal or administrative nature of the proceedings involved, and regardless of the personal or corporate nature of the party agrieved by the unlawful seizure.

Knoll may be distinguished from the present case because it arose from a direct appeal of the Commission's final cease and desist order, rather than from an interlocutory attack upon the evidence's admissibility. Petitioner therefore suggests that respondents' Fourth Amendment objections are premature, in that they could raise such objections before the Court of Appeals in their appeal of any cease and desist order issued by the Commission. Such an argument appears to be in direct opposition to Silverthorne, wherein the Supreme Court, by overturning a contempt citation for refusal to comply with subpoenas issued in a criminal action, thereby refused to validate even a preliminary judicial validation of subpoenas tainted by an unlawful search and seizure. Further, the respondent in Knoll had been prevented from making an interlocutory attack upon the tainted evidence in federal district court because it had not been obtained through normal discovery procedures, but through theft. Therefore, the respondent therein could raise its Fourth Amendment objections only by attacking the cease and desist order. Such is not the case here, as the respondents have at their disposal a federal district court forum in which to raise objections to subpoenas, by virtue of Section 9 of the FTCA.

[1057] [1] As it is clear that Fourth Amendment objections may be raised in these proceedings, the court now turns to a consideration of the recent Supreme Court decision of United States v. Calandra, supra. In that case, Calandra, who had previously been granted transactional immunity, had been called as a witness before a grand jury investigating loan-sharking activities. While testifying before the grand jury, Calandra objected to answering certain questions propounded to him on the grounds that they related to his involvement with evidence illegally seized from him by federal agents, and moved the district court to suppress and return such evidence. The district court thereupon determined that the evidence had been illegally seized and granted Calandra's motion. The Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that application of the exclusionary rule to the facts of that case would seriously interrupt and interfere with the grand jury's historically sanctioned investigatory and accusatory functions. As stated by the Court:

> Permitting witnesses to invoke the exclusionary rule before a grand jury would precipitate adjudication of issues * * * only tangentially related to the grand jury's primary objective. [footnote omitted]. The probable result would be "protracted interruption of grand jury proceedings," Gelbard v. United States, 408 U.S. 41, 70, 92 S. Ct. 2357, 2372, 33 L. Ed. 2d 179 (1972) (White, J., concurring), effectively transforming them into preliminary trials on the merits.

414 U.S. at 349, 94 S. Ct. at 620–21, 38 L. Ed. 2d at 572. The Court distinguished Silverthorne on the grounds that an indictment had already been handed down by a grand jury. Thus, the purpose of the subpoenas in that action was to gather evidence to be introduced at a trial designed to determine the defendants' guilt or innocence, and not at a grand jury to determine whether an indictment should be handed down. As stated by the Calandra Court, ". . . the primary consequence of the Court's decision [in Silverthorne] was to exclude the evidence from the subsequent criminal trial." 414 U.S. at 352, 94 S. Ct. at 622, 38 L. Ed. 2d at 574, fn. 8. Therefore, Calandra may be interpreted as recognizing an investigative exception to the exclusionary rule: that is, the Fourth Amendment may not be used to prevent investigative institutions from determining whether there is cause to believe that violations of the law have occurred.[1]

In light of the above, it is clear to this court that Calandra's exception to Silverthorne does not apply to the present action. It is undisputed that the present subpoenas duces tecum were issued in the course of an adjudicative proceeding, in that a formal complaint (comparable to an indictment drawn by a grand jury) has already been issued. The primary consequence of a denial of the present petition will be to exclude the evidence sought thereby from consideration in an adjudicative proceeding designed to determine whether respondents' behavior warrants issuance of a cease and desist order. No investigative proceedings will be interrupted by consideration of respondents' Fourth Amendment arguments at this point.

[1] The distinction between adjudicative and investigative proceedings was clearly recognized in F.T.C. v. Kujawski, supra, wherein Judge Smith implicitly acknowledged that an investigative subpoena may be entitled to some judicial deference. The Court found ". . . a definite tension between the need to allow administrative agencies to investigate matters fully without undue hinderance in the federal courts and a need to allow the investigated party some recourse at this early stage [that is, a Section 9 federal district court hearing] to check any abuses by that agency." 298 F. Supp. at 1290. The Court therefore allowed the respondents a limited opportunity to undertake discovery to determine if the subpoenas were procedurally valid.

[2] Although respondents have not alleged an illegal search and seizure in the sense of an actual physical entry onto respondents' property, we feel that the combination of the Commission's [1058] failure to rule on respondents' motions to quash the July, 1968, subpoenas before their date of return, with the subsequent issuance of a possibly invalid order denying motions to quash, raises the inference that the Commission may have intentionally perverted the legal discovery processes available to it in order to obtain and examine FFF's corporate records pending respondents' attempts to secure their return. Although it is unclear at this point whether or not the Commission's behavior in 1968 was so egregious as to taint the present subpoenas, we feel that respondents are entitled to conduct discovery against various FTC officials on this question, and hereby allow respondents ninety days from the date of this order in which to do so.

Accordingly, the court hereby defers any ruling on the instant petition until such time as discovery has been completed. The Commission's motion for a protective order is denied.

It is so ordered.

On appeal from decision of the U.S. District Court, S.D. Texas, dismissing the complaint, court held that where an administrative ruling that the McCarran-Ferguson Act did not immunize merger from Clayton Act section, did not have international repercussions, did not place in issue any constitutional rights and did not amount to blatant, even if jurisdictional, error corporations would have to exhaust administrative remedies. Before DYER and MORGAN, Circuit Judges, and KRAFT, District Judge.

LEWIS R. MORGAN, Circuit Judge:

In this case, plaintiffs-appellants seek to enjoin the Federal Trade Commission from preceeding against them under § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, on the ground that the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011–1015, deprives the Commission of jurisdiction over the case. Finding that any such injunction would be premature at this time, we affirm the district court's dismissal of the complaint.

On June 17, 1971, the Commission issued a complaint, Commission Docket No. 8847, against the Texas-based American General Insurance Co., charging that American General had violated § 7 of the Clayton Act by reason of its merger with Fidelity and Deposit Co. of Maryland. See 15 U.S.C. § 21. The complaint charged that the effect of the merger "may be substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly in the business of underwriting fidelity and surety bonds in the United States . . . ."

American General responded that the complaint failed to state a claim, denied the principal allegations of the complaint, and argued that the Commission was without jurisdiction to issue the complaint because the > . . . transaction which is the subject matter of the Commission's Complaint involves the business of insurance, which is regulated by State law. Accordingly, the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011–15 (1945), renders inapplicable section 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 18, to the merger of respondent American General Insurance Company with Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland.

Subsequently, Fidelity & Deposit was permitted to intervene in the administrative proceedings.

On December 27, 1971, American General moved for summary judgment on the issue of jurisdiction under Section 3.24 of the Commission's rules, 16 C.F.R. § 3.24. On March 7, 1972, an administrative law judge ruled that the Commission lacked jurisdiction to issue the complaint because the "States of Maryland and Texas, and many of the other states, have laws, capable of being enforced, which regulate the business of insurance, within the contemplation and meaning of the McCarran-Ferguson Act."

Commission counsel appealed the decision of the administrative law judge to the Commission. A three-member ma[199]jority held that jurisdiction was not barred by the McCarran-Ferguson Act because the states could not regulate the merger activity of national insurance companies. In addition, the Commission held that "the business of insurance for which regulation by a state may preempt Federal jurisdiction does not include mergers or other combinations of enterprises engaged in the activity of selling insurance." In its opinion, the Commission vacated the initial decision and remanded the case to the administrative law judge for further proceedings.

On March 5, 1973, American General and Fidelity & Deposit filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas seeking a declaratory judgment that the McCarran-Ferguson Act immunized the merger from § 7, and injunctive relief "prohibiting Defendants from conducting any further proceedings in FTC Docket No. 8847."

[1, 2] On June 5, 1973, 359 F. Supp. 887, the court denied plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction and granted defendants' motion to dismiss "for failure to exhaust administrative remedies." The court concluded

> . . . that there has not yet been any final agency action, that the Federal Trade Commission has not clearly exceeded the bounds of its jurisdiction, and that the Plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law through review of the final Commission order as provided by the Clayton Act. . . .

The court opined that were it to reach the merits, it would uphold the Commission's position: "because a state cannot regulate extraterritorially, the potential regulation of the instant merger by Texas and Maryland, the domiciliary states of the Plaintiffs, does not by way of the McCarran-Ferguson Act deprive the Commission of jurisdiction to challenge the merger under Section 7 of the Clayton Act when the impact of the merger obviously will be felt in all fifty states." The plaintiffs have appealed.

The rule that a plaintiff must exhaust all available administrative remedies before coming to a federal court for relief is old and well-established. In Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, 303 U.S. 41, 51, 58 S. Ct. 459, 463, 82 L. Ed. 638 (1938) the Supreme Court referred to

> . . . the long settled rule of judicial administration that no one is entitled to judicial relief for a supposed or threatened injury until the prescribed administrative remedy has been exhausted. That rule has been repeatedly acted on in cases where, as here, the contention is made that the administrative body lacked power over the subject matter. [footnote omitted.]

It is true that certain distinguished commentators have questioned whether the rule is as firm as the Myers Court would imply. K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, § 20.02 (1958). Nevertheless, it remains true that the doctrine of exhaustion "is well established in the jurisprudence of administrative law." McKart v. United States, 395 U.S. 185, 193, 89 S. Ct. 1657, 1662, 23 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1969). Of course, the doctrine has numerous exceptions. Id.

In a comprehensive and learned review of this area of the law, this court in United States v. Feaster, 410 F. 2d 1354 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. den., 396 U.S. 962, 90 S. Ct. 427, 24 L. Ed. 2d 426 (1969), described the relevant exceptions to the rule that administrative remedies must be exhausted prior to review by the courts. The first factor which would permit premature resort to judicial remedies is an international repercussion resulting from the administrative proceedings. McCulloch v. Sociedad Nacional de Marineros de Honduras, 372 U.S. 10, 83 S. Ct. 671, 9 L. Ed. 2d 547 (1963). There is not even the merest allegation that this factor is present here.

This second exception was fashioned by the Second Circuit in Fay v. Douds, 172 F. 2d 720 (2nd Cir. 1949). A litigant may rely on this exception only if [200] there is a substantial showing that his constitutional rights have been violated. 410 F. 2d at 1366. The question in this case is purely one of statutory intrepretation and application. No constitutional provision is at issue.

The final exception is based on Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S. Ct. 10, 3 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1958).

> In that case the Supreme Court permitted review of the NLRB's certification of a bargaining unit which included both professional and nonprofessional employees even though the professional employees had not consented to inclusion in the otherwise nonprofessional unit. This action was a brazen defiance of the express provisions of 29 U.S.C.A. § 159(b)(1). [footnote omited.] 410 F. 2d at 1366.

In this case, appellants seek to bring themselves within the Leedom v. Kyne exception by emphasizing that their challenge to the Commission's action is jurisdictional. However, it has never been the law that any jurisdictional error, no matter how slight, throws open the gates to premature court action. The jurisdictional area must be gross or egregious to provide an exception to the rule of exhaustion.

> The extraordinary remedy of judicial intervention in agency proceedings still in progress is unavailable unless necessary to vindicate an unambiguous statutory or constitutional right, and only when this condition is satisfied will a court look to the general body of equitable jurisprudence and other appropriate sources for the purpose of fashionable relief. Coca-Cola Company v. F.T.C., 475 F. 2d 299, 304, (5th Cir. 1973).

It has also been stated that the Leedom v. Kyne exception is "narrow" and "rare-successfully invoked" and that the error must be "of a summa or magna quality as contraposed to decisions which are simply cum error." 410 F. 2d at 1368. We are unwilling at this stage of the proceedings to make a determination of the merits of the jurisdictional question. It is nevertheless obvious from the record in the district court and the briefs and arguments on appeal that the question is a close one. If the Commission is committing error by proceeding against the appellants, its error is not blatant or obvious. The McCarran-Ferguson Act is not without ambiguity, and we feel that the question of its applicability is better left to a review of any final order which may be entered in this case.

Many policy considerations support this holding. A crucial one is "the avoidance of premature interruption of the administrative process." McKart v. United States, supra, at 193. In addition, the efficiency of the agency is an important consideration, and courts ought not to encourage flouting of the administrative process. Considerations of judicial economy also enter into the equation, since, if no cease-and-desist order is ever entered, the courts need not deal with the jurisdictional question at all. Finally, there are systemic factors to be considered. Professor Jaffe has called the exhaustion doctrine "an expression of executive and administrative autonomy." L. Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action, 425 (1965).

It is true, as appellants argue, that the necessity for further fact-finding, which would be a strong argument for requiring exhaustion, does not play a crucial role in this case. However, it has never been the law that exhaustion is not required as to questions of law. In fact, an agency's interpretation of a statute is entitled to "great deference." Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16, 85 S. Ct. 792, 13 L. Ed. 2d 616 (1965). It must be emphasized that > . . . Congress did not contemplate a grant of jurisdiction to the courts to prevent abuse or misuse of administrative power by prior restraint of the exercise of such powers. Lone Star Cement Corp. v. F.T.C., 339 F. 2d 505, 510 (9th Cir. 1964).

In summary, we are not convinced that the extraordinary showing of necessity which is needed to justify prema[201]ture judicial interference, is present in this case. We therefore uphold the district court's refusal to derail the pending Commission procedings in this matter.

Affirmed.

ALTERMAN FOODS, INC. v. F.T.C.*

No. 73–1960. F.T.C. Docket No. 8844

(United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, July 22, 1974)

1. IF SUPPORTED BY SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE, FINDINGS OF F.T.C. ARE CONCLUSIVE

   Findings of Federal Trade Commission that party has engaged in an unfair method of competition are conclusive if supported by substantial evidence.

2. BARRING UNREASONABLE RELATIONSHIP TO UNLAWFUL PRACTICES FOUND, F.T.C. HAS WIDE DISCRETION IN CHOICE OF REMEDIES FOR UNLAWFUL PRACTICES

   Federal Trade Commission has wide discretion in its choice of remedies for unlawful practices and its determination with respect thereto is not to be disturbed unless remedy selected has no reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist.

3. REMEDIES FOR UNLAWFUL PRACTICES ARE NOT LIMITED ONLY TO THE PRECISE FORM OF ILLEGAL PRACTICES FOUND

   Federal Trade Commission is not limited in choosing remedy for unlawful practices to prohibiting only the precise form of illegal practices found by it.

4. F.T.C. MAY REACH RESULTS CONTRARY TO ITS HEARING OFFICER, FOR THE COMMISSION, NOT THE LAW JUDGE, BEARS ULTIMATE RESPONSIBILITY OF DETERMINING WHETHER THERE HAS BEEN A VIOLATION OF LAW

   Federal Trade Commission, rather than Administrative Law Judge, bears ultimate responsibility of determining whether party has engaged in an unfair method of competition and may, therefore, reach results contrary to those of its hearing officer.

5. COMMISSION'S FINDINGS, NOT LAW JUDGE'S IF SUPPORTED BY SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE ARE CONTROLLING

   Findings substituted by Federal Trade Commission for those of Administrative Law Judge in proceedings to remedy unfair methods of competition are controlling if supported by substantial evidence.

*Reported in 497 F. 2d 993 (1974). For case before the Commission, see 82 F.T.C. 298.

6. PETITIONER'S CONDUCT IN INDUCING PARTICIPATION OF ITS SUPPLIERS IN FOOD SHOWS FOR ITS BUYERS AND CUSTOMERS VIOLATED F.T.C. ACT

Conduct of wholesaler and retailer of groceries and household products in inducing its suppliers to participate in food shows for its buyers and customers was violative of Federal Trade Commission Act at the retail level of distribution, despite contention that the food shows were solely wholesale promotions and that promotional allowances and services provided by the suppliers were not connected with resale of suppliers' products to retail customers, where, inter alia, suppliers were invited by buyers who purchased for retail division and profits realized by wholesaler and retailer from suppliers' rentals of booths at the food shows were, in effect, price reductions on suppliers' products.

7. LACKING FORMAL PROOF, F.T.C. COULD STILL INFER VIOLATIONS OF STATUTORY REGULATIONS

Federal Trade Commission could properly infer that profits realized by wholesaler and retailer from rentals paid by its suppliers for booths at food shows organized for buyers and customers of the wholesaler and retailer were put to use at retail level, in support of determination that inducing suppliers to participate in the food shows constituted violation of Federal Trade Commission Act at retail level of distribution, even [994] though there was no formal proof that profits on the food shows were put to use at the retail level.

8. DETERMINATION OF FUNCTION OF COOPERATIVE WAS WITHIN PROVINCE OF TRIER OF FACT

Determination of whether retailer-owned buying cooperative functioned as a wholesaler in competition with retailer and wholesaler, whose wholesale division sold exclusively to independent grocery stores organized as a voluntary cooperative, was within province of trier of fact in proceeding to determine whether wholesaler and retailer violated Federal Trade Commission Act.

9. EVIDENCE SUPPORTED FINDING THAT COOPERATIVE KNOWINGLY INDUCED AND RECEIVED DISCRIMINATORY ALLOWANCES AND SERVICES IN VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ACT

Evidence that retailer-owned buying cooperative performed functions similar to petitioner's wholesale division which sold exclusively to independent grocery stores organized as a voluntary cooperative sustained determination that petitioner's wholesale division and the retailer-owned buying cooperative were in basic competition for wholesale business and that petitioner's conduct in knowingly inducing and receiving dscriminatory allowances and services constituted violation of Federal Trade Commission Act at the wholesale level.

10. FACTS WERE ENOUGH TO SUSTAIN DETERMINATION OF VIOLATION OF F.T.C. ACT

Demonstration that wholesaler and retailer of groceries and household products knowingly solicited and obtained from supplier promotional considerations which were not available to competitor on the wholesale level was sufficient to sustain determination that wholesaler and retailer had violated Federal Trade Commission Act on the wholesale level, despite contention that the wholesale competitor competed in the distribution of the products of only one small supplier and that the violation was, therefore, de minimis.

11. TO SHOW PRIMA FACIE VIOLATION, IT IS NOT NECESSARY TO PROVE INJURY TO COMPETITION

Proof of injury to competition is not required to show prima facie violations of prohibition against supplier's allowances for advertising or other sales promotion services or facilities unless allowances are available on proportionally equal terms to all customers competing in distribution of such products and of prohibition against a seller favoring any purchaser with promotional services and facilities not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms.

12. TO SOLICIT DISCRIMINATORY PROMOTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS IS ILLEGAL PER SE

Solicitation of discriminatory promotional consideration is per se illegal.

13. AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, NOT SIMPLY WILLINGNESS, TO MAKE AVAILABLE EQUAL PROMOTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS IS REQUIRED TO AVOID BEING DISCRIMINATORY

To avoid being discriminatory, supplier's promotional payments and services must be made available or accorded to competing customers, and to meet this requirement, supplier must not merely be willing, if asked, to make an equivalent deal with other customers but must take affirmative action to inform all customers of availablility of the promotion programs.

14. BURDEN OF PROOF WAS ON PETITIONER TO SHOW AVAILABILITY OF SIMILAR PAYMENTS ONCE F.T.C. SHOWED THAT ONLY WHOLESALER AND RETAILER RECEIVED SPECIAL PAYMENTS

[995] Once Federal Trade Commission showed that only wholesaler and retailer received special payments and services from suppliers, burden of proving availability of similar payments to competitors was on the wholesaler and retailer in proceedings before the Commission for alleged violation of Federal Trade Commission Act.

15. WHERE SUPPLIERS WERE EITHER UNABLE OR UNWILLING TO EXTEND SIMILAR PROMOTIONAL CONSIDERATION TO OTHER CUSTOMERS, PARTICIPATION IN FOOD SHOWS ORGANIZED BY THE WHOLESALER AND RETAILER OF THE SUPPLIERS WAS DISCRIMINATORY AND CONDUCT OF WHOLESALER AND RETAILER IN INDUCING SUPPLIERS TO PARTICIPATE IN THE SHOWS WAS VIOLATIVE OF F.T.C. ACT

Participation in food shows, which were organized by wholesaler and retailer of groceries and household products for its buyers and customers, by suppliers of the wholesaler and retailer was discriminatory and conduct of wholesaler and retailer in inducing its suppliers to participate in the shows was violative of Federal Trade Commission Act where suppliers were either unwilling or unable to extend similar promotional consideration to their other customers.

16. IN FORMULATION OF ITS DECREES, F.T.C. HAS BROAD DISCRETION

Federal Trade Commission has broad discretion in formulation of its decrees.

17. F.T.C. HAS BROAD DISCRETION IN FORMULATING ITS ORDERS UPON FINDING VIOLATIONS OF LAW

Order of Federal Trade Commission prohibiting retailer and wholesaler from inducing and receiving promotional considerations which it knows or should know are not offered to others was not overly broad where Commission determined that the wholesaler and retailer had violated the Federal Trade Commission Act by inducing its suppliers, at their own expense, to participate in food shows which were organized for its buyers and customers and which resulted in receipt by wholesaler and retailer of promotional allowances and services which were not accorded on proportionally equal terms to other customers of the suppliers.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 497 F. 2d 993)

On petition to set aside order of F.T.C., court held that conduct of wholesaler and retailer in inducing its suppliers to participate in food shows sponsored by the wholesaler and retailer for its buyers and sellers was violative of the F.T.C. Act.

Petition denied and order enforced.

Before DYER, MORGAN, and RONEY, Circuit Judges.

RONEY, Circuit Judge:

The general question in this case is whether a wholesaler and retailer of groceries and household products violates the Federal Trade Commission Act by inducing its suppliers, at their own expense, to participate in a food show for its buyers and customers, knowing that the suppliers did not so cooperate with its competitors. The Federal Trade Commission found a violation, and we agree.

The case comes to us on a petition of Alterman Foods, Inc. to set aside a Federal Trade Commission cease and desist order. 82 F.T.C. 298, Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 20,248 (Dkt. 8844, Feb. 12, 1973). Alterman is a combination wholesaler and retailer of groceries and household products serving primarily Georgia and Alabama with annual sales exceeding $130 million. It sells to the public at retail from approximately 70 food stores, Big Apple, Food Giant, and K-Mart, which it operates directly or through wholly-owned subsidiaries. Its wholesale division sells exclusively to the "A.B.C. Food Stores," approximately 375 independent grocery stores organized as a voluntary cooperative and under contract to pur[996]chase most of their stock from Alterman. The institutional division sells in bulk to restaurants, hotels, hospitals, and other institutions.

Since 1956 Alterman has held an annual "food show" conducted under the jurisdiction of its wholesale division, for the institutional, independent, and supermarket buyers. At the show, suppliers demonstrate their wares to an audience of up to 15,000 managers, comanagers, and employees of the Alterman owned retail outlets, together with their families and friends; independent A.B.C. Store owners, their employees, families, and friends; and customers of the institutional division. The general consuming public is not invited to attend.

The Commission found that the suppliers' involvement in the food show constituted, in connection with the resale of the suppliers' products, promotional allowances and services to Alterman which were not accorded on proportionally equal terms to the suppliers' other customers. The suppliers thus violated sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. 13 (d) and (e). The Commission concluded that Alterman, by knowingly inducing and receiving these discriminatory allowances and services, engaged in unfair competition at both wholesale and retail levels in violation of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 45. It issued a cease and desist order.

Seeking to set aside or modify the order, Alterman asserts (1) no retail level violation was proved because the promotional allowances and services were not provided in connection with the retail sale of the suppliers' products; (2) there was no violation of the Act at the wholesale level because no other customers of the participating suppliers competed with Alterman at the wholesale level except one wholesaler as to which any violation was de minimis; (3) in any event, the allowances and services satisfied the tests for proportional equality among the suppliers' customers; and (4) the Commission's order was overbroad.

Applicable Legal Principles

The Commission determined that Alterman, in inducing suppliers to violate their obligations under the amended Clayton Act, had committed an unfair method of competition proscribed by section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 45(a)(1).[1] The courts have uniformly accepted this use of section 5 to reach buyer conduct not directly proscribed by the prohibitions on sellers established by sections 2(d) and 2(e) of the amended Clayton Act. Colonial Stores, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F. 2d 733 (5th Cir. 1971); FTC v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 336 F. 2d 687 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 380 U.S. 908, 85 S. Ct. 890, 13 L. Ed. 2d 796 (1965); R. H. Macy & Co. v. FTC, 326 F. 2d 445 (2d Cir. 1964); Giant Food, Inc. v. FTC, 113 U.S. App. D.C. 227, 307 F. 2d 184 (1962), cert. denied, 372 U.S. 910, 83 S. Ct. 723, 9 L. Ed. 2d 718 (1963); see FTC v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 390 U.S. 341, 88 S. Ct. 904, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1222 (1968).

Section 2(d) makes it unlawful for a supplier to pay allowances for advertising or other sales promotion services or facilities provided by one customer who resells the supplier's products unless the allowances are "available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products." [2]

[1] 15 U.S.C.A. § 45(a)(1) reads:

> Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful.

[997] Section 2(e) prohibits a seller from favoring any purchaser with promotional services and facilities "not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms." [3]

The basic factual elements of the unfair method of competition of inducing discriminatory payments or services violative of the Clayton Act are:

> 1. that a respondent in commerce knowingly solicited or ininduced and received from a supplier promotional allowances, services, or facilities;
> 2. that the solicited promotional considerations were received in connection with the resale of the supplier's product;
> 3. that the respondent had competitors at the same functional level; and > 4. that the respondent knew or should have known that its competitors were not offered the promotional considerations in question on proportionally equal terms.

[2] Section 2(d), 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(d), provides in full:

> It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to pay or contract for the payment of anything of value to or for the benefit of a customer of such person in the course of such commerce as compensation or in consideration for any services or facilities furnished by or through such customer in connection with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of any products or commodities manufactured, sold, or offered for sale by such person, unless such payment or consideration is available on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing in the distribution of such products or commodities.

[3] Section 2(e), 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(e), provides in full:

> It shall be unlawful for any person to discriminate in favor of one purchaser against another purchaser or purchasers of a commodity bought for resale with or without processing, by contracting to furnish or furnishing, or by contributing to the furnishing of, any services or facilities connected with the processing, handling, sale, or offering for sale of such commodity so purchased upon terms not accorded to all purchasers on proportionally equal terms.

Commission's Findings and Order

All of Alterman's suppliers were encouraged to participate in the food show each year. In each year covered by the complaint (1966–1969), approximately 300 suppliers participated. In order to participate, a supplier was required to rent a booth in which to display his products, at a cost of $350 or $375 depending on the year, and to staff the booth in order to display its products. The section 2(d) charge is based on the [998] profit Alterman derived from the show, approximately $100 per supplier even after an admittedly generous allowance for indirect costs. The section 2(e) allegation stems from the promotional services—supplies and labor—furnished by the participating suppliers.

The Commission found that Alterman knowingly induced suppliers to participate in its food show and thereby received favored allowances and services.[4] The Commission determined that the food show benefited Alterman's retail and wholesale sales. Both Associated Grocers Co-op, Inc. and May & Company of Georgia were wholesale competitors discriminated against by suppliers' participation in the food show. The Promotional considerations accorded by the suppliers discriminated against Alterman's retail competitors both directly and indirectly.

Having found the elements necessary to adjudicate section 5 violations at both wholesale and retail levels, the Commission issued an order which prohibits Alterman from inducing and receiving from a supplier promotional services or facilities, or anything of value in exchange for promotional consideration provided by Alterman, when Alterman knows or should know that the promotional considerations it obtains are not made available by the supplier on proportionally equal terms to all other customers competing with Alterman in the distribution of the supplier's products. The term "customers" includes retail customers who do not purchase directly from the supplier. As to the operation of future food shows, the order requires Alterman to bear its proper share of the operating expenses and to repay any profit on a show to all participants pro rata. Alterman must deliver a copy of the Commission's order to everyone invited to participate in a food show.

[4] The Administrative Law Judge's finding that Alterman had sufficient information and experience that it should have known that similar offers had not been made to the grocery trade establishes the requisite element of scienter. See, e.g., Colonial Stores, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F. 2d 733, 744–745 (5th Cir. 1971); American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F. 2d 104, 110 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 824, 83 S. Ct. 44, 9 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1962).

Retail Sales

Alterman argues that the Commission erred in finding a violation at the retail level of distribution on the ground that the food shows are solely wholesale promotions and the promotional allowances and services provided by the suppliers were not "in connection with" resale of the suppliers' products to retail customers. The Commission reasoned that the suppliers' booths, displays, and demonstrations aided Alterman's retail operation both indirectly and directly: indirectly, by giving special information to those involved in retail sales on how to display and market their products most effectively, thus giving them an advantage over their retail competitors; and directly, by the profit made by Alterman's wholesale division from the show, which could in turn reduce the profit margin it needed from the sale of products through its retail division in order to achieve an appropriate overall corporate profit.

Alterman cites the Administrative Law Judge's finding that the food shows were wholesale promotions and that the promotional services did not facilitate retail sales. In support of this position, Alterman notes that the consuming public was not invited to attend the food shows and that there was no general advertising of shows. In addition, it points out that, although personnel from Alterman's retail outlets were invited to the shows, they were not permitted to purchase from suppliers there and were not eligible for free orders and prizes offered by suppliers. Alterman also contends that the Commission did not prove that the profits on food shows were used by the retail division and thus did not prove discriminatory allowances in connection with resale at retail.

[4, 5] We should note that the Commission, rather than the Administrative [999] Law Judge, bears the ultimate responsibility of decision and may, therefore, reach results contrary to those of its hearing officer. Findings substituted by the Commission, if supported by substantial evidence, control. Mississippi River Corp. v. FTC, 454 F. 2d 1083, 1089 (8th Cir. 1972); Art National Manufacturers Distributing Co. v. FTC, 298 F. 2d 476, 477 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 370 U.S. 939, 82

S. Ct. 1588, 8 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1962); cf. NLRB v. Seafarers International Union, 496 F. 2d 1363, 1364 (5th Cir. 1974).

[6] The record contains substantial evidence supporting the Commission's determination that the food shows were in connection with Alterman's retail resales of the participating suppliers' products. Suppliers were invited by Alterman's buyers who purchased for the Company's retail division as well as for its wholesale business. The Alterman vice-president in charge of retail operations testified that the Company's retail stores and their managers definitely benefit from the food shows. Company literature encouraging retailers to attend the shows stresses the benefits to them of participation. The store managers have general discretion in stocking their stores. By going to a food show, a manager can acquire information on new products. He can also observe methods of promoting sales and building up his store. According to another Alterman vice-president, the food shows "cement the relationship between a food supplier and the retailer." Thus, the suppliers' promotional services at food shows benefited Alterman at the retail level.

[7] The profits on booth rentals were, in effect, price reductions on suppliers' products. See Grand Union Co. v. FTC, 300 F. 2d 92, 99 (2d Cir. 1962). Although, as Alterman argues, there is no formal proof that its profits on the food shows were put to use at the retail level, the Commission could properly infer that this additional source of profit enabled the Company to maintain a given overall profit level while charging less in its other operations, an advantage denied to Alterman's competitors. This inference lies within the competence of the Commission and constitutes substantial evidence in the absence of contrary evidence produced by Alterman. See Colonial Stores, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F. 2d 733, 739 n. 13, 741 nn. 17 & 18 (5th Cir. 1971).

Wholesale Competition

[8] Alterman attacks the Commission's finding that Associated Grocers is "as a practical matter" based on "the market realities" in competition with Alterman at the wholesale level. In the broad range of possible functional organizations, a retailer-owned buying cooperative, such as Associated Grocers, may serve as the common agent of individual retailer-members, as their wholesaler, or as something in between. Classification as to function is the province of the trier of fact. Fred Meyer, Inc. v. FTC, 359 F. 2d 351, 361 (9th Cir. 1966), rev'd in part on other grounds, 390 U.S. 341, 88 S. Ct. 904, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1222 (1968).

[9] We find the Commission determination that Associated Grocers' 8headquarters was Alterman's functional competitor supported by substantial evidence. Associated Grocers' headquarters performs functions similar to Alterman's operation of its voluntary cooperative for A.B.C. Stores. Each maintains substantial inventories of suppliers' products, purchased directly in its own name, in a large warehouse. Each sells products at wholesale prices and delivers them to affiliated independent retail stores. There is some degree of competition between the two organizations for the business of existing and new independent retail outlets. Finally, there was testimony that, during the years covered by the complaint, Alterman and Associated Grocers were the only two major sources in the Atlanta trade area offering retailers a full line of grocery supplies. This is sufficient evidence to support the Commission's finding that Alterman's wholesale division and Asso[1000]ciated Grocers' headquarters are in basic competition for wholesale business. See Tri-Valley Packing Association v. FTC, 329 F. 2d 694, 706–709 (9th Cir. 1964); Alhambra Motor Parts v. FTC, 309 F. 2d 213 (9th Cir. 1962); cf. Central Retailer-Owned Grocers, Inc. v. FTC, 319 F. 2d 410 (7th Cir. 1963).

Alterman asserts a crucial distinction in that Associated Grocers is owned by the retailers which it serves. Any profits from the headquarters operation are returned to the members. In contrast, any profit from Alterman's wholesale division belongs to the Company, not to the A.B.C. Stores. The dispositive criterion, however, is the functional level at which the activities take place. Nothing in FTC v. Fred Meyer, Inc., 390 U.S. 341, 88 S. Ct. 904, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1222 (1968), indicates that ownership of a functional wholesaler by its customers would prevent the Commission from reaching otherwise illegal conduct.

[10] Even assuming arguendo that Associated Grocers was not a wholesale competitor of Alterman, we reject Alterman's de minimis contention. The Company points out that May & Co. was shown to have competed with Alterman in the distribution of the products of only one small supplier of the 300 participating in the food shows, and that that supplier rented only half a booth in two shows for which it paid a total of $375. Alterman argues that any resultant disfavoring of May & Co. had relatively little effect on competition.

[11, 12] Proof of injury to competition, however, is not required to show prima facie violations of sections 2 (d) and (e). See FTC v. Simplicity Pattern Co., 360 U.S. 55, 79 S. Ct. 1005, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1079 (1959); R. H. Macy & Co. v. FTC, 326 F. 2d 445 (2d Cir. 1964); Giant Food, Inc. v. FTC, 113 U.S. App. D.C. 227, 307 F. 2d 184 (1962), cert. denied, 372 U.S. 910, 83 S. Ct. 723, 9 L. Ed. 2d 718 (1963). Solicitation of discriminatory promotional consideration is per se illegal. R. H. Macy & Co. v. FTC, supra; American News Co. v. FTC, 300 F. 2d 104 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 824, 83 S. Ct. 44, 9 L. Ed. 2d 64 (1962). In any event, the supplier in question, which had a limited product line and a low profit margin, did not usually participate in food shows. Commission counsel tried the case by using seven suppliers as examples to illustrate Alterman's violations. The Commission was not required to prove all possible violations by Alterman with the 300-odd participating suppliers to justify a cease and desist order. In this context it cannot be said that Alterman's use of its buying power to obtain discriminatory promotional allowances and services was "negligible or inconsequential in the sense of being de minimis." Shreveport Macaroni Manufacturing Co. v. FTC, 321 F. 2d 404, 409 (5th Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 971, 84 S. Ct. 491, 11 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1964). This is particularly so because the Commission has the authority to nip potentially destructive practices in the bud. See FTC v. Simplicity Pattern Co., 360 U.S. 55, 68, 79 S. Ct. 1005, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1079 (1959). It was enough in this case that the Commission demonstrated that Alterman knowingly solicited and obtained promotional considerations not available to a competitor.

Proportional Equality

The Commission found that the food show participation and booth rental by suppliers was discriminatory. This finding rested on a determination that these promotional considerations were not available to competitors.

Alterman contends that the food show promotional considerations complied with the tests for proportional equality. It points out that the cost of booth rental was a very small percentage of the amount of suppliers' sales to Alterman and that the suppliers received fair value in terms of promotional exposure for the amounts they paid.[5]

[1001] [13–15] Alterman's arguments miss the point. To avoid being discriminatory, promotional payments and services must be made "available" or "accorded" to competing customers of the suppliers. To meet this requirement, a supplier must not merely be willing, if asked, to make an equivalent deal with other customers, but must take affirmative action to inform them of the availability of the promotion programs. Fred Meyer, Inc. v. FTC, 359 F. 2d 351, 360 n. 10 (9th Cir. 1966), rev'd in part on other grounds, 390 U.S. 341, 88 S. Ct. 904, 19 L. Ed. 2d 1222 (1968); Commission Guide 8, 16 C.F.R. § 240.8 (1974); see Vanity Fair Paper Mills, Inc. v. FTC, 311 F. 2d 480 (2d Cir. 1962); Exquisite Form Brassiere, Inc. v. FTC, 112 U.S. App. D.C. 175, 301 F. 2d 499 (1961), cert. denied, 369 U.S. 888, 82 S. Ct. 1162, 8 L. Ed. 2d 289 (1962). Thus, while promotional benefits received may be considered in determining proportional equality, the basic question is one of proportionality of offers. Colonial Stores, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F. 2d 733, 744 (5th Cir. 1971). Once the Commission had shown that only Alterman had received special payments and services, the burden of proving the availability of similar payments to its competitors was on Alterman. R. H. Macy & Co. v. FTC, 326 F. 2d 445, 450 (2d Cir. 1964); see State Wholesale Grocers v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 258 F. 2d 831, 838 (7th Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 947, 79 S. Ct. 353, 3 L. Ed. 2d 352 (1959). The record makes plain, however, that suppliers were either unwilling or unable to extend similar promotional considerations to all other customers.[6]

Scope of the Order

Based on its finding of 2(d) and 2(e) violations in connection with Alterman's food shows, the Commission not only placed restrictive conditions on future food shows but also broadly prohibited Alterman from inducing and receiving promotional considerations which it knows or should know are not offered to others in violation of sections 2(d) and 2(e). Alterman argues that the Commission's order is overly broad and that we should modify it to enjoin only section 5 violations arising from food show activities.

[16, 17] The Commission has broad discretion in the formulation of its decrees. Here the Commission has limited its order to those types of section 5 violations in which it found Alterman to have engaged, i.e., inducing from its suppliers payments and services violative of sections 2(d) and 2(e). The terms of the order closely parallel the provisions of 2(d) and 2(e) but do not extend beyond them. Such orders have often been upheld against contentions of overbreadth. See, e.g., FTC v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470, 72 S. Ct. 800, 96 L. Ed. 1081 (1952); Electric Bond & Share Co. v. SEC, 303 U.S. 419, 58 S. Ct. 678, 82 L. Ed. 936 (1938); P. Lorillard Co. v. FTC, 267 F. 2d 439 (3d Cir. 1959). The Commission has proscribed future conduct of the same general type as the illegal business practices it found. Thus, the proscriptions are reasonably related to the violations uncovered at the hearing.

Alterman makes general allegations of uncertainty in the meaning of the order. In FTC v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 77 S. Ct. 502,

[6] This does not mean that offers to participate in non-existent food shows would have sufficed. For another aspect of "availability" is that the promotional payments or services in question must be useful and suitable to competing customers or useable and appropriate alternatives must be offered. State Wholesale Grocers v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 258 F. 2d 831, 838–839 (7th Cir. 1958), cert. denied, 358 U.S. 947, 79 S. Ct. 353, 3 L. Ed. 2d 352 (1959); Elizabeth Arden Sales Corp. v. Gus Blass Co., 150 F. 2d 988, 994–995 (8th Cir.), cert denied, 326 U.S. 773, 66 S. Ct. 231, 90 L. Ed. 467 (1945) Commission Guide 9, 16 CFR § 240.9.

1 L. Ed. 2d 438 (1957), the subjects of a comprehensive cease and desist order posed hypothetical situations which they claimed might subsequently cause them considerable difficulties. The Supreme Court rejected their [1002] arguments, noting that the companies could apply to the Commission for advice, if such situations developed, and present the questions "in evidentiary form rather than as fantasies." Id. at 431. Accord FTC v. Colgate-Palmolive Co., 380 U.S. 374, 394, 85 S. Ct. 1035, 13 L. Ed. 2d 904 (1965); see 16 C.F.R. § 3.61(d) (1974).

Conclusion

The Commission's determinations being supported by substantial evidence and in accordance with law, and the scope of the order being reasonably related to the nature of the violations found, we deny the petition for review and order the Commission's cease and desist order enforced in its entirety. See 15 U.S.C.A. § 45(c).

Civ. A. No. 1928–73. F.T.C. Docket No. 8934.

(United States District Court, District of Columbia, August 13, 1974)

1. Rules of Federal Civil Procedure Contemplate Assistance of Counsel in Relation to Answering Interrogatories

   [775] Assistance of counsel in relation to answering interrogatories is clearly contemplated by rule which states, inter alia that answers are to be signed by the person making them, and that objections should be signed by the attorney making them.

2. Evidence Was Sufficient To Show That F.T.C. Search for Documents Was Thorough and Complete

   Evidence was sufficient, in action by corporation against Federal Trade Commission seeking production of certain documents under the Freedom of Information Act, to show that the Commission search for such documents was complete and thorough.

3. Upon Conclusion That Information Provided by F.T.C. Was Adequate, Plaintiff's Alleged Inadequacy of F.T.C. Answers Did Not Keep Case From Being Ripe for Summary Judgment

   Conclusion was required, in action by corporation against the Federal Trade Commission under the Freedom of Information Act seeking production of certain documents, that information provided by the Commission demonstrated the adequacy of its search for all "identifiable records" and that any further discovery by corporation would be unreasonable, so that any documents not found in search described in affidavit of the Commission or listed in Commission's indices were not "identifiable records" under statute, with the result that alleged inadequacy of Commissioner's answers did not keep the case from being ripe for summary judgment.

4. DETERMINATION OF WHETHER A PARTICULAR "IN CAMERA" SUBMISSION REQUIRES AN INDEX AND THE DEGREE OF SPECIFICITY REQUIRED LIES WITHIN THE COURT'S DISCRETION IN A FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT CASE

It is within the discretion of the court in a Freedom of Information Act case to determine whether a particular in camera submission requires an index, and, if so, the degree of specificity required.

5. WITH DETERMINATION THAT INDEX SUBMITTED BY F.T.C. WAS ADEQUATE, CONCLUSION THAT CASE WAS RIPE FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT WAS REQUIRED

[756] Index of documents submitted by the Federal Trade Commission, in action against it by corporation under the Freedom of Information Act, was adequate for needs of the corporation, which required conclusion that the case was ripe for summary judgment.

6. F.T.C. STAFF REPORT WAS EXEMPT FROM DISCOVERY, IN FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT ACTION, EVEN THOUGH IT WAS RELEASED TO CONGRESS, BECAUSE IT FELL WITHIN INVESTIGATORY FILES SECTION OF THE ACT

In Freedom of Information Act action by oil company, under staff report of Federal Trade Commission was exempt from discovery, under section of statute providing exemption for "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes," where record reflected that an antitrust complaint was currently pending before Commission against eight leading petroleum firms, including plaintiff, charging defendants with violating the Federal Trade Commission Act, and such exemption was not waived by Commission's release of the report to Congress, where the Act itself states that the statute does not authorize withholding of information from Congress.

7. UNDER THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT, WHEN EXEMPTION RELATING TO INVESTIGATORY FILES COMPILED FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT PURPOSES APPLIES, SUCH EXEMPTION APPLIES TO THE ENTIRE FILE

When exemption relating to investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes applies, under the Freedom of Information Act, such exemption applies to the entire file.

8. TO ALLOW LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES TO FULFILL THEIR RESPONSIBILITIES WITHOUT DIVULGING THEIR MODUS OPERANDI OR IDENTITIES OF INFORMANTS IS AN IMPORTANT PURPOSE BEHIND THE INVESTIGATORY FILES EXEMPTION

An important purpose behind the investigatory files for law enforcement purposes exemption of the Freedom of Information Act is to allow law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities without divulging their modus operandi or the identities of their informants.

9. CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENCE WITH F.T.C. FELL WITHIN SECTION OF FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT EXEMPTING FROM DISCOVERY, MATTERS INVOLVING INVESTIGATORY FILES COMPILED FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT PURPOSES

Congressional correspondence with Federal Trade Commission, which in the main involved letters complaining of various practices by oil companies, including plaintiff, which sought production of certain documents in possession of the Federal Trade Commission, were exempt under section of the Freedom of Information Act providing that the statute does not apply to matters that involve investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes.

10. COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN F.T.C. AND DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE WHICH REFERRED COMPLAINTS BETWEEN AGENCIES FOR POSSIBLE LAW ENFORCEMENT INVESTIGATIONS WERE EXEMPT UNDER FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

Communications between the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission referring complaints between the agencies for possible use in law enforcement investigations were exempt from discovery under the Freedom of Information Act by reason of section of the Act providing that the Act does not apply to matters that involve investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes.

11. INTERAGENCY MEMORANDUMS WERE EXEMPT FROM DISCOVERY WHERE NONE OF THE DOCUMENTS CONTAINED NONSEVERABLE MATERIAL WHICH COULD BE DISCLOSED WITHOUT JEOPARDIZING DISCLOSURE OF OPINIONS EXPRESSED IN SUCH DOCUMENTS

Interagency memorandums were exempt from discovery, in action by oil company against Federal Trade Commission seeking production of certain documents under the Freedom of Information Act, where none of the documents contained material that could be served from the remaining portions of the documents without jeopardizing disclosure of opinions expressed in such documents, so that such documents were exempt under section of the Act relating to interagency or intraagency memorandums or letters which would not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 384 F. Supp. 755)

In action seeking production of certain documents under the Freedom of Information Act, court held that where record reflected an antitrust complaint involving, among others, plaintiff, a staff report dealing with the oil industry was exempt from discovery under the section of the Freedom of Information Act exempting "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes" and exemption was not waived by F.T.C.'s release of the report to Congress because the statute does not authorize Commission to withhold information from Congress. MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

BRYANT, District Judge.

[757] This action is brought under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552. Plaintiff Exxon Corporation (hereinafter "Exxon") seeks the production of certain documents in the possession of defendant Federal Trade Commission (hereinafter "Commission"). Jurisdiction is conferred by 5 U.S.C. § 552(a) (3). This court has heard argument on and taken under advisement defendants' motion to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment and motions of the plaintiffs relating to discovery from defendant Tobin, Secretary of the Commission.

This is one of the first attempts by a government agency to follow the guidelines set forth in Vaughn and Cuneo.[1] The court has given it close scrutiny in the light of these guidelines and, for reasons set forth below, concludes that the Commission's efforts pass muster.

On July 9, 1973, counsel for Exxon requested a copy of the Commission's staff report on the petroleum industry hereinafter ("Report"). Subsequently Exxon's counsel requested > the opportunity to inspect and copy all communications (including letters, reports or memoranda, and notes, transcripts or other memorialization of oral communications) between January 1, 1970 and August 8, 1973, occurring between the Federal Trade Commission (including any member or employee) and any member of Congress (or employee of the Congress or any member) on the subject of petroleum in liquid or gaseous form, and similar communications between the Commission and "any other government agency regarding shortages, allocations, imbalances, availabilities and noncompetitive activities involving petroleum." In essence, Exxon identified a single document and made a blanket request for all other petroleum-related Congressional correspondence and inter-agency documents.

The Commission, through Mr. Tobin granted Exxon access to Congressional communications, deleting only references that might identify informants, but denied access to the Report and to communications with other agencies, citing exemptions 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (3) (exempted by statute), 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (5) (interagency memoranda), and 5 U.S.C. § 552(b) (7) (investigatory files). On October 16, 1973, Exxon filed suit to compel disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act.

Shortly after filing suit, Exxon moved for a pretrial order and then for partial summary judgment in an effort to obtain from the Commission a Vaughn index, itemizing and cross-referencing the exemptions claimed by the Commission. On December 17, 1973, defendant filed a motion to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment. As part of its motion it filed an index of documents withheld, listed under each claimed exemption. In addition, the Commission filed an affidavit of Mr. Tobin attesting to the completeness of the search for documents.

On December 21, 1973, Exxon noticed a deposition of Mr. Tobin. On motion of the Commission, the court quashed the deposition, ordering interrogatories to be used in place of the deposition. Exxon then filed a set of over 200 interrogatories directed to Mr. Tobin, which were answered in part and objected to in part. The court now has before it motions to reinstate the Tobin deposition and to impose sanctions for incomplete answers to interrogatories. The court also has before it defendants' motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment, as well as plaintiff's opposition expressed largely as challenges to the adequacy of the index under the Vaughn guidelines and to the appropriateness of summary judgment in view of the limitations on its discovery. At the [758] hearing on these motions extensive arguments were advanced. On February 26, 1974, supplemented on March 7, 1974, the Commission submitted the withheld documents to the court for in camera inspection. Since the court is relying in part on this in camera inspection, defendants' motion will be treated as one for summary judgment.

RIPENESS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Exxon argues that this case is not ripe for summary judgment for two reasons. First, there are disputed issues of material fact that require further discovery. In this regard, Exxon has filed the abovementioned discovery motions. Second, Exxon argues that the indices prepared by the Commission are inadequate under the Vaughn standard for a motion for summary judgment.

Exxon's first reason relates to its attempts at further discovery. Exxon seeks this discovery in order to rebut two affidavits of Mr. Tobin. In his first affidavit, filed as part of the Commission's motion to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment, Tobin states that he is Secretary of the Commission and legal custodian of the records. He continues by attesting that:

> 3. Subsequent to the filing of the complaint in this case, I caused a search to be made of the Commission's files in order to locate all the communications described in Paragraph 1 on page 7 of the complaint.
> 4. In a determined effort to locate all the requested documents as expeditiously as possible, members of my staff actively sought to assist the office of each Commission unit to conduct a thorough search through a series of telephone calls, visits and meetings with the various staff members engaged in conducting the search.
> 5. To the best of my knowledge and belief, the documents described in the index attached hereto and made a part hereof are all of the documents that have been located to date as a result of this search.

Tobin's second affidavit, filed with the Commission's supplementary indices, reaffirms the substance of the first affidavit, and adds that ". . . I am satisfied that all units in the Commission likely to have any of the documents requested have been directed to submit the relevant documents and I am satisfied that they have done so."

Exxon noticed Mr. Tobin's deposition. After this court directed that discovery from Mr. Tobin be made by interrogatory, Exxon sent Mr. Tobin over 200 interrogatories filling 46 pages. Tobin, assisted by counsel for the Commission, answered in part and objected in part.

Exxon argues that Mr. Tobin's affidavits and answers are, for purposes of a motion for summary judgment, deficient in three respects. First, they were prepared with the assistance of counsel. Second, they are incomplete, leaving open certain genuine issues of material fact. Third, they fail to comply with the requirements of Rule 56(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that such affidavits and answers be made "on personal knowledge."

[1] Exxon first claims that the interrogatories answered by Tobin cannot dispose of any material issues of fact because they were prepared with the assistance of counsel. Exxon objects that "Mr. Tobin did not personally and independently answer Plaintiff's interrogatories but was assisted by two attorneys from the Federal Trade Commission. . . . In view of the assistance obtained by Mr. Tobin in answering Plaintiff's interrogatories, the primary thrust of Plaintiff's discovery was defeated." [2] After serving 46 pages of interrogatories on a high administrative official, Exxon's attempt to bar counsel in civil discovery must be deemed frivolous.[3]

[759] Exxon's more serious arguments relate to the completeness of Mr. Tobin's responses and the necessity for personal knowledge. As a result of Mr. Tobin's failure fully to answer interrogatories, Exxon argues, the following genuine issues of material fact remain: [4]

> 1. What efforts were actually made to conduct the search attested to in the Affidavit of Charles A. Tobin?
> 2. What offices, files, personnel or other possible sources of information were not consulted in the course of the search attested to in Charles A. Tobin's Affidavit?
> 3. What decisions to withhold documents were made prior to any examination of such documents or even any search for such documents?
> 4. What portions of documents listed in paragraphs 1 and 3 of defendants' purported Index, for which blanket exemptions have been claimed, must be

---

[3] Assistance of counsel is clearly contemplated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 33(a) states ". . . The answers are to be signed by the person making them, and the objections signed by the attorney making them . . . ."

[4] Statement of Genuine Factual Issues filed Pursuant to Local Rule 1–9(g).

Exxon's interrogatories extend in detail to other issues. For example, Exxon seeks a detailed description of the channels of communication in the Commission, an analysis of procedures used by the Commission to memorialize oral messages, an investigation of an alleged "leak" to the Washington Post, et cetera. None of these other questions is within the scope of the Tobin affidavit, and none is material to this action.

examined by this Court in order to determine whether they contain "purely factual investigative matter" not exempt under the Freedom of Information Act?

5. What documents sought by plaintiff have been withheld by the defendants but not listed in their purported Index?

Question three, asking which decisions were made prior to examining the documents, is legally immaterial. What matters is whether the Commission's decisions not to disclose were justifiable, not when they were made. Question four, unresolved when the statement of issues was filed, has been rendered moot by submission to this court of all documents listed in the index and withheld from Exxon, and by this court's in camera inspection of those documents. (See below.)

The remaining three issues of material fact boil down to one—was the search by the Commission adequate and complete in light of Exxon's request? This issue deserves attention.

In his affidavits and interrogatories there is testimony from Mr. Tobin that he supervised a broad and extensive national search of Commission documents. While Mr. Tobin's own efforts were limited, other employees, both in Washington and in the field, spent extensive amounts of time continuing over many months. In his answer to interrogatory 42(t), Mr. Tobin states,

> By a thorough search, I mean that to the best of my knowledge, all units of the Commission likely to have any relevant documents were contacted and requested to conduct a search, and each unit was requested to respond by returning all the documents to the Division of Legal and Public Records. To the best of my knowledge, all such units either submitted documents to my staff or informed the staff that they had no such documents.

In the other interrogatories Mr. Tobin describes in general terms his role in supervising the search, but does not give details involving the identities of other participants.[5]

[2] Clearly then, there is uncontradicted evidence attesting to the com[760]pleteness and thoroughness of the Commission's search. The remaining question, therefore, is whether Mr. Tobin's statements exhibit the degree of "personal knowledge" necessary under Rule 56(e). In essence, we must decide what kind of evidence is needed (and admissible) to decide whether a search of the scale sought by Exxon has been adequately carried out.

Exxon's frustration in the face of its lack of knowledge is understandable, and is the result of the inherent weakness of the adversary process in Information Act cases first noted in Vaughn. The logic of Exxon's argument, however, carries too far. Exxon would require affidavits or testimony to be based on personal knowledge, and would demand that those affidavits cover each aspect and detail of the search. In the typical search for a few documents whose location is clearly defined such requirements cause no problem. But Exxon, by requesting all petroleum-related Congressional and inter-agency communications, has instigated a broad, national search with no inherent limit. To satisfy Exxon's requirement for personal knowledge of each detail of the search—and it is clear from its papers that Exxon demands nothing less—would require sworn testimony from at least one individual working in every office of the Commission, throughout the country. And it must be emphasized that this problem is not unique to the summary judgment stage—it would also hold true at a full-blown trial.[6]

[5] In its interrogatories, Exxon asks for details of the search ranging from the general to the minute. For example, Exxon asks for the names of everyone participating in the search, and requests a complete accounting of each phone call made from Mr. Tobin's office, listing caller, person called, date, and instructions given. (Interrogatory No. 41.)

The Court faces an all-or-nothing choice. Either it must allow an affidavit from the supervisor of the search to be conclusive as to its adequacy, or it must let Exxon pursue its discovery down to the level of each individual participating in the search.[7] There is no place in between for judicial line-drawing.

[3] Faced with a choice between a decision based on incomplete knowledge and discovery that is unreasonably broad and burdensome, we must return to the language of the Act. The Act specifies that requests must be made only for "identifiable records." [8] The Commission has never objected that the documents sought by Exxon were not "identifiable." This attitude on the part of the Commission is commendable, but it should not waive their right to raise such an objection at a later time. Specificity in the request is needed not only to allow the agency to find the document, but also to enable the agency to demonstrate and the court to assess the adequacy of the search. It would be unreasonable to allow Exxon the extended discovery it wants when it has caused the Commission to search every nook and cranny; its discovery is aimed not at ascertaining whether identified records have been produced, but whether there exist additional records that might be specifically identified by Exxon. It would be unreasonable to read the intent of Congress expressed in the Freedom of Information to require such discovery. Hence, on the basis of the complete record of this case, this court believes that the information provided by the Commission demonstrates the adequacy of its search for all "identifiable records," and

[6] We would not allow trial preparation discovery to extend as far as Exxon's request. Hence there would be no new facts in the record, and we would not be in any better position to rule on the question of the adequacy of the search at trial than we are at summary judgment.

[7] These comments do not apply to Exxon's interrogatories that relate to the decisions for and reasons behind the claimed exemptions. While those questions may have been proper when the interrogatories were served, in camera analysis by the court, described below, renders these questions immaterial.

that any further discovery by Exxon would be unreasonable. Consequently we hold that any documents not found in the search described by Mr. Tobin or listed in the Commission's indices are not "identifiable records" un[761]der the Act.[9] Thus we reject Exxon's argument that the inadequacy of Mr. Tobin's answers keep this case from being ripe for summary judgment.

Exxon's second contention is that this action is not ripe for summary judgment because the index of documents provided by the Commission does not analyze each document in detail specifying the subject matter area and precise form of the document and itemizing paragraph by paragraph which sections of each document fit under which exemption. In essence, Exxon seeks to stretch Vaughn far outside its original boundaries.

[4] Vaughn did not lay down a per se rule to be applied to every Freedom of Information Act case. It rather suggested a technique to assist the court when needed. When there is "a factual dispute regarding whether the documents actually fit" the description by the government, and when the government claims multiple exemptions which may apply "to all or only a part of the information," in documents consisting of "hundreds or even thousands of pages," then the government must provide more than mere conclusory allegations with its in camera submission. Vaughn v. Rosen, 157 U.S. App. D.C. 340, 484 F. 2d 820, 824–825. In other words, the index is designed primarily to enable the court to review effectively the agency's decision not to disclose. The extent to which it facilitates adversarial analysis by the party seeking disclosure is a mere by-product. Hence it is within the court's discretion to determine whether a particular in camera submission requires an index, and, if so, the degree of specificity required.

[5] In this action, the court, after careful in camera inspection, finds the index submitted to be adequate for its needs. With respect to the single document identified by Exxon—the Report—the Commission claims that it fits in its entirety under the exemption for investigatory files, 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7). Since this exemption can include factual as well as non-factual material, the court agrees. Hence there is no further need for specificity in the index. The remaining items, identified only generally by Exxon but listed by the Commission, are grouped by description under each appropriate exemption. Most of these items are a few pages long, and many consist merely of a few lines of deleted identification material. The court finds the index to be sufficient to enable it to consider whether the documents are properly exempt from disclosure. Hence the court considers this case ripe for summary judgment.

[9] Decisions as to personnel and procedures to be used in the search are within the discretion of the administrator. In the circumstances of this case the court will not take the "disfavored" step of requiring the Secretary of the Commission "to testify as to the basis of his decision[s]." D.C. Federation of Civic Associations v. Volpe, 148 U.S. App. D.C. 207, 459 F. 2d 1231, at 1237 (1972); United States v. Morgan, 313 U.S. 409, 61 S. Ct. 999, 85 L. Ed. 1429 (1941); Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 91 S. Ct. 814, 28 L. Ed. 2d 136 (1971).

SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Having decided that this action is ripe for summary judgment, we proceed to examine whether the Commission can properly withhold the documents sought by Exxon.

A. STAFF REPORT

The Commission claims that the Report is exempt from discovery by virtue of exceptions b(5) and b(7). We need only consider the exemption for "investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes except to the extent available by law to a party other than an agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7). It is undisputed that the Commission lawfully engages in investigations for law enforcement purposes. The record reflects that currently pending before the Commission is an antitrust complaint against eight leading petroleum firms, including Exxon, charging defendants with violating Section 5 of the Federal [762] Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45. In the Matter of Exxon Corporation, et al., FTC Docket No. 8934. Recent Court of Appeals opinions indicate that a file compiled for law enforcement purposes is exempt in its entirety and is not subject to the fact-opinion dichotomy applicable to other exemptions. This is so because the exemption is designed to protect the government from having to expose its case prematurely or compromise its investigative techniques and informants. And the exemption applies even when no action is brought,[10] and after a case has been terminated.[11] Nor need there is a showing of threatened harm from disclosure.[12] The trial court's duty is to examine the total record to determine "whether the files sought . . . relate to anything that can fairly be characterized as an enforcement proceeding." [13] While mere conclusory affidavits are insufficient, once the court finds that the material was compiled for law enforcement purposes, its inquiry ends.[14]

[6] In the instant situation, there is an ongoing investigation with an existing complaint. The Report, examined in camera, was clearly compiled as part of the Commission's investigatory file. Exxon does not dispute this. Instead, Exxon argued that the Commission has waived the exemption by releasing the Report to Congress (and thereby to the public), and that those parts of the report containing factual data do not fall under exemption b(7).

Exxon's waiver argument fails. The Freedom of Information Act itself states that "[t]his section is not authority to withhold information from Congress," 5 U.S.C. § 552(c), and the Federal Trade Commission Act imposes informational duties on the Commission. 15 U.S.C. § 46(f). Clearly Congress intended that it should receive information not available to the public.[15] In any event, Exxon has cited no authority for their proposition that release of selected portions or release to selected persons waives the right to claim an exemption from release of other portions or to other persons.[16]

[7] Exxon's claim that factual information contained in the Report must be disclosed (and consequently must be identified by the Commission in a Vaughn index) must also be rejected. The fact-opinion dichotomy drawn by the Court of Appeals in Vaughn and other cases relates to the application of exemption b(5). When exemption b(7) applies, it exempts the entire file. Plaintiffs cite no case, and we have found none, where the fact-opinion dichotomy has been applied to material exempted by the b(7) exemption for investigatory files. Indeed, knowledge that particular factual material is contained in an investigatory file may reveal important tactical choices made by the investigating agency and thereby harm an investigation far more than would knowledge of the actual facts taken outside the context of the investigation.

Consequently we hold that the Report sought by Exxon fits within exemption [763] 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7) and is not required to be disclosed by the Commission. Thus we need not consider the Commission's claim that the Report falls under exemption b(5).

3. CONGRESSIONAL COMMUNICATIONS

The second type of information withheld by the Commission is found in its Congressional correspondence. This correspondence in the main involves letters complaining of various practices by oil companies (including Exxon) that were sent to members of Congress and then forwarded to the Commission. Many of the actual documents are form letters forwarding these complaints and form responses acknowledging them. Most of the letters of complaint are from franchisees and independent station operators, persons who would become subject to retaliation if their identities were known. The Commission has disclosed the Congressional-Commission correspondence only after first deleting names and identifying details. It claims that its deletions are sanctioned by an "informant's privilege," allowed under exemptions b(3) (exempted by statute), b(4) (confidential commercial information), and b(7) (investigatory files.) Again, we need only consider b(7).

[15] See also Aspin, supra, 491 F. 2d 24, 26, where the court affirmed the agency's nondisclosure despite the circumstance that the report involved "was given to the Armed Services Committee of both houses of Congress."

[16] Cf. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, 1970 Supp., § 3A.5. As for possible release to the public at large, Exxon's argument proves too much. If the Report has in fact been made public, then Exxon's claim is moot—it already has access to the Report. If parts of the Report have not been released, publication of other parts does not waive the exemption for the entire Report.

[8] The identifying details in question clearly fit under exemption b(7). An important purpose behind the exemption is to allow law enforcement agencies to fulfill their responsibilities without divulging their modus operandi or the identities of their informants. This purpose would be jeopardized if Exxon were given the names of those who had complained of its behavior. The invasion of privacy and fear of possible reprisal would keep such information from the government in the future. As the Second Circuit has said,

> If an agency's investigatory files were obtainable without limitation after the investigation was concluded, future law enforcement efforts by the agency could be seriously hindered. The agency's investigatory techniques and procedures would be revealed. The names of people who volunteered the information [during the course of] the investigation intially or who [had] contributed information during the course of the investigation would be disclosed. The possibility of such disclosure would tend severely to limit the agencies' possibilities for investigation and enforcement of the law since these agencies rely, to a large extent, on voluntary cooperation and on information from informants.[17]

[9] Whether or not an actual investigation was undertaken for any complaint in particular, these complaints were written and forwarded to instigate investigations of violations of the law, and many of them relate to the pending action cited above. Consequently we hold that the identifying details in the forwarded letters were properly deleted under exemption 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7).[18]

While we need not decide whether the material also falls under exemptions b(3) and b(4), the court notes that deletion of identifying detail is consistent with guidelines for exemption b(4) expressed in Bristol-Myers Company v. F.T.C., 138 U.S. App. D.C. 22, 424 F. 2d 935 at 939 (1970) and Grumman Aircraft Engineer Corp. v. Renegotiation Bd., 138 U.S. App. D.C. 147, 425 F. 2d 578 at 581 (1970), with the statuatory mandate to the Federal Trade Commission,[19] and with the Freedom of Information Act itself.[20]

C. INTER-AGENCY COMMUNICATIONS

[764] The Commission claims that its withheld inter-agency communications fit under exemptions b(3) (exempt by statute), b(4) (confidential commercial information), b(5) (inter-agency memoranda), and b(7) (investigatory files). The documents can be grouped into three sets.

[10] The first set, described in sections 3C and 3D of the index,[21] are communications between the Department of Justice and the Commission referring complaints between the agencies for possible use in law enforcement investigations. For reasons given above, these documents are exempt from disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7).[22]

The second set of documents, listed in 3B and 3E of the index, includes communications relating to either the investigation discussed above (In the Matter of Exxon Corporation, et al.) or to other investigations of the Commission. After in camera inspection, the court finds no reason to doubt the Commission's representation that these documents come from investigatory files compiled for law enforcement purposes. Accordingly, these documents are exempt from disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(7).

[11] The remaining three documents, listed in 3A of the index, do not relate to an investigation undertaken for law enforcement purposes. They are claimed to be "inter-agency . . . memorandums . . . not be available by law to a party other than an agency in litigation with the agency." 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). Under the interpretation of EPA v. Mink, 410 U.S. 73, 93 S. Ct. 827, 35 L. Ed. 2d 119 (1973), exemption b(5) applies to inter-governmental opinions, but does not allow non-disclosure of "purely factual material appearing in those documents in a form that is severable without compromising the private remainder of the documents." 410 U.S. 73 at 91, 93 S. Ct. 827 at 838. After inspecting the three documents in camera, the court finds

[19] 15 U.S.C. § 46(f) gives the Commission the power "To make public from time to time such portions of the information obtained by it hereunder, except trade secrets and names of customers, as it shall deem expedient in the public interest;" . . .

[20] 5 U.S.C. § 552(a)(2) provides:

"To the extent required to prevent a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy, an agency may delete identifying details when it makes available or publishes an opinion, statement of policy, interpretation, or staff manual or instruction."

[21] The index includes exhibit B of the motion of defendants to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment, filed December 17, 1973, and supplemental indices filed March 6, 1974.

[22] The Commission does not claim exemption b(7) for those communications in 3C, letters referring complaints to the Department of Justice. These letters also refer to complaints intended to lead to law enforcement investigations, however, and therefore also fit under b(7).

that none of the three contain factual material that can be severed from the remaining portions of the document without jeopardizing disclosure of the opinions expressed in those documents. Consequently these three documents are exempt from disclosure under 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5).

Accordingly we do not reach the application of exemptions b(3) or b(4) to any of the inter-agency communications.

For reasons expressed in this memorandum, it is, this 13th day of August, 1974,

Ordered that plaintiff's motion for a pretrial order and motion for partial summary judgment, be, and hereby are, denied as moot, and it is further

Ordered that defendants' motion for summary judgment be, and hereby is, granted, and it is further Ordered that plaintiff's motion to reinstate the deposition of Charles A. Tobin and motion to impose sanctions for failure to answer interrogatories be, and hereby are, denied.

(United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, August 22, 1974)

1. Burden Is on the Discriminator To Establish Defense of Good-Faith Meeting of Competition

   In a suit charging violation of the Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act, the burden is on the discriminator, in attempting to establish the defense of a good-faith meeting of competition, to show that it acted in a good-faith belief to meet the price or services of a competitor; the discriminator must show the existence of facts leading a reasonable and prudent person to believe that the granting of the lower price or service would in fact meet the low price or service of a competitor.

*Reported in 499 F. 2d 395 (1974). For case before the Commission, see 82 F.T.C. 53, modified 85 F.T.C. 701, modified 88 F.T.C. 980. The title in the Commission's action was changed pursuant to Commission direction dated April 11, 1975.

2. DETERMINATION OF WHETHER THE COMMISSION'S FINDINGS ARE SUPPORTED BY SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE IS THE STANDARD TO BE USED BY THE COURT OF APPEALS IN REVIEWING F.T.C. ORDERS

   In reviewing Federal Trade Commission order relative to the Robinson-Patman Act defense of a good-faith meeting of competition, the standard to be used by the Court of Appeals is to determine whether the Commission's findings are supported by substantial evidence, i.e., evidence which would justify, if the trial were to a jury, a refusal to direct a verdict when the conclusion sought to be drawn from it is one of fact for the jury.

3. PRICE DISCRIMINATION CHARGE HAD TO BE SET ASIDE WHERE DEFENDANT ESTABLISHED IT HAD ACTED IN GOOD-FAITH TO MEET SERVICES FURNISHED BY A COMPETITOR; AND CHARGE AGAINST JOBBER FOR INDUCING PRICE DISCRIMINATION ALSO SET ASIDE

   Banana producer and importer, which was charged with price discrimination in favor of jobber in violation of the Robinson–Patman Act, established that it acted in good faith to meet the services furnished by a competitor; and [396] it followed that the charge against the jobber of inducing the price discrimination also had to be set aside.

4. UNDER ROBINSON-PATMAN ACT PROVISION RELATING TO INDUCING PRICE DISCRIMINATION, A PROHIBITED DISCRIMINATION IS A CONDITION PRECEDENT TO A FINDING OF UNLAWFUL CONDUCT

   A prohibited discrimination is a condition precedent to a finding of unlawful conduct under Robinson-Patman Act provision relating to inducing price discrimination.

5. LAW AND FACT SUPPORTED F.T.C. FINDING THAT BANANA JOBBER'S ACQUISITION OF A COMPETITOR VIOLATED THE CLAYTON ACT

   Federal Trade Commission order finding that banana jobber's acquisition of a competitor violated the Clayton Act was supported by law and fact.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 499 F. 2d 395)

On petitions to review and set aside orders of F.T.C., court held that (1) banana producer and importer established that it had acted in good faith to meet the services furnished by competitior; thereby making it necessary to set aside the charge against the jobber of inducing the price discrimination, and (2) that law and fact supported F.T.C. finding that the jobber's acquisition violated the Clayton Act.

Before BELL, SIMPSON and INGRAHAM, Circuit Judges.

BELL, Circuit Judge:

These appeals, consolidated for decision, involve a Federal Trade Commission complaint charging United [1] in one count with price discrimination in violation of § 2(a) [2] of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(a), in favor of Harbor; charging Harbor in another count with violating § 2(f) [3] of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 13(f), by inducing the discrimination. In an additional count Harbor was charged with violating § 7 [4] of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A., § 18, by purchasing the assets of a competitor.

The administrative law judge ruled against the Commission on the Robinson-Patman Act contentions and in favor of the Commission on the § 7 violation. On appeal by all parties, the Commission, with one member dissenting, affirmed the § 7 holding but disagreed with the initial decision as to the Robinson-Patman Act charges. Specifically, for the purposes of these appeals, the finding that United acted to meet com[397]petition under § 2(b) [5] of the Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 13 (b), was rejected. Having rejected this defense, the administrative law judge was then found to have been in error in dismissing the § 2(f) charge against Harbor as well as the § 2(a) charge against United.

We disagree with the Commission as to the Robinson-Patman charges, being of the view that United was well within the § 2(b) defense in its questioned conduct. It follows from this and from the fact that there was no charge or proof that the cooperation of Standard at Long Beach with Harbor was discriminatory, that there could be no violation of § 2(f) by Harbor. As will be seen, the § 7 violation through the acquisition of a competitor is supported and there is no merit in the petition for review as to the order in that respect.

[1] During the course of the proceeding before the Commission, United Fruit Company through merger became an unincorporated division of United Brands Company, and United Fruit Sales Corporation changed its name to Chiquita Brands, Inc.

Petitioner Harbor, the largest banana jobber in Southern California, was incorporated December 18, 1964, succeeding to a banana wholesaling business theretofore owned and operated by the Dominick Jebbia family. The evidence related to the activities and operations of both the Jebbias and Harbor.

[2] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade or quality, * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them. . . ."

[3] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, knowingly to induce or receive a discrimination in price which is prohibited by this section."

[4] "No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly. . . ."

[5] "Upon proof being made, at any hearing on a complaint under this section, that there has been discrimination in price or services or facilities furnished, the burden of rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing justification shall be upon the person charged with a violation of this section, and unless justification shall be affirmatively shown, the Commission is authorized to issue an order terminating the discrimination: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor."

The alleged Robinson-Patman violation involves secondary lines of commerce, i.e., banana jobbers in the Los Angeles area consisting of Harbor and its competitors. There is no primary line question in issue except by way of background in that the alleged discrimination arose out of competition between United and its major competitor, Standard.

Beginning in 1960, Standard Fruit and Steamship Company, the major competitor of United in producing and importing bananas, entered the Los Angeles market. Up until 1964, United had enjoyed one hundred per cent of Harbor's business. Indeed, Harbor was United's second largest customer in the United States.

Harbor and its competing jobbers[6] received delivery of bananas from United [398] at United's Wilmington, California terminal located about thirty miles south of downtown Los Angeles. Harbor had its processing plant at Long Beach about nine miles north of Wilmington, while its competitors had their processing plants in downtown Los Angeles.

[6] Virtually all of the bananas consumed in the United States are produced in the tropical regions of the Western Hemisphere. Bananas are imported into the United States while still green. Immediately after importation, they are subjected to a specialized ripening process and thereafter marketed.

Specialized banana wholesalers (jobbers) engage in purchasing, ripening, selling, and distributing bananas in a given area. They are to be distinguished from general produce wholesalers and from direct-purchasing, self-processing and ripening retail grocery chains.

In the early 1960's, Central American banana farms were affected by a malady known as Panama disease, which attacked the "Gros Michael" banana strain. Shifts were made by major importers, Standard earlier than United, to the more varietal Cavendish banana, which was more resistant to Panama disease. Because the Cavendish banana was more easily bruised, the banana was taken from the stem in the tropics and shipped to market in 40-pound boxes as contrasted to the previous method of shipment where the bananas remained on the stem. Tropic-boxed bananas were viewed with some concern by jobbers, who felt chain stores, formerly largely dependent on jobbers, could now begin ripening their own bananas. Richway, one of the five chain-store organizations in Southern California that purchased directly from importers, began as early in 1934 ripening its own bananas. Two chains, Von's Grocery and Alpha Beta Acme, began ripening with the advent of the boxing program. In part, because of Standard's pioneering the tropic boxing system, Standard filled 92 per cent of the chain store purchases in Southern California.

Bananas are sold at advance order (pre-order), seaboard and "roller" prices. Some weeks before a ship is scheduled to arrive in port, the importer sets an advance order price for the fruit on that ship. Approximately two weeks prior to arrival, orders at the advance price are solicited from customers. A customer who places such an advance order price is able to guarantee his supply rather than risk the non-availability of excess fruit at lower prices. Cancellation cannot be made without penalty.

During the week before a given ship arrives in port, the importers announce the price at which fruit not advance ordered on that ship will be sold at dockside. This "seaboard price " is often the same as the advance order price. Depending on demand the seaboard price may be less, and in such a case, the advance order price is adjusted downward to the seaboard price. If demand is greater than anticipated, the seaboard price may exceed the advance order price.

The third category, "roller" price, refers to the price of unsold bananas which traditionally were loaded on rail cars and are now loaded on trucks, to be sold while en route to various destinations. The roller price is always lower than the advance order and seaboard prices. The longer the bananas remain unsold, the lower the roller price.

Harbor had conceived the idea of having bananas unloaded at Long Beach direct from United's ships to save the cost of transportation between Wilmington and Long Beach, Harbor's processing plant being at Long Beach. The idea was for Harbor to build a facility adjacent to the docks to permit direct delivery from the ships into Harbor's processing plant. United refused to provide this service over a period of two to three years but in 1963, Standard decided to build a new terminal at Long Beach and to relocate there from its previous location at Wilmington.

Then in early 1964, pursuant to negotiations, Harbor and Standard reached an agreement whereby Harbor arranged to construct a processing plant adjacent to Standard's proposed new terminal at Long Beach, and Standard provided a conveyor belt between the two facilities to permit the ready transfer of bananas from Standard to Harbor. Construction of the facilities began in 1964 and was completed in 1965. Even before completion, Harbor filled approximately 15 per cent of its total banana purchases in 1964 from Standard.[7] This was the first loss of Harbor's business by United.

United was quick to take notice of Standard's inroad with respect to its prime customer and then agreed to provide a partial service to Harbor at Long Beach. It is this service which is claimed as being discriminatory by the Commission. The service was continued for a period of some five years but was ultimately discontinued by United inter alia on account of complaints being received from its other customers.

It is undisputed that the service provided was in an effort to meet that provided by Standard to Harbor. It is also undisputed that the service provided by United did not exceed the Standard service. In fact, it fell short of that service. Standard provided a conveyor belt from its dock directly into Harbor's plant. United continued its operation at Wilmington but simply agreed to stop one ship each week at Long Beach to unload advance or pre-ordered bananas. See fn. (6), supra. Harbor continued to purchase seaboard and roller priced bananas from United at Wilmington as well as some advance ordered bananas.

We assume arguendo that there was proscribed discrimination in fact from [399] the service to Harbor at Long Beach by United. This enables us to center on the § 2(b) defense of the good-faith meeting of competition.

[1] The § 2(b) defense is absolute if made out. The burden is on the discriminator to show that he acted in a good-faith belief to meet the price or service, as the case may be, of a competitor. The test in making this determination is that the discriminator must show the existence of facts which would lead a reasonable and prudent person to believe that the granting of the lower price or service would in fact meet the equally low price or service of a competitor. Federal Trade Commission v. *A. Ed. 2d 109; see Callaway Mills Company v. Federal Trade Commission, 5 Cir., 1966, 362 F. 2d 435.

[2] The standard we use in reviewing the order of the Commission as it relates to the § 2(b) defense is to determine whether the Commission's findings are supported by substantial evidence, Colonial Stores, Incorporated v. Federal Trade Commission, 5 Cir., 1971, 450 F. 2d 733, 739–740. Evidence is substantial if it would ". . . justify, if the trial were to a jury, a refusal to direct a verdict when the conclusion sought to be drawn from it is one of fact for the jury". National Labor Relations Board v. Columbian Enameling & Stamping Company, 1939, 306 U.S. 292, 300, 59 S. Ct. 501, 505, 83 L. Ed. 660; Universal Camera Corp. v. National Labor Relations Board, 1951, 340 U.S. 474, 477, 71 S. Ct. 456, 95 L. Ed. 456.

[3] Applying this standard of review to the record before us, we have no difficulty in concluding that the Commission's order as to the § 2(b) defense is without substantial evidence to support it. The evidence consists of facts which would lead a reasonable and prudent person to believe that the granting of the service in question by United to Harbor was to meet the competition of Standard. We are unable to find any evidence to the contrary and thus United has sustained its burden. The posture of the evidence is well within the directed jury verdict in a jury trial standard, supra. See Boeing Company v. Shipman, 5 Cir., (en banc), 1969, 411 F. 2d 365, 370. The petition to review and set aside the cease and desist order finding a violation of § 2(a) must be granted on the basis that the § 2(b) defense was established.

[4] It follows that the § 2(f) charge against Harbor must also be set aside. Harbor was not charged with having induced a discriminatory service from Standard, only the discrimination from United. We have held that the descrimination by United was not prohibited because of the § 2(b) defense. A prohibited discrimination is a condition precedent to a finding of unlawful conduct under § 2(f). Cf. Automatic Canteen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 1953, 346 U.S. 61, 73 S. Ct. 1017, 97 L. Ed. 1454.

This leaves for decision the order against Harbor based on § 7 of the Clayton Act. This order finds a violation of § 7 by Harbor in purchasing a competitor. The competitor consisted of two corporations in each of which Charles C. McCann was sole stockholder.

McCann wished to go out of the banana business although its business was second only to that of Harbor in the Los Angeles market. Harbor purchased from McCann its trucks and its leases of six market stalls and a warehouse located in the downtown produce market as well as the personal property located in [400] the leasehold properties. A total of $150,000 was paid to McCann for these properties with McCann reserving trade names, good will and accounts receivable.

[5] At the time of the acquisition, Harbor had 40 per cent of the Los Angeles banana wholesale market and McCann had about 24 per cent of the same market. These shares of the market seem quite large in the face of the miniscule sum involved in the acquisition. Nevertheless, it is for the Commission and not this court to determine which acquisitions will be proscribed under § 7. Our role is to review the case as presented and we find that the order of the Commission finding the acquisition unlawful under § 7 is supported in law and fact and there the matter must end.

We agree with Harbor that the divestiture order may present a problem in feasibility and from the standpoint of its accomplishment. Harbor is required to restore McCann as a viable competitive entity. How this is to be done remains a mystery. It may be that Harbor is being required to do more than is physically possible or that the divestiture order is vague in some respects. The problems now presented seem hypothetical in the main and we suggest that the proper forum for resolution of problems which may occur in a good-faith effort on the part of Harbor to comply with the order of divestiture should be the Commission.

The petition to review and set aside the cease and desist order against United based on § 2(a) of the Act is granted and enforcement is denied. The petition to review and set aside the cease and desist order against Harbor based on § 2(f) of the Act is granted and enforcement of the order is denied. The petition to review and set aside the divestiture order of the Commission against Harbor based on § 7 is denied and enforcement is ordered.

UNITED STATES v. PAUL B. ELDER CO.*

Civ. A. No. 74–105. F.T.C. File No. 99–179.

(United States District Court, District of Delaware, September 6, 1974)

On motion for summary judgment seeking payment of $3,500 for delay of 35 days in filing a special report required by F.T.C., court held that it had no discretion to show leniency and waive or reduce the statutory penalty for failure to file within thirty-day grace period allowable after notice of default from Commission. Claim that original order was misplaced made out a case of excusable negligence at best, a defense not allowed for by the statute. Summary judgment for the government was granted.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION

STAPLETON, District Judge. Section 6(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 46(b)) authorizes the FTC "To require . . . corporations engaged in commerce . . . to file with the commission . . . reports . . . within such reasonable period as the commission may prescribe. . . ." Section 10 of the Act (15 U.S.C. § 50) provides that "If any corporation required by [section 6(b)] to file any . . . report shall fail so to do within the time fixed by the commission for filing the same, and such failure shall continue for thirty days after notice of such default, the corporation shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day of the continuance of such failure. . . ."

*Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. (1974–2 Trade Cases) ¶ 75,238 at 97,583.

Employing proper procedures, the FTC on November 16, 1973, ordered defendant Paul B. Elder Co., among others, to complete and submit a "Prescription Drug Survey" report. Elder failed to submit the report within the prescribed sixty day period and received a notice of default on April 1, 1974. Its completed report was received by the Commission on June 5, 1974, sixty-five days later, and thirty-five days after the end of the stautory grace period.Plaintiff United States claims the $100 per day statutory forfeiture for this period, and has moved for summary judgment on the above undisputed facts.[1]

Defendant opposes the motion on the ground that the Commission's original order "had apparently been misplaced through inadvertence or mistake" (though an employee had signed a registered mail receipt for it), and that it attempted in good faith to complete the report after receipt of the notice of default, but that due to the inadequacy of its records, the small size of its staff, and the lack of guidance it received from the FTC, it did not do so within thirty days. It also notes that the report was mailed to the Commission before suit was brought, and asserts that its untimeliness "in no way harmed any person". It appeals to the discretion of this Court to consider these factors and impose no penalty, or only a nominal one.

Plaintiff argues that the Court has no discretion to waive or reduce the statutory penalty, and also disputes defendant's interpretation of the facts. The facts themselves, however, are not in dispute, and for the purposes of this motion, it is assumed that defendant's characterizations of what they show (inadvertence and good faith) are accurate.

In St. Regis Paper Co. v. United States, a case dealing with the same statutory provisions, it was said that the courts "cannot forgive statutory penalties once they legally attach. . . ." [1961 TRADE CASES ¶70,167], 368 U.S. 208, 227 (1961). Defendant states that it "does not seek 'forgiveness' of penalties but rather urges that a nominal penalty be assessed. . . ." But that would be nothing if not "forgiveness". This Court has no discretion to do as defendant asks.

In certain circumstances, statutory penalties may be, and have been, held invalid or inapplicable to a particular party. See United States v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 242 U.S. 190 (1916). Cf. Kerr S. S. Co. v. United States, 284 F. 2d 61, 63 (2nd Cir. 1960) (dicta); United States v. St. Regis Paper Co. [1960 TRADE CASES ¶69,880], 285 F. 2d 607, 614 (2nd Cir. 1960) (dicta). But in this case no such circumstances are even colorably present. Defendant's case comes down to one of excusable negligence at best, and the statute leaves no room for leniency on that ground. United States v. J. B. Williams Co., Inc. [1973–1 Trade Cases ¶74,330], 354 F. Supp. 521 (S.D.N.Y. 1973), revs'd on other grounds [1974–1 Trade Cases ¶75,041], 498 F. 2d 414, 18 F.R. Serv. 2d 891 (2nd Cir. 1974), cited by defendant, is inapposite. That case arose under section 5(1) of the Act (15 U.S.C. § 45(1)), which explicity confers discretion on the courts by use of the language: ". . . shall forfeit . . . not more than $5000 for each violation. . . ." (Emphasis added.) Section 10 contains no such discretionary language.

[1] Plaintiff claims a $3600 forfeiture, and defendant has not disputed the accuracy of this figure, but we count differently. The notice of default was received on April 1; the 30-day grace period thus ended on May 1. Penalties began on May 2 and continued through June 5, a total of thirty-five days.

Accordingly, plaintiff's motion for summary judgment will be granted.

No. 73–1750. F.T.C. Docket No. 8821.

(United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, September 11, 1974)

1. The F.T.C. Does Not Have Power To Require Restitution of Monies Secured by Unfair and Deceptive Practices, Under the "Cease and Desist" Provision of the F.T.C. Act

Under "cease and desist" provision of Federal Trade Commission Act, the Commission did not possess power to order businessman to make restitution of monies secured by unfair and deceptive business practices found to have been committed by him.

2. Cure for Deficiencies in F.T.C. Act Must Come From Congress, Not the Courts

If there exists a deficiency in the Federal Trade Commission Act, the cure must come from Congress, not by judicial enlargement of the statute.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 503 F.2d 321)

On petition to review an order of the Commission directing petitioner to cease and desist in certain unfair and deceptive practices and to make restitution of monies secured through the unfair and deceptive practices, court held that the Commission did not possess the power to order restitution under the "cease and desist" provision of the F.T.C. Act, and that if a deficiency in the F.T.C. Act existed, its cure must come from the Congress, not through judicial enlargement of the statute.

Refund provisions, of the order set aside.

OPINION

KOELSCH, Circuit Judge:

John Clifford Heater petitions for review of an order of the Federal Trade Commission concerning his "Honor All Credit Cards" business. 15 U.S.C. § 45(c).

The order in question not only directs petitioner to discontinue the unfair and deceptive business practices found to have been committed by him and the several corporations which he controlled, directed and personally managed, but in addition and in effect commands him to make restitution of the moneys secured by those practices.[1]

This refund provision is based upon and reflects a far-reaching construction of the clause in Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(b), which empowers the Commission to order a person using any unfair method or deceptive act or practice in commerce to "cease and desist from using such method of competition or such act or practice."

[1] The principal question on this review is this: does the Commission under the "cease and desist" provision possess power to order the refund in ques[322]tion. We conclude that the answer is no."[2]

The thrust of petitioner's contention is that the Commission's remedial powers are limited to ordering the offender "to cease and desist from using such method." He reads the "cease and desist" language as limiting the Commission's power to prohibit future illegal or improper conduct and as a denial of power to punish or assess damages for such past conduct. He argues that restitution is unnecessary to bring to an end the misconduct found against him and that the order, stripped of subterfuge, constitutes an attempt to punish him and to award damages to private persons.

The Commission rejects petitioner's contention as simplistic. In its view the "critical question is whether the Commission acted within its power in concluding that it was an unfair practice for Heater to retain moneys of which he had bilked the franchisees and members." If so, the Commission concludes the order is wholly valid—it is merely the ordinary order to cease and desist from a violation of the Act. Indeed, the Commission argues, as it is the only order that will bring the illegal conduct to an end, its refund provision is manifestly within the legislative grant of broad remedial discretion. See, e.g., Jacob Siegel Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 327 U.S. 608, 613, 66 S. Ct. 758, 90 L. Ed. 888 (1946).

*The Honorable J. Blaine Anderson, United States District Judge for the District of Idaho, sitting by designation.

[1] Universal Credit Acceptance Corp., et al., [1970–73 Transfer Binder] Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 19,938 (Hearing Examiner's Initial Decision, March 14, 1972); Universal Credit Acceptance Corp., et al., [1970–73 Transfer Binder] Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 20,240 (FTC Final Order to Cease and Desist, Feb. 16, 1973).

[2] Accordingly, we need not, and do not, resolve various ancillary issues raised by petitioner concerning the scope of the order.

Countering petitioner's argument, the Commission asserts that the order is aimed prospectively at the continuing failure to refund, that it imposes neither a punitive sanction nor compels the payment of reliance or expectancy damages[3] and that it serves the public interest independent of any incidental private benefit. See Porter v. Warner, 328 U.S. 395, 66 S. Ct. 1086, 90 L. Ed. 1332 (1946); Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 63 S. Ct. 1214, 87 L. Ed. 1568 (1943).

In support of its position the Commission urges that retention of the moneys is properly deemed "unfair" because the practices by which they were obtained were themselves unfair and in violation of the Act,[4] because the defrauded persons, thinking they have no legal recourse, continue to be deceived, and because of the resultant distortion in the credit card market. In short, the Commission contends that the power vested in it extends not only to prohibiting the deceptive practices themselves but to remedying the secondary effects of those practices.

We are fully aware that the Act was drawn to give the Commission wide latitude in defining the statutory proscription of "unfair" trade practices,[5] that the Commission is not limited to con[323]demning simply violations of antitrust laws or acts deceptive in themselves (Federal Trade Commission v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 92 S. Ct. 898, 31 L. Ed. 2d 170 (1972)), and that the Commission, in making a determination of unfairness, may properly consider these factors:

[3] The Commission deleted the portion of the Hearing Examiner's initial order directing petitioner to reimburse franchisees for plane fares, because, although the moneys were spent in reliance upon misrepresentations by respondents and were an element of the franchisees' damages, they were not funds received by the respondent corporations.

[4] The Commission emphasizes that petitioner's conduct was not simply a technical violation of the Act. "This is not a case of a business practice which, but for the guidance of the Commission in its capacity as interpreter of the broad proscriptions of § 5, could colorably have been considered legal and proper—this is a case, in popular vernacular, of a 'bunco' operation, a confidence game." (FTC Brief at 19.)

[5] The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, when reporting out the original Act, stated in the report:

> "The Committee gave careful consideration to the question as to whether it would attempt to define the many and variable unfair practices which prevail in commerce and to forbid their continuance or whether it would, by a general declaration condemning unfair practices, leave it to the commission to determine what practices were unfair. It concluded that the latter course would be better, for the reason, as stated by one of the representatives of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, that there were too many unfair practices to define and after writing twenty of them into law it would be quite possible to invent others."

S. Rep. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1914). The House Conference Report concurred in this rationale:

> "It is impossible to frame definitions which embrace all unfair practices. There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field. Even if all known unfair practices were specifically defined and prohibited, it would be at once necessary to begin over again. If Congress were to adopt the method of definition, it would undertake an endless task."

H.R. Rep. No. 1142, 63d Cong., 2d Sess. 19.

> "Whether the practice, without necessarily having been previously considered unlawful, offends public policy as it has been established by statutes, the common law, or otherwise—whether, in other words, it is within at least the penumbra of some common-law, statutory, or other established concept of unfairness; (2) whether it is immoral, unethical, oppressive or unscrupulous; (3) whether it causes substantial injury to consumers (or competitors or other businessmen)." Statement of Basis and Purpose of Trade Regulation Rule 408, Unfair or Deceptive Advertising and Labeling of Cigarettes in Relation to the Health Hazards of Smoking. 29 Fed. Reg. 8355 (1964). 405 U.S. at 244 n. 5, 92 S. Ct. at 905.

As an abstract proposition, it is undoubtedly permissible to view the secondary effects of unfair or deceptive practices as "unfair."[6] The Commission's contention, therefore, reflects a not implausible construction of the Act, although command of an affirmative remedial act through an order to "cease and desist" from doing that act involves, at the least, some departure from the common connotation of those words.[7]

However, we reject that contention. The reason is fundamental. The construction placed by the Commission upon its power to define and prohibit "an unfair act or practice" would, if accepted, operate to invest the Commission with remedial powers which are inconsistent and at variance with the over-all purpose and design of the Act. In particular, it would permit the Commission to order private relief for harm caused by acts which occurred before the Commission had declared a statutory violation, and thus before giving notice that the prior conduct was within the statutory purview. Such an order, we think, is impermissible, regardless of the prospective public harm which might be [324] prevented or the public interest served by a restitution order based upon a broader definition. In this conclusion we are guided by the legislative history of the Act. From this it appears that the critical issue around which the Congressional debate over the Federal Trade Commission Act centered was the breadth of the Commission's power to define what would constitute "unfair acts."[8] Some lawmakers considered the general standard employed by the statute as it now exists to constitute an excessive delegation of legislative authority,[9] and wanted listed acts proscribed. A principal concern over the generality of the language was the risk that a businessman would be unable to determine whether a patricular practice was made unlawful until the Commission and courts gave the general language specific substance.[10] [6] We note that the Commission's argument proves too much. Each of the factors relied upon to support its position can be found in some degree in all cases. As the qualitative judgement that a failure to refund is "unfair" is not readily susceptible to dispute, the FTC position supports restitution as an appropriate remedy in all cases. Moreover, the Commission's approach would equally support the power to order damages or punitive sanctions. The failure to pay reliance or expectancy damages caused by an unfair practice might itself be considered an "unfair" practice which has a distorting effect on the market. Were it not for jury trial complicatons, the Commission's expansive definition of its power to remedy unfair practices would therefore support an order to cease and desist from not paying damages. The Commission concedes that § 5 does not grant it power to order damages.

[7] See Note, "Corrective Advertising" Orders of the Federal Trade Commission, 85 Harv. L. Rev. 477, 492–93 (1971).

It is clear that in some circumstances the Commission may order affirmative acts. See, e.g., Federal Trade Commission v. Dean Foods Co., 384 U.S. 597, 606 n. 4, 86 S. Ct. 1738, 16 L. Ed. 2d 802 (1966) (divestiture order under § 5 of FTCA rather than § 7 of Clayton Act); L. G. Balfour Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 442 F. 2d 1 (7th Cir. 1971) (divestiture); J. B. Williams Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 381 F. 2d 884 (6th Cir. 1967) (Affirmative advertising disclosure); American Cyanamid Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 363 F. 2d 757 (6th Cir. 1966) (mandatory licensing of patent).

The Act adopted the general definition standard in order to prevent clever circumvention of a more precise definition, thereby insuring the ability of the Commission to define norms of acceptable business behavior. However, to reconcile the Commission's broad power with the need for a specific notice to an individual who must conform his behavior to the terms of the Act, Congress limited the consequences of violation of the Act to a cease and desist order. It withheld from the Commission the power to make a determination which would expose the businessman to liability for acts occurring before the Commission gave the general definition specific meaning in a factual context. In particular, Congress rejected an amendment which provided a private damage suit based on a Commission finding of a violation of the Act. Senator Newlands, the principal sponsor of the bill and of the broad standard,[11] expressed the argument against inclusion of a damage suit:

> We are entering now upon a new field of inquiry as to what constitutes unfair competition. This commission, and ultimately the courts, will be called upon to make nice distinctions with reference to this matter for the purpose of determining what set of facts and circumstances constitute unfair competition. Here (in the proposed damage suit) we hold this sword of Damocles above every businessman in the country, and either compel him to abandon a practice which perhaps he thinks is right, or to pursue litigation to the bitter end, when we want through this instrumentality not to punish, but to secure higher standards of conduct, by rules that will be laid down by this commission and sustained by the court, and which will have an educational effect upon the commerce of the country. 51 Cong. Rec. 13116, 63rd Cong., 2d Sess. (1914).

The broad power to define unfair acts and practices asserted as the basis for the refund order must be read in light of the contemplated non-retroactivity of a Commission decision. As Senator Newlands indicated, the Act was designed to allow the Commission to serve an educational purpose by developing a body of administrative law, through published decisions, defining unfair acts or competition in particular situations on the basis of full knowledge of the facts.[12] The power to attach consequences to prior conduct was thought inconsistent with the Commission's contemplated quasi-legislative and educational function. As a result, recourse for harm suffered before the Commission enters a cease and desist order was left to private suits.[13]

[325] The impact of the refund order in the present case illustrates the reason Congress did not give the Commission the power it seeks to exercise. So far as it appears from the record, petitioner received only a salary and loans, (some of which have been repaid), from the corporations. The corporations, which actually received the funds, are now bankrupt; the order runs only against petitioner. Aside from whether petitioner is legally liable to refund sums he only constructively received, those funds were expended by the corporations to pay the salaries of employees hired to service accounts and collect member charges. Any assets of the corporations will be applied towards satisfaction of judgments in private civil suits.[14] The Commission's order operates as a determination that, as between petitioner and the innocent franchisees and members, petitioner ought in fairness to pay the losses out of his personal assets. Regardless of how egregious petitioner's conduct, or how unreasonable his reliance on the legality of the [13] Our holding denies retroactive impact to a Commission decision, at least insofar as private rights and liabilities are involved. The Commission has argued that the propriety of an order should not be determined by inquiry into whether the order has prospective or retrospectve effect, see Curtis Publishing Co., [1970–73 Transfer Binder] Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 19,179, 21,753 (Final order to dismiss, Dkt. 8800, June 30, 1971), contending:

> "Every Commission order is 'retrospective,' in the sense that it looks to and is based upon the causes and results of the acts found to violate the statute, and at the same time it is 'prospective' in the sense that its design, purpose, and effect is to dissipate any lingering effects of the past violations and to prevent their recurrence in the future." Curtis, supra at 21,757.

We recognize that divestiture and corrective advertising orders support the Commission's position that it has power, in order to remedy the continuing effects of violations of the Act, to order acts imposing economic costs properly attributed to conduct occurring before the conduct is declared illegal. Moreover, we recognize that there is no economic difference in the impact of those orders and a restitution order—in each case the offender loses the benefits of money expended in reliance on the legality of conduct later found illegal. Nevertheless, the two cases must be treated differently because Congress, out of reasonable fair notice considerations, chose to leave the cure of private injuries caused by violations of the Act to whatever common-law remedies existed.

[14] A judgment well in excess of the remaining assets in the bankruptcy estate has already been obtained against the corporations in a class action brought on behalf of the franchisees. Petitioner was dismissed by the settlement stipulation and judgment in that case with prejudice and is not liable personally for amounts not recoverable from the corporations.

operation,[15] the Commission was not given the power to recast the consequences of conduct occurring prior to its entry of an order;[16] Congress was unwilling to subject the operation of a business to the risk of subsequent Commission condemnation.

Moreover, the Congressionally mandated Commission procedures are designed for the determination and expression of the public interest in a particular factual context; they become suspect if employed to adjudicate private rights. The Commission acts as both prosecutor and judge in its own proceeding. The Commission issues the original complaint, a Commission attorney prosecutes, a Commission Hearing Examiner hears the evidence, makes factual findings, and makes the initial judgment of [326] whether the Act is violated. An appeal may then be had back to the full Commission, which originally issued the complaint. Court review of the final Commission judgment is limited—the Commission's factual findings are conclusive if supported by substantial evidence. In such circumstances there is a real likelihood that the Commission would, in furtherance of its broad institutional mandate to protect the public interest, expand unduly the common-law liability of the violator.[17] We are certain that had Congress contemplated displacement of a private suit for rescission, under traditional judicial procedures, by an administrative proceeding, under § 5(b) procedures, as the remedy for fraud in the procurement of a contract, it would have said so more explicitly.[18]

We cannot help but note that although the Act has been on the books for sixty years, this is the first time that the Commission has advanced this construction of its power to an appeals court. Of course, non-use of a power is not conclusive of its non-existence, and the Commission's construction of the Act has never been explicitly rejected. However, statements of courts, commentators, and Congress throughout those years uniformly reflect an understanding that the Commission is without the power it seeks to exercise. Justice Brandeis, writing six years after the passage of the Act, stated:

[15] The Commission argues that notice considerations (see n. 4, supra) play no part in this case because petitioner's acts were so patently fraudulent that he must have known his conduct violated the Act. Petitioner contends otherwise. We think it clear that Congress did not create an exception from its prohibition of retroactive sanctions for exceptional violations of the Act. Concern for the need for notice in debatable cases led to the retroactive sanctions in general, particularly since common-law remedies were available in extreme cases.

[16] We sympathize with the Commission's problem. Under the present design of the Act, those sufficiently unscrupulous or reckless to engage in conduct clearly forbidden by the Act may do so until a cease and desist order is entered, escaping with the fruits of the violation. In many situations no individual has a sufficient interest to bring a suit for redress, and a violation of the Act may be quite profitable. See 85 Harv. L. Rev., supra n. 7, at 482–86.

[17] Here, for instance, and as noted above, the Commission deleted a provision in the Hearing Examiner's order which conditioned individual franchisee's rights to a refund on proof of reliance, ordinarily an element of an action for rescission of a contract procured by fraud.

[18] The NLRB, by § 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), is explicitly granted broader remedial powers than those granted the FTC. Nevertheless, the Board has interpreted its power not to extend to the award damages for violation of the Act. Ex-Cell-O Corp., 185 NLRB No. 20 (August 25, 1970).

> [I]t is necessary to bear in mind the nature of the proceeding under review. The proceeding is not punitive. The complaint is not made with a view to subjecting the respondents to any form of punishment. It is not remedial. The complaint is not filed with a view to affording compensation for any injury alleged to have resulted from the matter charged, nor with a view to protecting individuals from any such injury in the future. The proceeding is strictly a preventive measure taken in the interest of the general public. Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz, 253 U.S. 421, 432, 40 S. Ct. 572, 576, 64 L. Ed. 993 (1920) (dissent).

In 1948 the Court reiterated:

> [T]he effect of the Commission's order is not to punish or to fasten liability on respondents for past conduct but to ban specific practices for the future in accordance with the general mandate of Congress. Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 706, 68 S. Ct. 793, 92 L. Ed. 1010 (1948).

Henderson, in his landmark work on the Commission, wrote:

> The act does not expressly confer any general power, of the kind possessed by a court of equity, to compel restitution, or otherwise to so mold the decree as to do substantial justice under the circumstances. Of course, no damages can be awarded, or mandatory order entered. Where, therefore, the unfair act has already accomplished its purpose, and there is no occasion for repeating it, the Commission cannot give relief. Henderson, The Federal Trade Commission 71 (1924).

And in 1971 the Senate Committee on Commerce, in reporting out a bill which would have amended the Act to empower the Commission to order refunds, noted:

> At the present time cease and desist orders have prospective application only and afford no specific consumer redress to consumers already injured. S. Rep. No. 92-269, p. 24, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. (1971).

[327] [2] We think the foregoing views correctly reflect the scope of the powers given the Commission. The construction the Commission places on its power to define "unfair acts and practices" impermissibly expands the Commission's remedial power beyond that contemplated by Congress or written into the Act. Consumer protection is an important task. However, the Commission's endeavors must be limited to the exercise of powers granted by Congress. If there exists a deficiency in the Act, the cure must come from Congress, not by judicial enlargement of the statute. "To supply omissions transcends the judicial function." Iselin v. United States, 270 U.S. 245, 251, 46 S. Ct. 248, 250, 70 L. Ed. 566 (1926) (Brandeis, J.).

The refund provisions of the Commission's final order are set aside.

(United States District Court, District of Minnesota, October 2, 1974)

On motion for preliminary injunction against the Commission's withholding of documents requested under the Freedom of Information Act, court held that plaintiffs failed to show irreparable injury in that the "usual expense and annoyance" of litigation are not such "irreparable injury" as will justify a preliminary injunction and denied plaintiffs' motion therefor.

MEMORANDUM ORDER

Plaintiffs here are respondents in an administrative proceeding currently pending before the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) for alleged violations of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, in the conduct of their respective electronic data processing vocational education programs. A summary of those proceedings from March 1971 to January 1974 can be found in this Court's Order and Memorandum in a prior case between the present parties. Control Data Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission, No. 4-74-Civ. 25 (D. Minn. Feb. 28, 1974).

The complaint in this case was filed on August 23, 1974. Jurisdiction is invoked pursuant to 5 U.S.C. §§ 552(a)(3), 702, 704, and 706, and 28 U.S.C. § 1361. With the complaint plaintiffs filed a motion for a preliminary injunction. Oral argument on the motion was heard on September 16, 1974. For the reasons set out below, that motion must be denied.

The complaint incorporates by reference much of the recent administrative record in the FTC proceeding. That record indicates that on February 7, 1974, plaintiffs filed with the administrative law judge a request for issuance of a subpoena directed to certain information within the control of the FTC; that on March 11, 1974, that request was granted in part and denied in part; that on March 19, 1974, plaintiffs submitted a petition to the Secretary of the FTC requesting disclosure pursuant to 5 U.S.C. § 552 of five classes of information that had been denied in the Order of March 11. The five classes of information sought were:

(1) Names and addresses of all persons, other than FTC staff, having knowledge of any of the allegations in the complaint before the Commission;

*Not otherwise reported. See also pp. 852, 1002 herein.

(2) Records of every committee, group, or task force, on which the FTC participated, which studied private vocational education in the United States at any time since 1969;

(3) The membership of each committee, group, or task force described in (2);

(4) Records relating to revisions or amendment of the FTC's guidebook "Our Vocational Training Can Guarantee You the Job of a Lifetime";

(5) Various records relating to development and preparation of "Guide 10(e)" of the FTC's "Guides for Private Vocational and Home Study Schools."

On May 23, 1974, the Secretary agreed to produce a small portion of the documents requested and refused to produce the remainder. On June 10, 1974, he advised plaintiffs that they would be allowed to inspect the documents produced pursuant to the May 23 letter only after payment of a "search and segregation fee" of $183.00. The complaint and the motion for a preliminary injunction seek an Order compelling production of the documents requested of the Secretary and enjoining defendants from requiring payment of any search and segregation fees in connection with production of those documents.

Factors to be considered on a motion for a preliminary injunction are "(1) the significance of the threat of irreparable harm to plaintiff if the injunction is not granted; (2) the state of the balance between this harm and the injury that granting the injunction would inflict on defendant; (3) the probability that plaintiff will succeed on the merits; and (4) the public interest." 11 Wright and Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil § 2948, at 430–431. The most important of these factors, essential to obtaining a preliminary injunction, is the threat of irreparable harm if the injunction is not granted. Id., at 430–438.

In the earlier litigation between these parties, this Court denied plaintiffs' motions for preliminary and permanent injunctions enjoining the administrative proceedings until the FTC produced certain documents then in dispute. The Court held in its Order and Memorandum of February 28, 1974, that plaintiffs had not made a showing of "irreparable injury" sufficient to stay the administrative proceedings. The setting of the present motion differs from that in the earlier case in that only production of documents, not a stay on the administrative proceedings, is sought. However, the Court holds that the test of "irreparable injury" is the same in both circumstances. In his affidavit in support of the present motion, counsel for plaintiffs claims that denial of the preliminary injunction will make it impossible to prepare adequately a defense to the administrative complaint. A very similar contention was considered and rejected in No. 4-74-Civ. 25 (Order and Memorandum of February 28, 1974, at 7-8). The Court's discussion there is fully applicable here. In brief, the "usual expense and annoyance" of litigation are not such "irreparable injury" as will justify a preliminary injunction.

It should be noted that in denying the preliminary injunction for failure to show irreparable injury, the Court expresses no view on the merits of the action.

Accordingly, upon all the records, files, and proceedings herein, IT IS ORDERED:

That plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction is denied.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. NATIONAL COMMISSION ON EGG NUTRITION*

Civ. A. No. 74 C 2185. F.T.C. Docket No. 8987.

(United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, October 21, 1974)

On petition for preliminary injunction, court held that the Commission failed to show necessary requisite of public interest and made inadequate showings on the issues of a favorable balance of the equities and the probable chance of success.

Before PARSONS, District Judge.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Petitioner, the Federal Trade Commission, has applied to this Court for an order granting a temporary injunction against respondent, National Commission on Egg Nutrition, to restrain certain publications pending a determination of a matter being presented to the Commission. Petitioner's application was made pursuant to Section 13 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53. Respondent has opposed any grant of the application on the grounds that the Court lacks jurisdiction, that an injunction would unlawfully abridge its constitutional rights of freedom of speech and of the press, and that the statutory and equitable prerequisites for an injunction have not been satisfied.

I.

Before proceeding to rule on petitioner's application, a review of those sections of the Federal Trade Commission Act which the Court found relevant seems necessary. Aforementioned Section 13 of the Act states in part as follows:

> (a) Whenever the Commission has reason to believe—
>
> (1) that any person . . . is about to engage in . . . the causing of the dissemination of any advertising in violation of section 12 (15 U.S.C. § 52), and
> (2) that the enjoining thereof . . . would be to the interest of the public, the Commission . . . may bring suit . . . to enjoin . . . upon proper showing a temporary injunction . . . shall be granted . . .
>
> (b) Whenever the Commission has reason to believe—
>
> (1) that any person . . . is violating, or is about to violate, any provision of law enforced by the FTC, and
> (2) that the enjoining thereof . . . would be in the interest of the public—the Commission . . . may bring suit . . . to enjoin . . . upon a proper showing that, weighing the equities and considering the Commission's likelihood of ultimate success, such action would be in the public interest . . . a temporary restraining order or a preliminary injunction may be granted. . . .
> 15 U.S.C. § 53 (a) and (b).

Section 12 of the Act, mentioned in Section 13(a), states in part as follows:

> (a) It shall be unlawful for any person . . . to disseminate, or cause to be disseminated, any false advertising—
> (1) . . . in commerce by any means, . . . which is likely to induce, directly or indirectly the purchase of food . . . or
> (2) By any means . . . which is likely to induce, directly or indirectly, the purchase in commerce of food . . .
> (b) The dissemination of the causing to be disseminated of any false advertisement . . . shall be an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce within the meaning of Section 5 (15 U.S.C. § 45). . . .
> 15 U.S.C. § 52 (a) and (b).

The term "false advertisement," as used in Section 12, is statutorily defined in Section 15 of the Act, which states in part as follows:

> (a)(1) The term "false advertisement" means an advertisement . . . which is misleading in a material respect. . . . 15 U.S.C. § 55(a)(1).

And Section 5 of the Act, mentioned in the aforequoted Section 12(a) of the Act, states in part as follows:

> (a)(1) Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are declared unlawful. 15 U.S.C. § 45(a).

II.

In requesting an order of injunctive relief, petitioner has argued that any hearing on its application should be a summary proceeding, that is, without any presentation of oral testimony or oral cross-examination. Petitioner's position is quite similar to the one it took in another case recently before me, entitled FTC v. Borden, Inc., 74 C 1849. In opposing petitioner's reqeust, the respondent has argued that injunctive relief may only be ordered under Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53, after a full evidentiary hearing has been held.

For reasons which will be stated below, I reject both the petitioner's and the respondent's position regarding the nature of a court proceeding under Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53. The Court is of the opinion that it may act in either a summary manner or after a more complete evidentiary hearing is held; the decision as how to act under Section 13 must be made on a case-by-case basis, and that decision will depend on what the Court considers as necessary for a "proper showing" in any one case. Thus, a "proper showing" may be made by the FTC in some cases upon mere presentation of affidavits, while in other cases such a showing may be made only after the Court has had the benefit of both affidavits and counter-affidavits, and yet in still other cases such a showing may be made only after the court has had the benefit of a full evidentiary hearing.

III.

I am of the opinion that in certain similar cases, a full evidentiary hearing might be necessary before the Court can decide whether a "proper showing" under Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53, has been made because of my view on the meaning of the statutory phrase "proper showing." Contrary to the petitioner's assertions, I believe that the phrase means more than a showing that the FTC, in fact, has reason to believe. Rather, I feel that the phrase also includes at least some of the equitable burdens which those seeking the extraordinary remedy of injunctive relief have traditionally borne.

I have found very little precedent on the Federal Trade Commission's utilization of Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53, and thus have very little guidance on what is meant by the phrase "proper showing" in Section 13 (a) and (b), 15 U.S.C. § 53 (a) and (b). I note that although the same phrase is used in both Section 13(a) and Section 13(b) of the FTC Act, the two subparagraphs are different in their granting of discretionary powers to the district courts. Section 13(a) says "upon a proper showing . . . an injunction shall be granted" while Section 13(b) says "upon proper showing . . . (an) injunction may be granted." And Section 13(b) explicitly requires the courts to weight the equities and consider the Commission's likelihood of ultimate success in exercising their powers while Section 13(a) contains no such explicit requirement.

Notwithstanding the differences in statutory language between 13(a) and 13(b), I am of the opinion that the phrase "proper showing" has the same meaning when used both in Section 13(a) and Section 13(b), 15 U.S.C. § 53 (a) and (b), and that within that meaning is encompassed the Commission's burden of at least showing the necessary public interest, a favorable balance of the equities, and the probable chance of success. The drafters of the recently enacted Section 13(b) said that this provision was a codification of the decisions in FTC v. National Health Aids, 108 F. Supp. 340 (D. Mary. 1952) and FTC v. Sterling Drug, Inc., 317 F. 2d 669 (2nd Cir. 1963); these two cases involved Section 13(a). The drafters may have misread Sterling Drug, however. See Sterling, supra, 317 F. 2d at 678 and 1973 U.S. Congressional and Administrative News 2533. Furthermore, the language of Section 13(b) appears to include all circumstances which fall under Section 13(a). Section 13(a) applies when a person is about to engage in a violation of Section 12, which violation is also a violation of Section 5 according to Section 12(b) and which is therefore also subject to FTC enforcement according to Section 5(a)(6). Section 13(b) applies when a person is about to engage in a violation of any provision of law enforced by the FTC, presumably including Section 12. And finally, case law under the older Section 13(a) recognizes that the broad equity principles explicitly laid out in Section 13(b) are implicit in Section 13(a) and in its phrase "proper showing." For example, the Court in National Health Aids, supra, said: ". . . the action of the court should be based on the general considerations that properly apply in the issuance of preliminary injunctions." 108 F. Supp. at 346. Petitioner has relied on the case of FTC v. Rhodes Pharmacal Co., Inc., 191 F. 2d 744 (7th Cir. 1951) when arguing for a very limited discretionary power of the Court under Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53; however, this Court notes the disapproval of that case in the later National Health Aids case, supra, 108 F. Supp. at 346, which at least the Congress viewed as the prevailing law.

In light of the foregoing analysis of the statutory phrase "proper showing" and of the possible means in which the FTC may be allowed to make such a showing in a case under Section 13 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, I have concluded that in the present case an evidentiary hearing will be unnecessary and that the Commission's application can be ruled with the benefit of affidavits, counter-affidavits, legal memoranda, and oral argument. In ruling on the petition, however, both parties must understand that the decision to grant or deny the relief requested should in no way be construed as a finding on the merits of the Commission's claims against the respondent which are presently being heard in another forum.

IV.

Prior to considering whether or not the Commission has made a proper showing sufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction, I must first consider the respondent's contention that this Court is without jurisdiction. Respondent argues that it is not a corporation, as defined by the FTC Act in Section 4, 15 U.S.C. § 44, and that its pronouncements are not advertisements within Sections 5, 12 and 13 of that Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 45, 52, 53(a)(1) and 55(a)(1).

I am of the opinion that the respondent is a corporation under Section 4, and that it is therefore subject to the FTC's jurisdiction under Section 5(a)(6) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(6). The respondent is a "company . . . organized to carry on business for (the) . . . profit . . . of its members," Section 4, 15 U.S.C. § 44. It is true that the respondent may not gain profits for itself or profits which it then distributes to its members. However, its activities do generate direct profits for its members in that many of its members are egg producers or are otherwise connected with the egg industry and that respondent's activities do directly promote, at least to some extent, the financial health of the egg industry. Although respondent is a not-for-profit corporation, the law is clear that the FTC has jurisdiction in certain instances over nonprofit corporations. See, for example, FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683 (1948). Respondent's attempt to analogize or otherwise compare its own members with scientists at p. 15 of its Memorandum in Opposition is clearly erroneous; in the present case, members of the respondent directly and personally profit from the respondent's activities while scientists usually do not. Koch v. FTC, 206 F. 2d 311 (6th Cir. 1953).

I am of the further opinion that even if I assume that the respondent's pronouncements, which are here under attack, are not advertisements within the meaning of Section 15(a)(1) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 55(a)(1), I would still have jurisdiction. Jurisdiction would lie under Section 13(b) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53(b), because the respondent's pronouncements could be believed by the FTC to be "unfair or deceptive acts or practices" under the U.S. Supreme Court's recent reading of Section 5(a)(1), 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1), in the case of FTC v. Sperry and Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233, 92 S. Ct. 898 (1972). That recent Supreme Court decision held that the FTC could proscribe certain practices pursuant to Section 5 if they are unfair or deceptive in their effect upon consumers, regardless of their nature or quality as competitive practices of their effects on competition or their antitrust implications. The Supreme Court thus recognized the power of the FTC to investigate the fairness of certain practices in terms of the "public values," i.e., whether they cause substantial injury to consumers. FTC v. Sperry and Hutchinson Co., supra, 92 S. Ct. at 905.

V.

In opposing the petitioner's application, the respondent has also contended that the granting of any injunctive relief would violate its constitutional rights under the First Amendment and thus that no such relief can be granted. Respondent has relied, in large part, on the decisions in Scientific Manufacturing Co. v. FTC, 124 F. 2d 640 (3rd Cir. 1941) and Koch v. FTC, supra. I find that the issuance of injunctive relief in this case would not necessarily violate respondent's constitutional rights, and note that support for this position can be found in the cases cited by the respondent.

The Court in Scientific Mfg. Co. recognized that the 1938 amendments to Section 5(a)(1) of the FTC Act broadened the jurisdiction of the Commission, a recognition later made by the Supreme Court in FTC v. Sperry and Hutchinson Co., supra. 124 F. 2d at 643–644. The Court in Scientific Mfg. Co. also discussed the nature of the relationship between the FTC's powers under the Act and the First Amendment; in doing so, it stated:

> It follows from what we have said that, the present petitioners not being engaged or materially interested in the cooking utensil trade, the Commission was without power to enjoin their sale and distribution of the pamphlets which they published concerning the use of aluminum cooking utensils and, further, that the publication, sale, and distribution of matter concerning an article of trade by a person not engaged or financially interested in commerce in that trade is not an unfair or deceptive act or practice within the contemplation of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, if the published matter, even though unfounded or untrue, represents the publisher's honest opinion or belief.

124 F. 2d at 644.

Unlike the petitioners in Scientific Mfg. Co., the respondent and its members in this case are materially interested and are engaged in the egg industry. The Court in Scientific Mfg. Co. recognized this distinction when it cited the following in a footnote reference:

> In Perma-Maid Co. v. FTC, 121 F. 2d 282, where a distributor of stainless steel cooking utensils procured some of the Force pamphlets for use of its salesmen in inclining prospective customers to stainless steel rather than aluminum ware, the FTC restrained the distributor's use of the pamphlets and its action was sustained by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. The Perma-Maid case, involving as it does the use of pamphlets which Force publishes and distributes well illustrates a permissible exercise of the Commission's jurisdiction and serves to point the pertinent distinction between that case and the present.

124 F. 2d at 644, footnote 8.

The Court in Koch, supra, also recognized a similar distinction which is quite relevant to the present case. On the one hand, the Court in Koch found that a book, entitled The Chemistry of Immunity, which was widely distributed among physicians and which explained the author Dr. Koch's theory of heightening the natural immunity of the body against disease, was not subject to Sections 5, 12 or 15(a) of the Act. The Court also reached a similar conclusion with respect to an address delivered by Dr. Koch to the College of Physicians and Surgeons in Quebec. Koch, supra, 206 F. 2d at 317. On the other hand, the Court found that other publications dealing with Dr. Koch's theory were subject to Section 5 of the Act because they included, "... in addition to a concise statement of Dr. Koch's theory, persuasive selling arguments to induce the purchase of the drugs and give detailed price lists." Koch, supra, 206 F. 2d at 318. Here, the respondent's pronouncements have the effect of inducing their readers to purchase more eggs—whether the respondent intended such an inducement or not.

In rejecting the respondent's First Amendment argument, it is not my intention to curtail the respondent's declarations of all its honest opinions. Again, the decision by the Third Circuit in Scientific Mfg. Co., supra, seems relevant in its following statements:

> Surely Congress did not intend to authorize the FTC to foreclose expression of honest opinion in the course of one's business of voicing opinion. The same opinion, however, may become material to the jurisdiction of the FTC and enjoinable by it if, wanting in proof or basis in fact, it is utilized in the trade to mislead or deceive the public or to harm a competitor.

124 F. 2d at 644–645.

And although I am of the opinion that the granting of any form of injunctive relief to the petitioner would not necessarily violate the respondent's First Amendment constitutional rights, I am of the further opinion that the speech elements of the respondent's pronouncements should be considered when this Court decides whether or not injunctive relief would be in the public interest. From the evidence presented thus far, it is quite clear that a major dispute is now raging both within the medical community and the public at large about the nature of the relationship—if any—between dietary cholesterol intake and coronary heart disease. Because a significant portion of our population is concerned about the risk of heart disease, the nature of any relationship is a matter of public health and legitimate public interest. United Medical Laboratories v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 404 F. 2d 706 (9th Cir. 1968), cert. den. 89 S. Ct. 1197 (1969); Lewis v. Reader's Digest Association, Inc., 366 F. Supp. 154 (D. Mont. 1973). Thus, assuming that the respondent's pronouncements are false or deceptive, even though some people are probably misled, it is also highly probable that other people become more knowledgeable about the cholesterol controversy through the respondent's pronouncements whether they are also misled or not.

VI.

The question now remaining before me is this: Has the petitioner made a sufficient showing to warrant the issuance of injunctive relief?

In order to have made a sufficient showing, the petitioner must have demonstrated that it had a reason to believe that the respondent is violating or is about to violate Section 5(a) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a), as well as a demonstration of the necessary public interest, the favorable balance of the equities, and the probable chance of its ultimate success. In assessing the sufficiency of the petitioner's showing under the FTC Act, this Court must not, of course, serve as simply the rubber stamp which validates petitioner's applications; rather, this Court must exercise independent judgment in line with the relevant statutory standards and general principles of equity encompassed within the Act.

I find that the Commission has carried its initial burden, in that it has shown reason to believe that the respondent's pronouncements are at least misleading. This finding should not, however, be deemed to render fruitless any activities by the respondent in the pending FTC administrative proceeding to produce further evidence in support of its contention that the administrative proceeding is improper because the Commission lacks the requisite "reason to believe." 15 U.S.C. § 45 (b); Cf., FTC v. Sterling Drug, Inc., supra, 317 F. 2d at 678. My finding of a reason to believe under Section 13, 15 U.S.C. § 53, is based upon the various affidavits which put into doubt the assertion that there is no scientific evidence that eating eggs increases the risk of heart attacks, as well as other assertions by the respondent.

I also find, however, that the Commission has not sufficiently carried the statutory burden of showing that it would be to the "interest of the public," as stated in both Sections 13(a) and 13(b)–15 U.S.C. § 53 (a) and (b), to enjoin the respondent's activities complained of pending the outcome of the administrative proceeding involving the same petitioner and respondent.

In its Memorandum of Law, the petitioner states:

> Petitioner's reason to believe that N.C.E.N. is falsely advertising the relationship between eggs and heart disease and heart attack is in itself sufficient "public interest" for purposes of this injunctive proceeding. Petitioner's Memo in Support, at p. 22.

This interpretation of the phrase "public interest" is clearly inaccurate in light of the preceding analysis of the FTC Act. The petitioner goes on to state:

> . . . the Commission also has reasonable cause to believe that increased egg consumption by the public as a result of respondent's advertising campaign poses a serious and significant danger to the public health. Memo at p. 22.

This statement also appears not to be accurate. Affiant Schrader's uncontradicted statement is that the egg supply for the next seven months is already fixed and cannot be expanded. Thus, it does not appear to me that the respondent's pronouncements herein attacked can increase egg consumption, at least for a while; and during the while, surely all the eggs will be eaten (whatever the price they sell for) and the administrative proceeding involving the respondent will probably come to an end (the FTC itself orally estimated before me that a decision in that proceeding will be reached by February 1975). As a result it seems to me that enjoining the respondent's so-called advertising campaign pending the outcome of the administrative proceeding would probably only change the members of the group of people who are going to eat eggs over the next few months and change the number of eggs each member of the group will eat, but would not change the number of eggs eaten.

I have already recognized that, assuming the respondent's pronouncements are at the least misleading or deceptive, the failure to enjoin the respondent will undoubtedly cause some people to be misled in the future. This was a significant factor in my consideration of the public interest. However, another significant factor in assessing the public interest was the previously-noted substantial probability that other people would lose the benefit of becoming more knowledgeable about the cholesterol controversy through reading the respondent's publications if the respondent was now enjoined (be they also misled or not).

Further considerations in my analysis of the public interest were the potential for public misunderstanding about the nature of any injunction ordered against the respondent and the potential for exploitation by parties not now before me of any injunctive relief which is ordered. Both the petitioner and respondent agreed during oral argument that such potentials existed, should be considered, and should be weighed at least to some small extent against the granting of the relief requested. And at least one other court has considered similar potentialities; the Court in FTC v. Sterling Drug, Inc., supra, said the following:

> It is not difficult to understand the heartwarming reception this article received in the upper echelons of Sterling and its Madison Avenue colleagues; no sooner were the results of the study published in the Journal of American Medical Association when Sterling Drug and its advertising agencies decided to make the most of them. 317 F. 2d at 672.

Just as certain individuals would lose the benefit of the information specifically contained in respondent's publications if an injunction was to issue, so too would the public at large lose certain benefits if the respondent was enjoined. I have already recognized the legitimate public interest in the cholesterol controvery. The benefits to be lost to the public at large if petitioner's request is granted include not only the unavailability of the information contained in the respondent's publications dealing with the controversy, but also the unavailability of any further debate, information and the like which might be stirred by the continuation of the respondent's pronouncements, i.e., the ramifications of the respondent's activities.

Yet another consideration within the phrase "public interest" must be the effect of any injunctive order on the respondent itself and its members, for they are certainly members of the public and surely other members of the public are concerned with their welfare. While it is highly unlikely, there is a possibility that many of the egg producers who are members of the respondent corporation will be financially harmed in a very great way by the issuance of an injunction and this possibility must be taken into account. FTC v. National Health Aids, supra, 108 F. Supp. at 346. There is the more likely possibility that those in the egg industry will suffer less serious financial difficulties and uncertainties if an injunction is granted and this must also be considered.

Besides failing to carry its most important burden, that of showing the requisite of public interest, the petitioner has also made inadequate showings on the issues of a favorable balance of the equities and the probable chance of success. On this later issue, I do note, however, that the FTC may be in a much better position than I to gauge the public interest, as the term is used in Section 5(b) of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45 (b), because (a) it will have the benefit of a more complete hearing than was held before me, (b) it has the ability according to statute to view the public interest in terms of a possible permanent cease and desist order rather than only in terms of a temporary order of cessation, and (c) it has the benefit of long years of experience as well as expertise in assessing statements with respect to their truthfulness and/or deceptiveness.

In view of all of the foregoing, I decline to grant the injunctive relief sought in the application of the petitioner. This does not constitute a ruling on the merits of the FTC's claims as they now appear before the administrative tribunal.

It is so ordered and decreed.

In an action seeking a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction to restrain the F.T.C. from proceeding further in Docket

*Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep., ¶ 75,328 at 98,038 [1974–2 Trade Cases].

8988, the Court held that there was substantial probability that the Commission was without jurisdiction to proceed against a private firm aiding the state in carrying out the questioned conduct. The Court rejected the Commission's contention that the court should not take jurisdiction until respondents had exhausted their administrative remedy under the exception to exhaustion requirement. The question was whether the Commission had jurisdiction over a state, a question that may be most efficiently and promptly resolved as a matter of statutory construction.

Donatas Januta, for State of California; William A. Wineberg, Jr., of Broad, Khourie & Schulz, for Calif. Milk Producers Advisory Board and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc., for plaintiffs.

Robert J. Duncan (argued), for F.T.C., defendants.

Before SCHNACKE, District Judge.

Findings of Fact

SCHNACKE, D. J.: 1. This action is brought by the State of California on behalf of C. B. Christensen, Director of Food and Agriculture (a civil executive officer of the State); the California Milk Producers Advisory Board (an advisory board established pursuant to the California Marketing Act of 1937 [Cal. Food & Ag. Code §§ 58601–59293] to assist the Director of Food and Agriculture in the administration of a marketing order for research, education, and promotion of market milk and dairy products in California, issued on October 8, 1969); and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc. (an advertising agency which in all matters here involved, has acted as the agent of the State). The defendant Federal Trade Commission is an independent agency of the United States Government, and the individual defendants in this action are the current members of the Federal Trade Commission and an administrative law judge thereof, who are sued solely in their capacity as Commission members or as administrative law judge.

2. On August 1, 1974, an administrative complaint was issued by the Federal Trade Commission, Docket No. 8988, naming as respondents the California Milk Producers Advisory Board and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc. The complaint was served upon the respondents, whose answer to the complaint was due before the Federal Trade Commission on September 13, 1974. In the FTC complaint certain advertisements promoting the sale of milk were alleged by the Commission to be false and misleading in violation of Sections 5 and 12 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. This action seeks a permanent injunction and a declaratory judgment against the FTC's proceeding with its administrative complaint in Docket No. 8988 upon the grounds that Congress has not granted the FTC jurisdiction over states, state agencies, state instrumentalities, or state officers acting in their official capacities.

3. On September 11, 1974, this Court granted a temporary restraining order enjoining the Commission from proceeding for a period of 10 days. A hearing on plaintiff's application for the granting of a preliminary injunction was held on September 20, 1974. Plaintiffs have submitted a memorandum of points and authorities in support of their complaint, a reply memorandum, an affidavit (including exhibits) of William A. Wineberg, Jr. and a supplemental affidavit (with exhibits) of William A. Wineberg, Jr. The FTC has submitted a memorandum of points and authorities together with an affidavit (with exhibits) of Gerald E. Wright. The matter was argued on September 20, 1974, by a deputy of the Attorney General of the State of California, counsel for the California Milk Producers Advisory Board and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc., and Federal Trade Commission counsel.

4. The Advisory Board is an instrumentality of the State of California established to assist and advise the Director of Food and Agriculture in fulfilling his statutory duties under the Marketing Act. The Director of Food and Agriculture of the State of California and the State of California are the real parties in interest herein.

5. Since 1972, when the FTC investigation which led to the issuance of the administrative complaint commenced, the Director of Food and Agriculture, the Attorney General of the State of California, and counsel to the Advisory Board and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc., have repeatedly, by letter and legal memoranda, advised the FTC of the status of the Advisory Board under California law and the fact that the advertising in question has been authorized and issued by the Director of Food and Agriculture under the Marketing Order.

6. Cunningham and Walsh, Inc. has acted as the agent of the State in the preparation of the advertising materials.

7. The aggregate effect of the delay, expense, and uncertainty which would result from resort to the administrative process herein would result in irreparable injury to the plaintiffs herein, and the balance of hardships tips decidedly in favor of a prompt judicial resolution of this jurisdictional dispute.

Conclusions of Law

1. The jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission under the Federal Trade Commission Act extends to "persons, partnerships, or corporations" [15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(6)]. The definition of corporation includes an "association, incorporated or unincorporated . . . which is organized to carry on business for its own profit or that of its members" [15 U.S.C. § 44]. Neither the Federal Trade Commission Act nor its legislative history indicates that states, state agencies, state instrumentalities, or state officers in their official capacities were intended by Congress to be included within the terms "persons, partnerships, or corporations."

2. There is a substantial probability that: (1) there is no jurisdiction in the Federal Trade Commission to proceed against the State of California, its instrumentalities, its agencies, or its officers in their official capacities [Parker v. Brown, [1940–1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,250], 317 U.S. 341 (1943); New Mexico v. American Petrofina, Inc. [1974–2 TRADE CASES ¶ 75,179], 501 F. 2d 363 (9th Cir. July 17, 1974)]; and (2) the FTC may not avoid this fact by seeking to proceed instead against a private corporation—here, Cunningham and Walsh, Inc.—aiding the State in carrying out the conduct in question [E. W. Wiggins Airways, Inc. v. Massachusetts Port Auth., [1966 TRADE CASES ¶ 71,811], 362 F. 2d 52, 56 (1st Cir. 1966)].

3. The Federal Trade Commission claims that this Court should not assert jurisdiction herein until the respondents have exhausted their administrative remedies before the Commission. While this is the general rule [see Myers v. Bethlehem Ship Building Corporation, 303 U.S. 41 (1938)], there are several well-established exceptions to this requirement [see Lone Star Cement Corporation v. Federal Trade Commission [1964 TRADE CASES ¶ 71,322], 339 F. 2d 505, 510 (9th Cir. 1964); Borden, Inc v. Federal Trade Commission, 1974–1 TRADE CASES ¶ 75,036 (7th Cir. 1974)]. The exception to the exhaustion requirement recognized in Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 188–189 (1958), is fully applicable here, since the Commission is apparently exceeding its jurisdiction by seeking to subject the State of California to an administrative trial. The issue appears to be a simple question of statutory interpretation which does not require agency expertise in making factual determinations [see Borden, Inc. v. FTC, supra].

Significantly, in Myers, supra, and Lone Star Cement, supra, the issue was whether a proposed respondent which was a private entity was engaged in interstate commerce—a clear factual question relating to subject matter jurisdiction. There is no contention here that exhaustion is not required with respect to such issues. Here the question is whether the Commission has jurisdiction over a state, and it is thus akin to questions of in personam jurisdiction. It is the opinion of the Court that this type of question may be most efficiently and promptly resolved as a matter of statutory construction and that there would be no justification to delay that decision by resort to the administrative process.

For the reasons set forth above, the Court has determined that it should issue a preliminary injunction prohibiting the FTC, its Commissioners and its administrative law judge, Daniel J. Hanscom, from proceeding further against the plaintiffs herein Docket No. 8988, by requiring them to appear, answer the administrative complaint, or otherwise defend the administrative proceeding until such time as the question of whether the FTC has jurisdiction to proceed against the respondents California Milk Producers Advisory Board and Cunningham and Walsh, Inc., is finally resolved in this case. In view of the nature of this case and the parties hereto, the Court finds a filing of a bond is unnecessary.

Civ. A. No. 74–1189. F.T.C. File No. 99–187.

(United States District Court, District of Columbia, October 31, 1974)

On motion to quash subpoena issued in Freedom of Information Act action and for protective order, court held that the F.T.C. had made an adequate and thorough search for requested documents and further discovery would have constituted an annoyance to the Commission; discovery was denied because it would have circumvented the reason for the exemption of intra-agency memoranda covering the factual basis on which the Commission had refused to disclose documents dealing with environmental factors.

ORDER

FLANNERY, D. J.: This matter is before the court on defendants' motion to quash plaintiffs' subpoena of Roger J. Fitzpatrick and for a protective order. Plaintiffs filed opposition to this motion, the court conducted an oral hearing, and the parties have submitted supplemental memoranda.

This action was filed August 5, 1974, seeking injunctive relief under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552. The controversy arose out of the Federal Trade Commission's promulgation of a trade regulation rule relating to the posting of research octane ratings on gasoline dispensing pumps. In its statement of basis and purpose the Federal Trade Commission, as one reason for the rule, stated "the use of a gasoline which is either too high or too low in octane rating for that particular autombile tends to create excessive emissions which contribute to air pollution." 36 Fed. Reg. 354, 363 (1971). The Federal Trade Commission stated with regard to the entire statement of basis and purpose that it had "considered all matters of fact, law, policy, and discretion including the data, views, and arguments presented on the Record." Id. at 355; see id. at 364.

*Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported in Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 75,329 at 98,040 (1974–2 Trade Cases).

On April 24, 1974, plaintiff requested from the Federal Trade Commission any items considered by the Commission in promulgating the trade regulation rule which dealt with environmental factors. See Complaint at 8. After a Commission-wide search the Federal Trade Commission agreed to turn over certain documents upon payment of a search fee [1] but stated that it was withholding three memoranda under the intra-agency memoranda exemption to the Freedom of Information Act. See 5 U.S.C. § 552(b)(5). Suit subsequently was instituted.

Since this action was commenced, plaintiffs have engaged in various discovery including two depositions of Federal Trade Commission officials and a number of interrogatories. This discovery has been designed primarily to ascertain the thoroughness of the Commission's search for documents. Defendants have moved to bar further discovery regarding the Commission's search. In support of their position defendants have filed extensive affidavits regarding the Commission search. Plaintiffs contend that the two depositions they have taken thus far have not been fruitful because the Federal Trade Commission has failed to produce persons most knowledgeable about the search. Thus, they seek to depose Mr. Fitzpatrick whom, after previous discovery, they believe has the most knowledge concerning the Commission's search. Plaintiffs also want leave to conduct additional limited discovery, probably in form of requests for admissions, to eliminate any possible questions that arise after deposing Mr. Fitzpatrick.

Plaintiffs' opposition to defendants' motion also rests on a second ground. Plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to additional discovery, not concerning the adequacy of the search, but rather to probe "the factual premises underlying the FTC's claimed privileges. . . . If the FTC is asserting a privilege on the rationale that no part of any of the documents was adopted as policy or as an interpretation by the Commission, plaintiffs are entitled to probe the factual validity of this assertion before being flatly denied access." Memorandum in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Quash Plaintiffs' Subpoena and for a Protective Order at 7, filed October 3, 1974. Plaintiffs believe that the Federal Trade Commission relied upon a large secret record as well as the public record in promulgating the trade regulation rule. Thus, plaintiffs desire an opportunity to depose Mr. Fitzpatrick because "he is in a position to describe with some degree of accuracy the procedures followed by the Federal Trade Commission in promulgating the Octane Rule." Supplemental Memorandum in Opposition to Federal Trade Commission's Motion to Terminate All Discovery at 7, filed October 10, 1974; see id. at 8.

[1] Plaintiffs are contesting the imposition of a search fee but for the purpose of this motion the court need not consider that issue.

The court will deal first with plaintiffs' contention that they need additional discovery concerning the adequacy of the Commission-wide search. Under National Cable Television Association, Inc. v. FCC, 479 F. 2d 183, 192–93 (D.C. Cir. 1973), the Commission was required to make a reasonable effort to identify the material in plaintiffs' request. And the court expressly endorsed the use of civil discovery to compel an agency to identify and disclose the documents that it has. Id. at 193. However, under National Cable, the agency is required only to make a reasonable search and plaintiffs may undertake discovery only to assure that such a search has been made. It appears to the court that the discovery plaintiffs have undertaken thus far, together with defendants' affidavits and other documentation, demonstrate that the Commission's search has been thorough and adequate. Charles A. Tobin of the Federal Trade Commission alerted all divisions of the Federal Trade Commission to search for the requested documents and the affidavits of Messrs. Thuot, Fitzpatrick, and Pfiefer demonstrate further the search that was undertaken. See Addenda 1–4, filed September 20, 1974. Any further discovery concerning the search would constitute an annoyance to the Federal Trade Commission staff and simply is unnecessary to careful resolution of the issues plaintiffs raise. Consequently, a protective order will issue barring further discovery into the Federal Trade Commission search. See generally Exxon Corp. v. FTC [1974–2 TRADE CASES ¶ 75,194], Civil Action No. 1928–73 (D.D.C., filed Aug. 14, 1974) (limiting discovery when agency demonstrates that a reasonable search has been made).

Plaintiffs' second ground for opposition to defendants' motion is that absent such discovery they will be unable to contest the factual premises underlying the Federal Trade Commission's claimed privileges. Plaintiffs cite no authority which has sanctioned the type of discovery herein sought.[2] Exemption 5 was established in part as a "bar against probing the mental processes of an executive branch decision maker. . . ." Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, 491 F. 2d 63, 69 (D.C. Cir. 1974). As such it continued the rule established by the Morgan cases of the 1930s. Id. To allow plaintiffs to continue discovery in order to determine the factual premises underlying the claimed exemptions or to determine the Federal Trade Commission's procedures in promulgating the rule would be a means of circumventing the protection afforded by Exemption 5. See Washington Research Project, Inc. v. H.E.W., Civil Action No. 74–1027 (D.C. Cir., Sept. 12, 1974) (slip at 16).[3]

[2] The National Cable case on which plaintiffs heavily rely sanctioned discovery only into the agency search, not into the factual premises underlying a claim of privilege.

[3] Nothing stated herein should be taken to indicate that the court has determined that the Federal Trade Commission's claim of privilege in the instant case has been properly raised. That decision must await proper briefing and argument by both sides.

The District of Columbia Circuit has recognized that a party arguing that a claim of exemption should be disallowed in a particular case is faced with considerable difficulty.

> [I]t is anomalous but obviously inevitable that the party with the greatest interest in obtaining disclosure is at a loss to argue with desirable legal precision for the revelation of the concealed information. Obviously the party seeking disclosure cannot know the precise contents of the documents sought; secret information is, by definition, unknown to the party seeking disclosure. In many, if not most, disputes under the FOIA, resolution centers around the factual nature, the statutory category, of the information sought.

Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F. 2d 820, 823 (D.C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 94 S. Ct. 1564 (1974). Accordingly, the Court of Appeals set forth rules regarding agency indexing of documents so that the arguments by the requesting side might be more effective.[4] In addition, there is the possibility that in camera review might be undertaken. The court feels that these procedures, if carefully followed by all sides, should allow the court to resolve correctly the claimed exemptions in this case, notwithstanding plaintiffs' list of disputed "factual presumptions." See Supplemental Memorandum, supra at 4–7.

Accordingly, it is by the court this 3rd day of October, 1974,

Ordered that defendants' motion to quash plaintiffs' subpoena of Roger J. Fitzpatrick and for a protective order be, and the same hereby is, granted; and it is further

Ordered that there shall be no further discovery in this case; and it is further Ordered that plaintiffs respond to defendants' motion to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment on or before November 18th, 1974.

1. Probability of Prevailing on Merits, Showing of Irreparable Harm, and Public Interest Are Considerations Governing Issuance of Preliminary Injunctions

---

[4] The court has had no occasion at this juncture to consider whether the Index provided by the agency in this case is adequate. However, from the face of the Index it appears that all items in the Memoranda which refer to environmental considerations concern facts in the public record or facts which, on payment of fees, the Commission will deliver to plaintiffs. Thus, it appears unlikely that the memoranda formed the sole basis for the Commission's decision. Compare American Mail Line Ltd. v. Gulick, 411 F.2d 696 (D.C. Cir. 1969). See also Washington Research Project, Inc. v. H. E. W., supra, at 17; Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. Renegotiation Bd., Civil Action No. 73–2093 (D.C. Cir., Oct. 8, 1974) (slip at 5–6).

Reported in 389 F. Supp. 167 (1974). Aff'd D.C. Cir., 523 F. 2d 730 (1975), see p. 1537 herein. For case before the Commission, see 88 F.T.C. 441.

Considerations governing issuance of a preliminary injunction are whether movants have shown a substantial probability of prevailing on merits, whether movant has shown that irreparable harm will follow if injunction does not issue, whether issuance of a preliminary injunction substantially harms other parties to proceedings, and where the public interest lies.

2. THE POLICIES OF THE CLAYTON AND F.T.C. ACTS ARE STILL IN FORCE AND EFFECT INASMUCH AS THE N.E.P.A. HAS NEITHER AMENDED NOR REPEALED ANY OTHER FEDERAL STATUTE

Inasmuch as the National Environmental Policy Act has neither amended nor repealed any other federal statute, it follows that the policies of the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act are still in force and effect.

3. PREPARATION OF AN ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENT APPLIES TO FEDERAL ACTION HAVING A REASONABLE SUBSTANTIAL RELATIONSHIP TO QUALITY OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Provisions of National Environmental Policy Act requiring, inter alia, preparation of an environmental impact [168] statement in connection with every recommendation or report on major federal action significantly affecting environment apply to federal action having a reasonable substantial relationship to quality of environment and include action having a direct federal impact on environment, e.g., a federal construction project, or action taken by another which will have an environmental impact and for which federal permission is required.

4. PROVISIONS OF N.E.P.A. REQUIRING PREPARATION OF AN ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENT DO NOT APPLY TO DECISIONS OF THE F.T.C. TO PROMULGATE GUIDELINES RESPECTING CEMENT INDUSTRY

A decision of Federal Trade Commission to promulgate guidelines respecting vertical mergers in cement industry cannot be characterized as either an action which has a direct federal impact or as an action taken by another which will have such an impact, nor can decision of Commission to initiate law enforcement adjudicatory proceedings, a decision to which guidelines are but an index, be so characterized, and, thus, provisions of National Environmental Protection Act requiring preparation of an environmental impact statement in connection with every recommendation or report on major federal actions significantly affecting environment do not apply to such decisions.

5. BEFORE F.T.C. TAKES ACTION IMPLEMENTING GUIDELINES RESPECTING VERTICAL MERGERS IN CEMENT INDUSTRY, INJUNCTION WOULD NOT ISSUE TO REQUIRE COMPLIANCE WITH N.E.P.A.

Injunction would not issue to require compliance with National Environmental Policy Act before Federal Trade Commission took any action implementing its guidelines respecting vertical mergers in cement industry, including prosecution of administrative action against plaintiff, where plaintiff was not likely to succeed on its claim that decision of Commission to initiate antitrust enforcement proceedings was within range of situations to which National Environmental Policy Act was intended to apply, and plaintiff did not otherwise make a showing of possible irreparable harm, balance of harm was in favor of Commission, and public interest would be served by allowing adjudicatory hearing to proceed.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 389 F. Supp. 167)

On motion for declaratory and injunctive relief, court held that neither the F.T.C.'s decision to file a Sec. 7, Clayton Act suit against cement industry acquisitions nor its formulation of merger guidelines for the industry were within the range of situations to which the National Enivronmental Policy Act applies. Further, because plaintiff failed to show a probability of success on the merits, there was no showing of irreparable harm, the balance of harm favored the F.T.C., and the public interest was served by a denial of the injunction, the motion for declaratory and injunctive relief was denied.

MEMORANDUM

GASCH, District Judge..

I. The Claim

This matter is before the Court on plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction prohibiting certain adjudicatory proceedings before an administrative law judge of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC).[1] The plaintiff contends that such antitrust enforcement policy and procedures are subject to the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, 42 U.S.C. § 4321 et seq. (1970) ("NEPA").[2]

The complaint is in four counts. Count I states that NEPA requires all agencies of the Federal Government to develop methods and procedures whereby [169] environmental factors may receive appropriate consideration in decisionmaking.[3] Plaintiff asserts that the FTC has specifically exempted its own law-enforcement adjudication proceedings from NEPA.[4] Plaintiff claims that this is contrary to the requirements of NEPA since the Act requires the FTC to create procedures by which adjudicatory proceedings requiring an impact statement may be identified.

[1] The FTC believes that certain acquisitions of other companies by plaintiff are in violation both of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18 (1970)) and of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45 (1970)). Administrative Complaint, In the Matter of Gifford Hill & Co., Inc., Docket No. 8989, before the Federal Trade Commission.

[2] In particular plaintiff complains of agency activity in regard to the FTC's "Enforcement Policy With Respect To Vertical Mergers In the Cement Industry," released January 17, 1967, as set forth at Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 4520 at 6901.

[4] 16 C.F.R. § 1.83(d). The Regulations specifically exempt:

> Any investigation made . . . for law enforcement purposes; any process or order issued . . . in connection with any type of investigation; any agreement of voluntary compliance or consent decree entered into by the Commission; or any adjudicatory proceedings commenced by the Commission.

Id.

The exemption specified is solely from the requirements of 42 U.S.C. § 4332(2)(C) (1970), requiring impact statements to be filed for "major Federal actions significantly affecting the quality of the human environment." Id. Other FTC functions are of course under NEPA. See 16 C.F.R. § 1.81 et seq.

Count II recites the FTC's alleged duty under NEPA, to consider and weigh adequately environmental concerns with respect to the continuing implementation of programs formulated before the passage of NEPA. In particular, plaintiff complains of the FTC's continuing implementation of the Cement Guidelines and the initiation and prosecution of the proceeding at issue in FTC Docket No. 8989.

Count III states that the FTC has violated NEPA in that it has not filed an environmental impact statement ("EIS") with respect to continuing implementation of the Cement Guidelines.[5] In Count IV, the plaintiff alleges that the particular adjudicatory proceeding with which it is faced is a major Federal action which requires the filing of an EIS.

On the motion for preliminary injunction, plaintiff requests that the FTC be enjoined from: 1) Taking any action implementing the Cement Guidelines, including prosecution of the administrative action involving plaintiff (FTC Docket No. 8989), unless and until the FTC has established procedures conforming to NEPA with respect to continuing implementation of its enforcement program, has considered environmental issues in connection with implementation of the Guidelines and has filed an EIS with respect to implementation of the Guidelines; 2) Taking any action prosecuting FTC Docket No. 8989 unless and until the FTC has established appropriate NEPA procedures in regard to its adjudicatory proceedings, has properly considered environmental issues in relation to prosecution of FTC Docket No. 8989 and has filed an EIS with regard to such prosecution.

II. Parties.

Plaintiff herein is Gifford-Hill and Company, Inc. ("GFH"), a corporation which has its principal place of business in Dallas, Texas. GFH and its subsidiaries are primarily engaged in the production and sale of certain construction materials, including ready-mixed concrete, aggregates, portland cement, concrete sewer and water pipe and other concrete products. Defendant Federal Trade Commission (FTC) is an agency of the Federal Government which administers several statutes regulating competitive and commercial practices. The named individual defendants are commissioners of the FTC.

[5] Plaintiff believes that an EIS is required pursuant to the command of 42 U.S.C. § 4332(2)(C) (1970). Plaintiff, of course, thinks that continuing implementation of the Cement Guidelines is major Federal action having a significant effect on the quality of the human environment.

III. Facts.

This suit found its genesis in the FTC's decision of May, 1974, to challenge GFH's acquisition of certain companies. These acquisitions had taken place in 1967, 1970, and 1972 and included companies engaged in the manufacture of concrete products and [170] ready-mixed concrete and in the mining of aggregates.[6] The FTC was of the opinion that these mergers violated antitrust provisions of United States law.[7] The FTC apparently took this view because it had determined that the mergers in question were inappropriate under its guidelines respecting vertical mergers in the cement industry.[8]

The FTC advised GFH of its decision and invited attention to the possibility of settlement by a consent order procedure. Negotiations, however, were unsuccessful.[9] The main disagreement between the parties appears to have been the suggested divestiture by GFH of one of its acquisitions, Becker Sand & Gravel Co. and a ten year prohibition on acquisitions of similar firms. Becker Sand & Gravel (Becker) is a producer of mineral aggregates, including sand and gravel, and is based in North and South Carolina. Becker produces its sand and gravel by means of strip-mining operations.[9a] At some point in the negotiations, plaintiff suggested that NEPA was applicable to the FTC's adjudicatory proceedings.

Negotiations had reached an impasse and were terminated. The FTC issued an administrative complaint on August 7, 1974. This law suit was filed on August 21, 1974.

IV. Conclusions of Law.

A. Standards for a Preliminary Injunction.

[1] The considerations governing issuance of a preliminary injunction are as follows: 1) whether the movant has shown a substantial probability of prevailing on the merits; 2) whether movant has

This contemplated relief was eventually requested in the formal administrative complaint. Complaint in the matter of Gifford-Hill & Co., Inc., No. 8989 before the Federal Trade Commission at 8. These criteria bind the Court in the present case.

B. Application of NEPA.

The sections of NEPA which purportedly govern this case,[10] require that all [171] agencies, to the fullest extent possible, develop methods and procedures which will permit unquantified environmental values to be considered in agency decisionmaking.[11] It also requires the preparation of an EIS in connection with every recommendation or report on legislative proposals and other major Federal action significantly affecting the environment.[12] The Court is also aware of the general policy statement which the Congress has made with regard to NEPA.[13]

---

[10] 42 U.S.C. § 4332(2) (A), (B), (C) (1970). The statute reads as follows:

The Congress authorizes and directs that, to the fullest extent possible: . . . (2) all agencies of the Federal Government shall—

(A) utilize a systematic, interdisciplinary approach which will insure the integrated use of the natural and social sciences and the environmental design arts in planning and in decisionmaking which may have an impact on man's environment;

(B) identify and develop methods and procedures, in consultation with the Council on Environmental Quality established by subchapter II of this chapter, which will insure that presently unquantified environmental amenities and values may be given appropriate consideration in decisionmaking along with economic and technical considerations;

(C) include in every recommendation or report on proposals for legislation and other major Federal actions significantly affecting the quality of the human environment, a detailed statement by the responsible official on—

(i) the environmental impact of the proposed action,

(ii) any adverse environmental effects which cannot be avoided should the proposal be implemented,

(iii) alternatives to the proposed action,

(iv) the relationship between local short-term uses of man's environment and the maintenance and enhancement of long-term productivity, and

(v) any irreversible and irretrievable commitments of resources which would be involved in the proposed action should it be implemented.

Prior to making any detailed statement, the responsible Federal official shall consult with and obtain the comments of any Federal agency which has jurisdiction by law or special expertise with respect to any environmental impact involved. Copies of such statement and the comments and views of the appropriate Federal, State, and local agencies, which are authorized to develop and enforce environmental standards, shall be made available to the President, the Council on Environmental Quality and to the public as provided by section 552 of Title 5, and shall accompany the proposal through the existing agency review processes; . . . .

[13] Id. § 4331. The policy statement reads as follows:

(a) The Congress, recognizing the profound impact of man's activity on the interrelations of all components of the natural environment, particularly the profound influences of population growth, high-density urbanization, industrial expansion, resource exploitation, and new and expanding technological advances and recognizing further the critical importance of restoring and maintaining environmental quality to the overall welfare and development of man, declares that it is the continuing policy of the Federal Government, in cooperation with State and local governments, and other concerned public and private

(1) Probability of Prevailing on the Merits

The issue in this case is twofold. First, the Court must determine whether the FTC need weigh environmental factors in deciding whether to initiate an adjudicatory proceeding which has as its purpose the enforcement of United States antitrust or fair competition law. Second, assuming the answer to the first question to be affirmative, the Court must decide whether the FTC must file an EIS before proceeding with [172] its adjudicatory action.[14] The second aspect of the case obviously depends for its resolution upon the determination of the first aspect. The key question, then, is whether the FTC must weigh and consider environmental factors in determining whether to commence an administrative law-enforcement proceeding.

NEPA has, of course, generated much litigation. Paradoxically, however, there is a paucity of cases in point. The Court has been cited to no case that involved the application to NEPA to what was a law-enforcement adjudicatory proceeding. The Court's own researches have failed to disclose such a case. It thus appears that this is a case of first impression in the Federal system. Accordingly, the Court turns first to the legislative history of the statute to determine if the Congressional intent is clear.

The House Report [15] is not helpful since it addresses itself almost entirely to the need for a Council on Environmental Quality and the appropriate methods of operation for such a Council. The Senate Report,[16] however, contains a discussion of other provisions of NEPA.

organizations, to use all practicable means and measures, including financial and technical assistance, in a manner calculated to foster and promote the general welfare, to create and maintain conditions under which man and nature can exist in productive harmony, and fulfill the social, economic, and other requirements of present and future generations of Americans.

(b) In order to carry out the policy set forth in this chapter, it is the continuing responsibility of the Federal Government to use all practicable means, consistent with other essential considerations of national policy, to improve and coordinate Federal plans, functions, programs, and resources to the end that the Nation may—

(1) fulfill the responsibilities of each generation as trustee of the environment for succeeding generations;

(2) assure for all Americans safe, healthful, productive, and esthetically and culturally pleasing surroundings;

(3) attain the widest range of beneficial uses of the environment without degradation, risk to health or safety, or other undesirable and unintended consequences;

(4) preserve important historic, cultural, and natural aspects of our national heritage, and maintain, wherever possible, an environment which supports diversity and variety of individual choice;

(5) achieve a balance between population and resource use which will permit high standards of living and a wide sharing of life's amenities; and

(6) enhance the quality of renewable resources and approach the maximum attainable recycling of depletable resources.

[14] These determinations must be made within the present procedural posture of the case, i.e., a motion for preliminary injunction. Any conclusions expressed by the Court are thus of necessity tentative rather than final.

After a study of that Report, however, the Court has concluded that, while helpful, the Report provides no authoritative answer to the question at issue here.[17]

The Senate Report states that the purpose of the Act is to establish > a national policy to guide Federal activities which are involved with or related to the management of the environment or which have an impact on the quality of the environment.[18]

The Report then goes on to state the rising concern regarding the environment. By way of examples of Federal contribution to environmental degradation, it recites such things as the loss of publicly-owned beaches and open spaces to industry and commercial users, the proliferation of pesticides, the impact of airport development, water pollution and the impact of public construction projects.[19] Subsequently, in its analysis of the provisions of NEPA (then S. 1075), the Report stated:

> All agencies which undertake activities relating to environmental values, particularly those values relating to amenities and aesthetic considerations, are authorized and directed to make efforts to develop methods and procedures to incorporate those values in official planning and decisionmaking.[20]

The Report, then, does give some idea of the sort of activities at which the Act is aimed.[21] It is unfortunately silent regarding NEPA applicability to the situation now before the Court.

[2] Since the legislative history is devoid of authoritative guidance, the Court must look to case law to ascertain whether reported decisions of the courts have been sufficiently analogous to the present situation to be persuasive here. We begin this inquiry with the knowledge that NEPA has not amended or repealed any other Federal statute.[22] It follows that the policies of the Clayton [173] Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act are still in force and effect.

As the Court has stated, it finds no case directly in point. Plaintiff, however, seeks to convince the Court of the correctness of its views by reliance upon a number of cases which it claims are analogous. The Court will briefly discuss these cases.

First among them is Calvert Cliffs' Coordinating Comm., Inc. v. A.E.C., 146 U.S. App. D.C. 33, 449 F. 2d 1109 (1971). There the Court dealt with AEC rules governing construction permits for power plants and the licensing of operations.[23] The Court rejected the AEC position that NEPA should be excluded from application to hearings reviewing licensing requests. The Court also required that NEPA be applied to prior continuing projects.[24] Calvert Cliffs, then, dealt with Government permission to build and operate major power plants. This is vastly different from the situation at bar.[25]

---

[17] The Court notes, however, that the Report is of aid in reaching final conclusions regarding the Congressional intent.

[21] From the legislative material quoted, it would appear that NEPA was aimed at activities of Federal agencies which have a direct impact on the environment or which are substantially related to other activities which will so impact.

[22] 42 U.S.C. §§ 4334, 4335 (1970). See United States v. S.C.R.A.P., 412 U.S. 669, 694, 93 S. Ct. 2405, 37 L. Ed. 2d 254 (1973).

In Sierra Club v. Froehlke, 486 F. 2d 946 (7th Cir. 1973), the Court considered whether an EIS filed by the Corps of Engineers was sufficient to comply with NEPA. The EIS related to the construction of a dam authorized by Congress. The procedure in question was thus a Federal construction project obviously and intimately bound up with the environment. The situation in Froehlke is thus distinguishable from the case at bar. The same may be said of Hanly I,[26] Hanly II,[27] and both cases entitled Environmental Defense Fund, Inc. v. Corps of Engineers.[28]

Plaintiff also relies on language in Jones v. D.C. Redevelopment Land Agency, 162 U.S. App. D.C. 366, 499 F. 2d 502 (1974). There the Court said:

> [T]he harm with which courts must be concerned in NEPA cases is not, strictly speaking, harm to the environment, but rather the failure of decision-makers to take environmental factors into account in the way that NEPA mandates.[29]

In Jones the Court was considering the requirements of NEPA in regard to urban renewal plans for the 14th Street area of the District of Columbia. In the Court of Appeals, however, the defendants did not contest the proposition that NEPA did apply to the Agency's activities.[30] The only question at issue before the Court was that of the appropriate time for filing the required EIS and by whom such statements should be prepared.[31] Jones, then, is another case in which Federal action would have a direct and apparent impact on the environment and which was obviously within the scope of NEPA.

[25] Similar to Calvert Cliffs and also vastly different from the case at bar is Greene County Planning Bd. v. F.P.C., 455 F. 2d 412 (2d Cir.), cert. denied 409 U.S. 849, 93 S. Ct. 56, 34 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1972). Greene County dealt with an FPC licensing procedure in which the Power Authority of the State of New York sought FPC permission for the construction of a high-voltage power transmission line. Id. at 415. The court there was concerned with the question of whether the FPC could adopt an EIS prepared by the New York state agency rather than preparing its own EIS.

[27] Hanly v. Kleindienst, 471 F. 2d 823 (2d Cir. 1972). The same jail was at issue as was at issue in Hanly I.

[28] The two cases are to be found at 470 F. 2d 289 (8th Cir. 1972) and at 492 F. 2d 1123 (5th Cir. 1974). The Eighth Circuit case dealt with the adequacy of the EIS filed by the Corps of Engineers in connection with another dam-flood control project. The Fifth Circuit was confronted with an action by environmentalists to enjoin the construction, by the Federal Government, of a navigation project (i.e., the building of an inland waterway).

The case of Harlem Valley Transportation Assoc. v. Stafford [32] is also distin[174]guishable from the case at bar. Harlem Valley was a suit to prohibit the Interstate Commerce Commission from going forward with rail abandonment proceedings [33] unless and until the ICC staff had, prior to any hearings on the matter, submitted a draft EIS. Abandonment of a railroad line has, of course, immediate and obvious environmental effect,[34] and such abandonment cannot be undertaken without Federal permission through the ICC. Harlem Valley is thus a case, much like Greene County Planning Board v. F.P.C.,[35] in which Federal permission is required for actions which will have an an impact on the environment.

[3] From its study of the legislative history of NEPA and of the case law surrounding the Act, the Court has concluded that NEPA was intended to apply to Federal actions having a reasonably substantial relationship to the quality of the environment. The Court concludes that such Federal actions as are controlled by NEPA may be seen as belonging to one of two broad categories. The first of these categories is that of direct Federal impact on the environment, e.g., a Federal construction project.[36] The other category consists of actions taken by other persons which will have environmental impact and for which Federal permission is required.[37] The Court is bolstered in its conclusions by the statement of Judge Wright that NEPA applies to those situations in which > an agency proposes to build a facility itself, [and] also whenever an agency

[33] Railroads must seek and receive the permission of the ICC to abandon service on rail lines. See City of New York v. United States, 337 F. Supp. 150 (E.D.N.Y. 1972). That permission may be affirmatively given or it may be presumed by ICC inaction for a given period. Id. In the latter case it is subject to revocation.

[34] The abandonment would mean an increase in other forms of transport, more road usage, etc. See City of New York, supra, note 33.

[36] In this category we may include the situations found in Hanly v. Mitchell, 460 F. 2d 640 (2d Cir. 1972) (construction of an office-jail complex); Hanly v. Kleindienst, 471 F. 2d 823 (2d Cir. 1972) (same as Hanly v. Mitchell); Environmental Defense Fund v. Corps of Engineers, 470 F. 2d 289 (8th Cir. 1972) (flood control project); Environmental Defense Fund v. Corps of Engineers, 492 F. 2d 1123 (5th Cir. 1974) (building of inland waterway); Arlington Coalition on Transportation v. Volpe, 458 F. 2d 1323 (4th Cir. 1972) (construction of an interstate highway); Jones v. D.C.R.L.A., 162 U.S. App. D.C. 366, 499 F. 2d 502 (1974) (Federal urban renewal project); Environmental Law Fund v. Volpe, 340 F. Supp. 1328 (N.D. Cal. 1972) (highway construction); Morningside-Lenox Park Assoc. v. Volpe, 334 F. Supp. 132 (N.D. Ga. 1971) (highway construction).

[37] Examples of this category are Calvert Cliffs' Coord. Comm. v. A.E.C., 146 U.S. App. D.C. 33, 449 F. 2d 1109 (1971) (licensing and construction permits for power plants); Greene County Planning Bd. v. F.P.C., 455 F. 2d 412 (2d Cir. 1972) (permission to erect a high-voltage power line); Harlem Valley Transport Assoc. v. Stafford, 500 F. 2d 328 (2d Cir. 1974) (abandonment of a rail line); City of New York v. United States, 337 F. Supp. 150 (E.D.N.Y. 1972) (three-judge court) (abandonment of a rail line).

makes a decision which permits action by other parties which will affect the quality of the environment.[38]

[4] The Court believes that this view of the scope of NEPA is one which permits a harmonization of the legislative history which the Court has discussed, the language of the statute, the holdings of the cases and the fact that NEPA neither amends nor repeals any other statute. The question that now confronts the Court is to determine whether the situation at bar fits either of the categories described by Judge Wright. The Court thinks it evident that the FTC action does not fit into the first of the described categories, leaving only the second category to be considered.

[175] It is well to note at the outset that the Cement Guidelines are simply a statement of the agency's views.[39] Thus the Guidelines are not regulations and do not have the force of law. They rise at most to the level of what Professor Davis would describe as "interpretive rules."[40] These Guidelines are but a pronouncement of the FTC's opinion regarding what constitutes a valid and appropriate merger under Federal antitrust law. It is a shorthand way of warning the public about those mergers which might be deemed improper by the FTC. The Guidelines attempt to relieve the public of the onerous task of making its own determination, in each case, regarding validity of a merger. The public is thus made aware of what the FTC considers an antitrust violation and of what will trigger an inquiry.

This being so, the Court does not believe that NEPA applies to the formulation and continued existence of the Guidelines themselves. Still open is the question whether NEPA applies to the decision to initiate law-enforcement adjudicatory proceedings, a decision to which the Guidelines are but an index.

The Court thinks that this is not a case in which Federal permission is required before an action can be undertaken. Business firms can (and do) merge in defiance of FTC guidelines. The merger can be carried out, although there is a risk that Federal action will later be taken to void the acquisition. That is exactly what happened in the present case. Moreover, the sand and gravel firm, Becker, which was engaged in strip-mining before its acquisition by plaintiff is still so engaged and will continue to be so engaged whether under the ownership of plaintiff or under its own aegis.

[38] Scientists Inst. for Pub. Info., Inc., v. A.E.C., 156 U.S. App. D.C. 395, 404, 481 F. 2d 1079, 1088 (1973).

[39] See 16 C.F.R. § 17.1(a). Sec. 17.1(a) reads as follows:

> Industry guides are administrative interpretations of laws administered by the Commission for the guidance of the public in conducting its affairs in conformity with legal requirements. They provide the basis for voluntary and simultaneous abandonment of unlawful practices by members of industry. Failure to comply with the guides may result in corrective action by the Commission under applicable statutory provisions. Guides may relate to a practice common to many industries or to specific practices of a particular industry.

[40] K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, §§ 5.03, 5.04. So-called "legislative rules" are binding on the courts in and of themselves while interpretive rules are not.

Thus, it appears that FTC action, even if it results in divestiture by GFH of its interest in Becker, will have no impact on the environment. Indeed, the only possible environmental effect suggested by GFH is that it might be required itself to mine sand and gravel for its own use if it must rid itself of Becker. This, says GFH, raises the spectre of a possible proliferation of strip mines around the landscape. This spectre does not seem to the Court to be a very imposing phantom. GFH would be free, even after divestiture, to fill its needs for sand and gravel from Becker, which would presumably not spurn efforts to buy large amounts of its product. The need to launch additional strip mines seems at best to be exceedingly speculative. Furthermore, GFH is presently free to decide that it needs more mines and to cause its subsidiary, Becker, to create them. The possible proliferation of strip mines does not seem realistically related to any decision in the case before the FTC.

[5] For the foregoing reasons, the Court is of the opinion that the FTC decision to initiate antitrust enforcement proceedings against GFH is not within the range of situations to which NEPA was intended to apply. The FTC determination to take action does not seem substantially, or even reasonably, related to the quality of the human environment. Divestiture, at least in the situation here presented, is not that sort of action which will have an effect on the environment. The case might conceivably be different if FTC approval of a merger were required, but that is not [176] the case before the Court. For the reasons foregoing, it appears to the Court that GFH has not shown a probability of success on the merits.[41]

There are other reasons for the Court's opinion on plaintiff probability of success. Should NEPA be applied as plaintiff suggests, logic would compel its application to other situations which the Court regards as plainly beyond the ambit of NEPA. Thus, NEPA could be applied to actions of the S.E.C. requiring divestiture of stock where the securities laws have been violated. Such an action is strikingly similar to that before the Court. NEPA could also be applied to F.D.A. actions regarding prohibition of certain drugs. It could be applied to decisions of the Justice Department regarding possible institution of civil or criminal litigation (antitrust suits leap to mind). Yet the Court thinks that these situations were never intended to come under NEPA. So it is with the case at bar.

[41] The Court is aware of the Affidavit of Mary Todd Foldes, an employee of the FTC. filed herein. Mrs. Foldes states that she has been in continuing contact with staff members of the Council on Environmental Quality and that the Council has expressed its agreement with the FTC's exclusion of its adjudicatory proceedings from the application of NEPA. This is, of course, hearsay and would not be proper for consideration at trial or on a motion for summary judgment. Professor Moore, however, states that such statements may be considered for whatever they are worth at the preliminary injunction stage of a case. J. Moore, Federal Practice (2d ed.), ¶ 65.04[3] at 65–64, 65–65. The Court is inclined to agree but found it unnecessary to base any of its present conclusions upon the Foldes affidavit. An appropriate showing of CEQ approval of FTC practices would naturally have had a persuasive effect on the Court, but the Court cannot consider the Foldes affidavit to be such a showing.

The Court does not think that plaintiff has made a showing of possible irreparable harm in this case. The case of Jones v. D.C.R.L.A.[42] does not alter the Court's views in that regard. There the Court of Appeals said that the kind of harm against which NEPA was directed was not adverse consequences to the environment but rather the possibility that decisions about Federal actions would be taken without consideration of the environmental effects of such action and after a determination that the benefits would outweigh any adverse effects.[43] Jones was, however, a case squarely within the first of the broad categories discussed supra; that is, it dealt with direct Federal action affecting the environment (an urban renewal project). The Court's statement there was thus in the context of a situation in which there were obvious and direct effects on the environment. That is not the case at bar. In the present case, any environmental effect is speculative and not related to the proposed Federal action.

The only other basis for a finding of irreparable harm is plaintiff's participation in the adjudicatory proceedings. Such participation is not usually considered to be irreparable harm. See Renegotiation Board v. Bannercraft Clothing Co., 415 U.S. 1, 24, 94 S. Ct. 1028, 39 L. Ed. 2d 123 (1974); Myers v. Bethlehem Shipping Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 51–52, 58 S. Ct. 459, 82 L. Ed. 638 (1938).

The Court concludes that no irreparable harm, cognizable under NEPA, has been shown where any effect on the environment will neither be a result of Federal action nor permitted by Federal action but will result, if at all, from unrelated private action. No other basis for finding irreparable harm has been shown.

The Court has no difficulty in concluding that the balance of harms favors the FTC position here. The adjudicatory proceedings at issue here would be completely halted and a possible anti[177]trust violation permitted to continue if the injunction is granted. On the other side of the scale is only a remote and speculative possibility of some environmental impact at a future date as a result of completely private action.

It seems to the Court that the harm to the national economy within the jurisdiction of the FTC would be the greater.

(4) Public Interest.

Two public policies, one of encouraging competition and the other of encouraging consideration of environmental factors in decision-making, are in apparent conflict here. Upon closer examination, however, no real clash exists. NEPA, as was pointed out supra, was intended to apply to decisions in one of two broad categories. The situation here fits neither category. Hence, the public interest would be served by denying the preliminary injunction and allowing the FTC adjudicatory hearing to proceed.

SUMMARY

The Court concludes that plaintiff has shown none of the elements necessary for the issuance of a preliminary injunction. Accordingly, that injunction should be denied.

No. K 74-268 CA. F.T.C. File No. 99-182

(United States District Court, Western District of Michigan, December 10, 1974)

1. THIRTY-YEAR OLD SUPREME COURT DECISION HOLDING TRANSPORTATION OF INTERSTATE PASSENGERS BY TAXICABS TO BE UNRELATED TO MEANING OF "INTERSTATE COMMERCE" UNDER SHERMAN ACT WAS NOT JURISDICTIONALLY DISPOSITIVE OF F.T.C. SUBPOENA ENFORCEMENT PROCEEDING

   United States Supreme Court decision holding that transportation of interstate passengers by taxicabs to and from railroad stations in Chicago was too unrelated to interstate commerce to constitute part thereof within meaning of Sherman Act was not jurisdictionally dispositive of proceeding by Federal Trade Commission brought almost 30 years later, to enforce administrative subpoena duces tecum in connection with Commission's investigation of operation and policies of taxicab manufacturer and its subsidiaries and affiliates in Chicago area.

2. SUBPOENA SPECIFICATIONS SHOULD BEAR REASONABLE RELATIONSHIP TO INFORMATION REQUIRED TO ASCERTAIN WHERE RESPONDENTS STAND WITH RESPECT TO ALLEGATIONS RAISED

   Specification of subpoena duces tecum issued in support of investigations of Federal Trade Commission should bear reasonable relationship to kinds of information which are required in order to ascertain where respondents stand with respect to allegations raised by Commission.

*Reported in 391 F. Supp. 865, (1974).

3. A SHOWING OF CONCERTED ACTION BY RESPONDENT IN COMMERCE WHICH EITHER AFFECTED FREE COMPETITION OR WAS AN INCIPIENT MENACE TO IT WAS REQUIRED TO SUBSTANTIATE F.T.C. CHARGES

Federal Trade Commission, in order to substantiate charges that taxicab manufacturer had violated Federal Trade Commission Act through activities which might be "unfair" and have effect of "restraining or foreclosing competition", was required to show that under circumstances of case concerted action in commerce had been taken which either adversely affected free competition or was an incipient menace to it.

4. EVIDENCE IN PROCEEDING FAILED TO SHOW SUBPOENA TO BE UNDULY BROAD OR BURDENSOME

Evidence in proceeding to enforce subpoena duces tecum issued in Federal Trade Commission investigation of operation and policies of taxicab manufacturing corporation and its subsidiaries and affiliates in Chicago area failed to show that subpoena was unduly broad or burdensome to respondent.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 391 F. Supp. 865)

In proceeding to enforce subpoena duces tecum issued pursuant to F.T.C. investigation, court held (1) that a previous Supreme Court decision holding that taxicab transportation of interstate passengers was too unrelated to the meaning of "interstate commerce" as used in the Sherman Act was not jurisdictionally dispositive of F.T.C.'s right to conduct investigation and (2) the subpoena was not shown to be unduly burdensome or broad.

which was issued on March 19, 1973 in furtherance of an investigatory resolution dated January 3, 1973. The resolution, the full text of which is set forth in the margin,[2] seeks:

> To determine whether or not the activities and practices by Checker Motors Corporation, Checker Taxi Cab Company, Inc., Yellow Cab Company, Inc. (Chicago), or others in connection with the regulation, ownership, and operation of taxi services, in commerce, are conducted in an unfair manner for the purpose or with the effect of restraining or foreclosing competition, in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45).

[1] The subpoena at issue, containing 29 specifications, requests the originals or verified copies of numerous types of corporate documentation which purportedly relate to the operation and policies of respondent corporation and its subsidiaries and affiliates in the Chicago area. Respondents have consistently asserted their right to contest this subpoena, both before the Commission and this Court, and at oral argument on this matter, and contend that we are precluded from enforcing the subpoena, or in the alternative, that even if we are not so precluded, the specifications of this subpoena are such that this Court cannot properly enforce them. Citing United States v. Yellow Cab, 332 U.S. 218, 67 S. Ct. 1560, 91 L. Ed. 2010 (1947) and United States v. Yellow Cab, 338 U.S. 338, 70 S. Ct. 177, 94 L. Ed. 150 (1949) as being res judicata here, respondents strenuously argue that we are prohibited from enforcing this subpoena. The two [867] cases referred to above involved allegations that the respondents herein, along with a number of others, conspired to restrain trade in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act in the purchase and use of taxicabs in Chicago, Pittsburgh, New York City and Minneapolis. court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence.

Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any corporation or other person to appear before the Commission, or to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

[2] RESOLUTION DIRECTING USE OF COMPULSORY PROCESS IN NONPUBLIC INVESTIGATION. File 721 0091

Nature and Scope of Investigation:

To determine whether or not the activities and practices by Checker Motors Corporation, Checker Taxi Cab Company, Inc., Yellow Cab Company, Inc. (Chicago), or others in connection with the regulation, ownership, and operation of taxi services, in commerce, are conducted in an unfair manner for the purpose or with the effect of restraining or foreclosing competition, in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45).

The Federal Trade Commission hereby resolves and directs that any and all compulsory processes available to it be used in connection with this investigation.

Authority to Conduct Investigation:

Sections 6, 9 and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. 46, 49, 50; FTC Procedures and Rules of Practice 16 C.F.R. 1.1, et seq. and supplements thereto.

involved suits by the United States alleging that the respondents herein, along with a number of other companies, conspired to restrain and monopolize interstate trade in violation of § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act through their methods of selling taxicabs in Chicago, New York, Minneapolis and New York City, and in their operation of taxicab companies in those same cities. In the first case, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the District Court's finding that the complaint failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The second case upheld the District Court's holding after a trial on remand that the United States had failed to sustain its burden of proof with respect to the alleged anti-trust violations.

More specifically, in the first Yellow Cab case, the court held that although the government's allegations with respect to the purchase of taxicabs and the transportation of interstate passengers between railroad stations in Chicago did state a claim under the Sherman Act, the government's allegations with respect to the transportation of interstate passengers to and from stations did not, concluding that:

> . . . such transportation is too unrelated to interstate commerce to constitute a part thereof within the meaning of the Sherman Act. These taxicabs, in transporting passengers and their luggage to and from Chicago railroad stations, admittedly cross no state lines; by ordinance, their service is confined to transportation "between any two points within the corporate limits of the city." . . . In short, their relationship to interstate transit is only casual and incidental. 332 U.S. 230, 231, 67 S. Ct. 1566.

It is this holding that respondents would have us apply here with the result the current line of investigation by the FTC is barred as having been authoritatively handled in a prior litigation.

While it is true that both the United States and all the respondents herein were also parties to the Yellow Cab cases and that the issues both there and here bear some relationship, it must be emphasized that the Yellow Cab decisions arose under a different statute than that guiding us here. More importantly, however, the Court in the first Yellow Cab decision specifically limited its decision therein in a way directly in point to the situation now facing this Court:

> We do not mean to establish any absolute rule that local taxicab service to and from railroad stations is completely beyond the reach of federal power or even beyond the scope of the Sherman Act . . .
> Likewise, we are not to be understood in this case as deciding that all conspiracies among local cab drivers are so unrelated to interstate commerce as to fall outside the federal ken. A conspiracy to burden or eliminate transportation of passengers to and from a railroad station where interstate journeys begin and end might have sufficient effect upon interstate commerce to justify the imposition of the Sherman Act or other federal laws resting on the commerce power of Congress. 332 U.S. 232, 233, 67 S. Ct. 1568.

We have in this case, coming almost 30 years after the Yellow Cab decisions, precisely the potential for change which the Supreme Court contemplated therein. In addition, in analyzing a similar res judicata argument, the Second Circuit has stated:

> In any event, new violations will support new proceedings dealing with different periods of time, at least where there is no indication of harassment by the Commission. See F.T.C. v. Raladam Co., 1942, 316 U.S. 149, 62 S. Ct. 966, 86 L. Ed. 1336; 2 Davis Adminis[868]trative Law Treatise 570–71 (1958); cf. Grandview Dairy, Inc. v. Jones, 2 Cir., 157 F. 2d 5, certiorari denied, 1946, 329 U.S. 787, 67 S. Ct. 355, 91 L. Ed. 675. Exposition Press v. F.T.C., 295 F. 2d 869, 872 (2 Cir. 1961).

Nor do any of the respondents contest the Commission's broad power to conduct investigations. (See 15 U.S.C. § 45 and Memorandum in Opposition, p. 10).

For these reasons, we conclude that the Yellow Cab cases are not jurisdictionally dispositive of the present litigation and that we are therefore required to proceed to a direct consideration of the issues raised by the government's petition for enforcement of its subpoena.

Respondents also argue that we should confront the jurisdictional issues here through a consideration of whether the subject matter of this investigation is sufficiently "in commerce" under § 5 of the Act to justify this investigation. A careful study of the cases, however, would seem to lead the Court to a different procedure. In Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 66 S. Ct. 494, 90 L. Ed. 614 (1945), the Supreme Court considered the propriety of a subpoena issued by the Department of Labor under § 9 and § 11(a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act (which incorporates § 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act). After a survey of the cases up to that time, the Court stated:

> Without attempt to summarize or accurately distinguish all of the cases, the fair distillation, in so far as they apply merely to the production of corporate records and papers in response to a subpoena or order authorized by law and safeguarded by judicial sanction, seems to be that the Fifth Amendment affords no protection by virtue of the self-incrimination provision, whether for the corporation or for its officers; and the Fourth, if applicable, at the most guards against abuse only by way of too much indefiniteness or breadth in the things required to be "particularly described," if also the inquiry is one the demanding agency is authorized by law to make and the materials specified are relevant. The gist of the protection is in the requirement, expressed in terms, that the disclosure sought shall not be unreasonable. As this has taken form in the decisions, the following specific results have been worked out. It is not necessary, as in the case of a warrant, that a specific charge or complaint of violation of law be pending or that the order be made pursuant to one. It is enough that the investigation be for a lawfully authorized purpose, within the power of Congress to command. This has been ruled most often perhaps in relation to grand jury investigations, but also frequently in respect to general or statistical investigations authorized by Congress. 327 U.S. 208, 209, 66 S. Ct. 505.

The Court then applied these principles to the subpoena, and concluded at p. 213–214, 66 S. Ct. at p. 508:

> On the other hand, petitioners' view, if accepted, would stop much if not all of investigation in the public interest at the threshold of inquiry and, in the case of the Administrator, is designed avowedly to do so. This would render substantially impossible his effective discharge of the duties of investigation and enforcement which Congress has placed upon him. And if his functions could be thus blocked, so might others of equal importance.
> We think, therefore, that the courts of appeals were correct in the view that Congress has authorized the Administrator, rather than the District Courts in the first instance to determine the question of coverage in the preliminary investigation of possibly existing violations; in doing so to exercise his subpoena power for securing evidence upon that question, by seeking the production of petitioners relevant books, records and papers; and, in case of refusal to obey his subpoena, issued according to the statute's authorization, to have the aid of the district court in enforcing it. No constitutional provision forbids Congress to [869] do this. On the contrary, its authority would seem clearly to be comprehended in the "necessary and proper" clause, as incidental to both its general legislative and its investigative powers.

This holding was clarified in U.S. v. Morton Salt, 338 U.S. 632, 652, 70 S. Ct. 357, 368, 94 L. Ed. 401 (1950) as follows:

> While they may and should have protection from unlawful demands made in the name of public investigation, cf. Federal Trade Comm'n v. American Tobacco Co., 264 U.S. 298, 44 S. Ct. 336, 68 L. Ed. 696, corporations can claim no equality with individuals in the enjoyment of a right to privacy. Cf. United States v. White, supra. They are endowed with public attributes. They have a collective impact upon society, from which they derive the privilege of acting as artificial entities. The Federal Government allows them the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. Favors from government often carry with them an enhanced measure of regulation. Cf. Graham v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, 338 U.S. 232, 70 S. Ct. 14, 94 L. Ed. 22; Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 323 U.S. 192, 65 S. Ct. 226, 89 L. Ed. 173; Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, 323 U.S. 210, 65 S. Ct. 235, 89 L. Ed. 187; Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, at 129, 63 S. Ct. 82, 87 L. Ed. 122. Even if one were to regard the request for information in this case as caused by nothing more than official curiosity, nevertheless law-enforcing agencies have a legitimate right to satisfy themselves that corporate behavior is consistent with the law and the public interest.
> Of course a governmental investigation into corporate matters may be of such a sweeping nature and so unrelated to the matter properly under inquiry as to exceed the investigatory power. Federal Trade Comm'n v. American Tobacco Co., supra. But it is sufficient if the inquiry is within the authority of the agency, the demand is not too indefinite and the information sought is reasonably relevant.

Although research does not indicate a Sixth Circuit ruling in this particular area, other Federal courts have had occasion to construe these principles. Citing this line of cases, the Second Circuit in F.T.C. v. Standard American, Inc., 306 F. 2d 231 (2 Cir. 1962) stated at 234:

> The Courts have time and again held that the Commission may exercise its broad power of investigation and subpoena, prior to the filing of a complaint;

the Commission, as an administrative agency of the United States "charged with seeing" that the Act is enforced, "has a power of inquisition"; it is "more analogous to the Grand Jury, which does not depend on a case or controversy for power to get evidence but can investigate merely on suspicion that the law is being violated, or even just because it wants assurance that it is not"; it is sufficient if the investigation is within the Commission's authority and unless the evidence sought by the subpoenas is clearly irrelevant and immaterial it is the duty of the district court to order compliance; and subpoenaed documents may be retained by the Commission for a reasonable length of time. [Footnotes omitted]

The Eighth Circuit has formulated the requisites of a successful administrative investigatory subpoena duces tecum in this way:

> The investigatory authority of an administrative agency is not without limitations. There is general unanimity among the courts that a subpoena meets the requirements for enforcement if the inquiry is (1) within the authority of the agency; (2) the demand is not too indefinite and (3) the information sought is reasonably relevant. United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652, 653, 70 S. Ct. 357, 94 L. Ed. 401; Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, supra, 327 [370] U.S. 186, 208, 66 S. Ct. 494, 90 L. Ed. 614; Endicott Johnson Corp. v. Perkins, 317 U.S. 501, 509, 63 S. Ct. 339, 87 L. Ed. 492; Civil Aeronautics Board v. Hermann, 353 U.S. 322, 77 S. Ct. 804, 1 L. Ed. 2d 852. Adams v. F.T.C. 296 F. 2d 861, 867 (8 Cir. 1961).

Specifically in point with regard to respondent's arguments on jurisdiction is F.T.C. v. Gibson, 460 F. 2d 605 (5 Cir. 1972), wherein the Court at p. 608 held that:

> The rationale of the Oklahoma Press rule is that it allows enforcement of subpoenas where the evidence necessary to establish the interstate nature of the commerce involved is in the possession of the suspected violator and can be secured only by such a subpoena. Under this rule appellants may not litigate the jurisdictional issue as a defense in a subpoena enforcement proceeding.

Beyond these general guidelines, the courts have also evolved more concrete types of methodology with which to measure the adequacy of administrative subpoenas. At least one court has utilized a comparison of the specifications in the subpoena with the investigative resolution. See Moore Business Forms v. F.T.C., 113 U.S. App. D.C. 231, 307 F. 2d 188 (D.C. Cir. 1962). This same case shows that a guide to the relevancy of the subpoena can be found in the elements of the offenses that have been alleged by the Commission. Id.

[2, 3] What all this would appear to mean in terms of relevancy is that the specifications of the subpoena should bear a reasonable relationship to the kinds of information which are required in order to ascertain where respondents stand with respect to the allegations raised by the Commission. As mentioned, what the Commission has done here is to raise the possibility that respondents have violated 15 U.S.C. § 45 through activities which might be "unfair" and have the effect of "restraining or foreclosing competition." Broadly speaking, in order to substantiate such charges, it must be shown that under the circumstances of the case, concerted action in commerce has been taken, which either adversely affects free competition or is an incipient menace to it. See F.T.C. v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 68 S. Ct. 793, 92 L. Ed. 1010 (1948), F.T.C. v. Texaco, 393 U.S. 223, 89 S. Ct. 429, 21 L. Ed. 2d 394 (1968), LaPeyre v. F.T.C., 366 F. 2d 117 (5 Cir. 1966).

[4] Before we arrive at a final disposition of this subpoena, the wide sweep of its specifications requires that we take note of some aditional factors with respect to their potential burdensomeness. The first is the nature of respondents' arguments on this issue. We have reviewed carefully the oral argument and the memoranda that have been filed here and we find that beyond citing to us the specifications which respondents consider especially onerous, they do very little to inform the Court as to the exact nature and extent of the hardship which they would impose. We are thus left with a situation very similar to that which confronted the Second Circuit in S.E.C. v. Brigadoon Scotch Distributing Co., 480 F. 2d 1047 (2 Cir. 1973), where the Court found at p. 1056 that "appellants have been unable to show specifically how production of this information will result in harm to their business," and where the Court concluded that:

> Thus the mere suggestion by appellants of possible damage to their business activities is not sufficient to block an authorized inquiry into relevant matters. See Newmark & Co. v. Wirtz, 330 F. 2d 576, 578 (2d Cir. 1964).

Similarly, in F.T.C. v. Standard American, Inc., supra, the Third Circuit found that:

> It is settled that if appellants wanted the District Court to make "appropriate provisions for assuring the minimum interference with the conduct of [their] business,"[11] they should have met their burden of showing the unreasonableness of the Commission's demand[12] and should have "made a [871] record that would convince [the District Court] of the measure of their grievance rather than ask [it] to assume it."[13]

> 11. Civil Aeronautic Board v. Hermann, supra note 9, 353 U.S. at page 323, 77 S. Ct. at page 805.
> 12. Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, supra, note 7, 323 U.S. at pages 217–218, 66 S. Ct. at pages 509–510.
> 13. United States v. Morton Salt Co., supra, note 8, 338 U.S. at page 654, 70 S. Ct. at page 369.

Respondents should produce all information demanded with the exception of those matters conceded by petitioner. Attachment "A" of "Attachments to Memorandum in Opposition to Enforcement of Subpoena Duces Tecum" (pages 2–8). In short, respondents are to be assured of confidentiality, reasonableness in acceptance of copies of documents or summaries, shortened time periods (viz. such as using 1970 in place of 1968 in Specification No. 1) and the elimination of No. 10.

In sum, on this record, we simply cannot at this time be convinced that the production of the subpoenaed information will do serious harm to respondents' business.

This is especially so in light of the forthright offers by the Commission to adapt the subpoena's specifications to the record keeping format of respondents. This intent is conveyed both by the final specification of the subpoena,[3] and by the clear expressions of the Commission's counsel at oral argument.[4] We face circumstances similar to that confronted by the District Court in the Standard American case, supra. There, as here, the investigated party was unable to show that compliance would seriously harm his operations and the Commission showed a willingness to compromise on the mechanics of compliance.[5] In this situation, the District Court concluded at 195 F. Supp. 801, 803 and was affirmed by the Third Circuit in F.T.C. v. Standard American, supra that:

> We will accordingly enter an Order, but point out that if it is brought to the attention of the Court that any serious hindrance to respondents' business will be caused by adherence to the provisions of the Order, we will reconsider it as to those specific instances.

We feel it is incumbent that we here do likewise. Accordingly, based on respondents' inability to substantiate their claims of burdensomeness, the Commission's willingness to tailor the specifica[872]tions of the subpoena to respondents' particular situation, and our earlier findings with regard to relevancy,

It is ordered:

That respondents David R. Markin and Checker Motors Corporation produce the evidence requested in the Federal Trade Commission subpoena duces tecum issued March 19, 1973 [with the exception of information requested in specification 10 and other modifications set forth which the Court finds not to be relevant.]

[3] A verified statement as will show: (a) the method used for retrieval of information from books, records and other documents including, but not limited to the following areas: (1) taxicab operations, (2) taxicab maintenance, (3) taxicab fares and destinations, salaries, and all other phases of YCC's business.

[4] At the conclusion of the Commission's argument, counsel made the following statement: Finally, on the question of burdensomeness and over-broadness of the subpoena, the Commission again does not know what the respondent's records consist of. We don't know how—exactly how they are kept, how they are preserved, whether they are on automated computer tapes, whether they can be promptly reproduced, or what sort of problems are encountered in that preservation of their records. We have offered to meet with them, and in the letter in the record, as an attachment to the respondent's memorandum in opposition, Attachment A, the concluding paragraph is an offer to meet with the respondents and their attorneys, their accountants, and to examine the actual method in which they keep documents, with the hope toward narrowing the request. This offer was not accepted, The Commission is willing to meet with respondents and to, in the course of the investigation, to narrow the documents, but the Commission cannot narrow them in advance. They cannot give up the—its responsibilities to enforce the Act before it knows what it's doing before it's had access to the documents and can consider them and weigh them in the terms of its own responsibility.

[5] In the Standard American case, the Commission was willing to accept copies of the subpoenaed records so that the originals would not have to be sent to Washington. Here the Commission has shown considerably more flexibility. They not only will accept copies of the requested evidence, but their offer also raises the real possibility that the subpoena's scope can be modified and possibly narrowed by agreement of the parties themselves.

The parties will, prior to the production of evidence, pursuant to the Federal Trade Commission's offer, meet in a diligent and good faith effort to modify the subpoena's terms so as to make compliance with its specifications not unduly burdensome on respondents.

In the event that compliance with the subpoena's terms becomes patently vexatious and a serious hindrance to the pursuit of respondents' business, the parties may file the appropriate motions, fully supported by briefs, and the Court will reconsider those specifications thus put in issue.

It is so ordered.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. CONSOLIDATED FOODS CORP.*

Civ. A. No. 74 Civ. 3894. F.T.C. Docket No. C–2454.

(United States District Court, Southern District of New York, December 18, 1974)

On motion for summary judgment in civil penalties action, court held that an uncontested F.T.C. affidavit established that the agency had followed the statutorily imposed procedures, and its statement, that it was proceeding under Sec. 5(m) was sufficient under liberal standards of notice pleading and that defendant's contention that F.T.C.'s failure to enumerate the facts showing compliance with procedural steps did not make the complaint defective and deprive the court of jurisdiction; a consent order requiring filing of a report of compliance within 60 days was valid and could be enforced in civil penalties proceeding even though consent agreement did not specifically require a report at this time; the F.T.C. was not required to give respondent formal notice that it was in violation of a price discrimination consent order before the agency filed civil penalties suit.

Partial summary judgment granted.

Joseph J. Gercke, Asst. Director for Compliance, Bureau of Competition, Washington, D.C. (Salvatore F. Sangiorgi, Atty., F.T.C., New York, N.Y., of counsel), for plaintiff.

J. Wallace Adair and Ray S. Bolze, of Howrey, Simon, Baker & Murchison, Washington, D.C., George H. Colin, of Baer & Marks, New York, N.Y., for defendant.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Knapp, District Judge: In this action, brought pursuant to Sections 5(l), 5(m) and 16(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 45(l), 45(m) and 56(b), and Section 11(l) of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), the Federal Trade Commission is seeking civil penalties and equitable relief for Consolidated Foods Corporation's alleged failure to obey a final Commission Consent Order to cease and desist from discriminating in the pricing of its decorative fabric trimming and trimming accessories products. The case is now before us on plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on liability alone, Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 56, and defendant's cross motion to dismiss the complaint. Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 12(b). These motions raise the following questions:

(1) Where the Commission has in fact taken all procedural steps necessary to establish its right to bring a civil penalty action, does its failure to enumerate such steps in the complaint deprive this court of subject matter jurisdiction?

(2) Is a consent order rendered null and void by the fact that it contains a paragraph, not contained in the prior Consent Agreement, which requires the respondent to file a compliance report?

(3) In a civil penalty action under the antitrust laws, is it mandatory that the Federal Trade Commission give formal notice to the defendant[1] that it is in violation of its order prior to instituting the action?

(4) Assuming the validity of the consent order entered into between the parties, under what circumstances are the statutory defenses of cost justification and meeting competition available to defendant?

This action is one of the first to be brought by the Commission under its new statutory authority[2] to sue in its own right. Moreover, correspondence in the record between the Commission and the Attorney General indicates that the action was brought as a "test case" to define such new authority. A more extensive opinion than might otherwise be required therefore seems appropriate.

The action dates back to the Federal Trade Commission proceeding In the Matter of Consolidated Foods Corporation, FTC Docket No.

[1] Although the "defendant" here was "respondent" before the Commission, it will in the interest of clarity hereinafter be referred to as "defendant" regardless of the context.

[2] 15 U.S.C. § 45(m): "Whenever in any civil proceedings involving this Act the Commission is authorized or required to appear in a court of the United States, or to be represented therein by the Attorney General of the United States, the Commission may elect to appear in its own name by any of its attorneys designated by it for such purpose, after formally notifying and consulting with and giving the Attorney General 10 days to take the action proposed by the Commission."

15 U.S.C. § 56: "Whenever the Federal Trade Commission has reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is liable to a penalty under section 14 or under subsection (l) of section 5 of this act, it shall—

"(a) certify the facts to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause appropriate proceedings to be brought for the enforcement of the provisions of such section or subsection; or

"(b) after compliance with the requirements of Section 5(m), itself cause such appropriate proceedings to be brought."

C–2454. On or before January 26, 1972, the Commission notified defendant of the commencement of an investigation to determine whether Consolidated's Conso Products Company Division had discriminated in price between its competing direct-buying retail purchasers in the distribution and sale of Conso's drapery trimmings products, in violation of subsection 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a). Subsequently, at defendant's request, Commission staff counsel conferred with defendant's counsel to discuss a draft administrative complaint and the possibility of terminating the proceeding by consent order. These negotiations resulted in a consent agreement, executed on June 1, 1973, in which the parties stipulated that the Commission would issue, without findings, an order requiring defendant to abandon the discriminatory pricing practices which were the focus of the Commission's investigation.

The agreement contained various important provisions, among which was, in paragraph three, a waiver by defendant of:

> (a) Any further procedural steps;
>
> (b) The requirement that the Commission's decision contain a statement of findings of fact and conclusions of law; and
> (c) All rights to seek judicial review or otherwise to challenge or contest the validity of the order entered pursuant to this agreement.

In paragraph six, the agreement provided that, following entry of the order by the Commission,

> . . . the order to cease and desist shall have the same force and effect and shall become final and may be altered, modified, or set aside in the manner and within the same time provided by statute for other orders. The complaint may be used in construing the terms of the order.

Finally, in paragraph 8 of the agreement, the parties recognized defendant's duty to file compliance reports:

> Officers of proposed respondent have read the proposed complaint and order contemplated hereby, and they understand that once the order has been issued, they will be required to file one or more compliance reports showing that they have fully complied with the order, and that they may be liable for a civil penalty of up to $5,000 for each violation of the order after it becomes final.

The consent agreement with proposed order and the administrative complaint were placed on the public record for 30 days until August 25, 1973, as required by the agreement. On September 12, 1973, the Commission formally issued its complaint and decision and order to cease and desist, which were subsequently served on defendant on September 26, 1973. Defendant was directed thereafter to cease and desist from

> Discriminating, directly or indirectly, in the price of [decorative fabric trimmings and trimming accessories] products of like grade and quality by selling to any purchaser at net prices higher than the net prices charged to any other purchaser competing in fact in the resale or distribution of such products.

The order contained one additional paragraph, not included in the prior consent agreement, which required the defendant to file a compliance report within sixty days of service of the order.

By letter dated October 24, 1973, the Commission's compliance staff suggested an outline for defendant's first compliance report, due November 26, 1973. Defendant responded to this letter on October 30, 1973, by requesting a 30-day extension of time within which to submit its first compliance report. The Commission, by letter of November 6, granted defendant the 30-day extension, but asserted that such extension did not suspend or relieve defendant from its obligation to comply with the substantive portions of the order by November 26, the day on which it became final under §§ 11(c) and 11(g) of the Clayton Act as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(c) and 21(g). On December 20, defendant requested another extension of time for filing its compliance report, which was immediately granted by the Commission.

Defendant finally submitted its compliance report on January 3, 1974. The Commission, by letter dated January 17, 1974, requested an explanation as to why defendant had not discontinued use of its prior pricing and discount plan. Defendant replied in a supplemental report dated January 23, 1974 that its discount structure had not been discontinued because of its poor financial condition, the necessity of meeting competition, and the difficulty it had encountered in implementing a new and prospective computerized cost-justified pricing system.

On February 14, the Commission notified defendant of its failure "to clearly and unequivocally disclose or represent that (it) had discontinued use of the pricing program, or significant elements thereof as utilized by Consolidated before the date of finality of the order in question." The Commission again reminded defendant that Section 3.61(d) of the Federal Trade Commission's Rules of Practice provides that a respondent ". . . must in any event, be in full compliance on and after the date the order becomes final . . . ." The Commission then explicitly rejected the compliance report, found the proposed cost justification program inconsistent with the consent order, and reserved and reaffirmed "its right to seek civil penalties or otherwise enforce the provisions of this order for any past, present or continuing violation thereof."

Thereafter, having duly notified the Attorney General, the Commission instituted this suit for civil penalties, alleging that defendant's failure to discontinue its pricing system discount structure violated the consent order. The Commission seeks penalties from the date the order became final, November 26, 1973, to at least March 1, 1974, when the defendant informed the Commission that it had implemented a new discount schedule. In its motion for summary judgment, it claims that there is no material issue of fact since, as the Commission asserts, defendant has admitted in its compliance report of January 3, 1974 to the continuation of its prohibited pricing system.

Defendant urges three grounds in support of its motion to dismiss:

(1) The Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction since the Commission did not allege facts in its complaint sufficient to show compliance with the specific procedural steps outlined in 15 U.S.C. § 45(m) (1973);

(2) The complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted because the Consent Order as issued was not in fact, consented to and is therefore null and void; and

(3) The complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted because the Commission failed to notify defendant that it was in default of the consent order, prior to instituting this action.

Jurisdiction

The crux of defendant's argument for dismissal for lack of jurisdiction is that although the complaint asserts the statutory authority under which the present action was brought, it fails to enumerate the procedural steps the Commission followed pursuant to these statutes. The Commission was given this authority so as to ensure prompt enforcement of the laws within its jurisdiction. Under the statute, the Commission may itself sue to directly enforce its orders, "after formally notifying and consulting with and giving the Attorney General 10 days to take the action proposed by the Commission". P.L. 93–153, 93rd Cong., 1st Sess., (1973), Cong. & Admin. News, 1973, p. 656.

The affidavit of Ronald B. Rowe, attorney for the Federal Trade Commission, establishes that the Commission properly followed the statutorily required procedural steps. Defendant concedes this. Nevertheless, the complaint does not enumerate the facts evidencing compliance with these procedural requirements. Defendant cites United States v. St. Regis Paper Company [1966 TRADE CASES ¶ 71,662], (2d Cir. 1966) 355 F. 2d 688, as authority for its contention that a failure to plead jurisdictional facts deprives the court of jurisdiction. The St. Regis case is clearly distinguishable. There, the Commission had not, as required by 15 U.S.C. § 56, certified the case to the Attorney General. Since the Commission had failed to follow the statutory mandate, which the court concluded was jurisdictional the Attorney General had no authority to institute suit. The case did not, as does ours, involve any question of the sufficiency of the pleadings.

The present liberal rules of pleading embodied in Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, were promulgated to provide flexibility and to serve as "a means to accomplish the end of a just judgment." Maty v. Grasselli Chemical Co. (1938) 303 U.S. 197, 200–201. They are intended to provide a minimum standard according to which plaintiff must give defendant fair notice of plaintiff's claim. Conley v. Gibson (1957) 355 U.S. 41, 47–8. Rule 8 requires only that a pleading contain "a short and plain statement of the grounds upon which the court's jurisdiction depends . . . and of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." These minimal requirements have been characterized as "notice" pleading. 2A Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 8.03. Under notice pleading, courts have consistently held that it is no longer necessary to state "facts" as long as fair notice of the claim is given to the opposing party. Nagler v. Admiral Corp. [1957 TRADE CASES ¶ 68,839], (2d Cir. 1957) 248 F. 2d 319; Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union v. Delta Refining Co. (6th Cir. 1960) 277 F. 2d 694; Louisiana Farmers' Protective Union, Inc. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. of America, Inc. [1940–1943 TRADE CASES ¶ 56,239], (8th Cir. 1942) 131 F. 2d 419. This liberal reading of the notice requirement has largely resulted from the expansive pretrial devices for discovery. 2A Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 8.13.

The complaint clearly meets the liberal standards of notice pleading, since it states the statutory authority under which the present action is brought. Furthermore, the pleading of jurisdiction in this manner conforms with the form recognized as correct when the federal government or one of its agencies is suing. 2A Moore's Federal Practice ¶ 8.07[2], n. 2. Defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground of insufficient jurisdictional pleading must, accordingly, be denied.[3]

Validity of the Consent Order

Defendant asserts that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted since the consent order upon which the suit is based is not the same as the proposed order agreed to by defendant. Specifically, it contains an additional paragraph, not contained in the consent agreement, requiring the submission of a compliance report within sixty days of service of the order. For the reasons set forth below, defendant's motion to dismiss on this ground must also be denied.

Defendant relies primarily upon Swift & Co. v. United States (1928) 276 U.S. 311, 323–4 and United States v. Armour & Co. [1971

[3] Even if defendant's argument were valid, the remedy of dismissal would be too drastic, since one of the motivating forces behind the Federal Rules was to prevent dismissal for technical defects. Wright and Miller, Federal Practice and Civil Procedure, § 1343. Dismissal is especially inappropriate in light of the provision in 28 U.S.C. § 1653 allowing amendment of technical jurisdictional defects at the trial or appellate level. Moreover, at oral argument, the Commission submitted—and the court accepted—an amendment complaint in compliance with defendant's request, which specifically enumerates the procedural steps taken prior to instituting the present action.

TRADE CASES ¶ 73,589], (1971) 402 U.S. 673, 681, as authority for the proposition that a consent decree or order issued by a federal agency is a nullity and will be set aside if it was entered into without actual consent to each and every element therein. That is a valid general principle. However, it was not here violated, and, if it had been, defendant would not now have standing to complain of the violation.

In the first place, the supposedly offending paragraph added nothing to the obligations to which defendant had agreed in the negotiations leading up to the consent order. If the order had been wholly silent on the question of reporting, the defendant would nevertheless have been obligated to file a compliance report within sixty days under § 3.61 of the Commission's Rules and Regulations.[4] Moreover, the original consent agreement specifically mentioned the pertinent provisions of the Rules and called defendant's attention to the penalties that would flow from any failure to comply.

In the second place, if defendant believed the consent order invalid because of any variance from the consent agreement, its remedy was not to disobey the order, but—within the statutory 60 days—to seek reexamination of the order by the Commission [5] and if there unsuccessful, petition for review to an appropriate Court of Appeals.[6] Defendant took no such action. Instead, nearly one month before the order became final, it requested an extension of time in which to file its compliance report, thereby in essence acknowledging the validity of the order's compliance provision.

Notice

The defendant urges as a final ground for dismissal of the complaint that the Commission, prior to instituting the present action, failed to give it formal notice that it was in violation of the order. The sole basis for the defendant's assertion that such formal notice is required prior to suit is dictum contained in Continental Baking Co. v. Dixon [1968 TRADE CASES ¶ 72,394], (D. Del. 1968) 283 F. Supp. 285. The court there stated (at 287–288):

> . . . the Commission has the obligation to determine and to inform parties whether and to what extent their conduct may be in violation of a cease and desist order. It is only after the Commission has made such a finding that the penalties contemplated 15 U.S.C. § 45(1) could be assessed. . . .

---

[4] "(A) In every proceeding in which the Commission has issued an order, pursuant to the provisions of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, or section 11 of the Clayton Act, as amended, and except as otherwise specifically provided in any such order, each respondent named in such order shall file with the Commission, within sixty (60) days after service thereof, or within such other time as may be provided by the order or the rules of this chapter, a report in writing . . . setting forth in detail the manner and form of his compliance . . . ."

In no civil penalty suit since Continental in which the "notice" issue was raised has it been accepted as a valid defense. In fact, in every such instance it has been flatly rejected. See, for example, United States v. J. B. Williams Company, Inc. [1974–1 TRADE CASES ¶ 75,041], (2d Cir. 1974) 498 F. 2d 414, 434–435, United States v. Beatrice Foods Co. [1974–1 TRADE CASES ¶ 74,948], (8th Cir. 1974) 493 F. 2d 1259–6, cert. pending on other grounds, United States v. Swingline, Inc. [1974–1 TRADE CASES ¶ 74,892], (E.D. N.Y. 1974) 371 F. Supp. 37, 45. The respective courts in each of these cases considered in detail the legislative history of the penalty provisions and unanimously concluded that, especially in light of the manifest purpose behind these provisions to "streamline enforcement proceedings under the Clayton Act", U.S. v. Beatrice Foods Co., supra, 493 F. 2d at 1266, "such notice is neither required by the statutory scheme nor by the Commission's rules and procedures." Id., at 1265 (quoting U.S. v. J. B. Williams Co., Inc. [1973–1 TRADE CASES ¶ 74,330], 354 F. Supp. 521, 532). This is in accord with the public statement by the Commission that "the obligation of firms to comply arises, and liability for penalties may be incurred, on the effective date of the orders." 33 F.R. 19097 (1968).

Even assuming, arguendo, the validity of defendant's contention, a review of the facts of this case discloses that sufficient notice was given by the Commission of its intention to hold the defendant in contempt of the order. In a letter dated February 14, 1974, the Commission informed defendant that,

> We reject your report of compliance because you have failed to establish that you discontinued the pricing practices proscribed by the order . . . .
> . . . The Commission expressly reserves its right to seek civil penalties or otherwise enforce the provisions of this order for any past, present or continuing violation thereof.

This letter, written nearly three months after the order became final and after the Commission had already rejected two purported compliance reports, would seem to fulfill even the extraordinary [7] notice requirements outlined in Continental Baking Co., supra.

Since the argument concerning notice has no basis in law or fact, the defendant's motion to dismiss on that ground must be denied.

Liability

Having concluded that a valid and binding consent order was issued, it now becomes necessary, on plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment, to determine whether the record conclusively establishes that the defendant violated such order. The Commission contends that defendant's conceded failure—until March 1, 1974—to discontinue the discount pricing system which had triggered its original investigation violated the order. Civil penalties are sought from November 26, 1973—the date the order became final—to "at least" March 1, 1974—the date the defendant finally implemented a new discount schedule.

[7] Judge Tyler of this District has characterized the dictum in Continental here relied upon by the defendant as an "apparent misconception of the entire statutory framework", adding, "I can only assume that [the judge in Continental] was thinking of something different when he wrote that sentence . . . ." United States v. Ancorp National Services, Inc. (S.D.N.Y. 1971) (unreported).

The order, insofar as here relevant, directed the defendant to cease and desist from > Discriminating, directly or indirectly, in the price of [its] products of like grade and quality by selling to any purchaser at net prices higher than the net prices charged to any other purchaser competing in fact in the resale or distribution of such products.

In response to the Commission's charge of non-compliance, the defendant asserts that all of its sales subject to the order on or after November 26, 1973 have been at a uniform price to all competing purchasers "except where it was necessary to lower a price in order to meet competition".[8] (Defendant's memorandum, p. 4.) The essence of defendant's position is that the continuation of its price discounts to certain customers was justified by the statutory defense of meeting competition.[9] In support of its contention, defendant has submitted several affidavits which purport to describe in detail the competitive situation with which it was faced after November 26, 1973.

Defendant cites Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co. [1952 TRADE CASES ¶ 67,279], (1952) 343 U.S. 470 for the proposition that although the instant order does not specifically refer to this statutory defense, such a defense is nonetheless implicit in its terms and is as viable as if set forth in full. There can be no doubt that Ruberoid conclusively establishes such a proposition. However that is not the end—but rather the beginning—of our inquiry.

Whether a defense of meeting competition is available in a given situation is a mixed question of law and fact. In this particular case the availability of that defense in the situation confronting the defendant up to and including November 26, 1973—the date of the order—could have been litigated before the Commission—subject to review by a Court of Appeals. However the defendant elected not to litigate, but to consent to an order which conclusively established that no such defense was then available. Our sole concern, therefore, is whether the affidavits before us arguably support a contention that there has been a change of circumstances since November 26, 1973, which would give rise to a defense which did not exist before then. In Ruberoid, the Court observed (at 476):

[8] The defendant's memorandum also speaks of the defense of "cost justification". However, nothing in defendant's affidavits addressed itself to that defense, so it will not again be mentioned in this opinion.

> If questions of justification, claimed upon the basis of facts relating to costs or meeting competition, have once been finally decided against the seller, it cannot again interpose the same defense upon substantially similar facts when the Commission seeks to show that its order has been violated.

and further (at 477):

> The same result follows where the evidence supporting the defense, although not produced in the previous proceedings, was then available to the seller. In short, the seller, in contesting enforcement or contempt proceedings, may plead only those facts constituting statutory justification which it has not had a previous opportunity to present.

For the reasons that follow, we conclude that the affidavits before us do not suggest the existence of a new post-order defense but rather rely wholly upon evidence which was "available" to the defendant at the time it consented to the order, and that accordingly the requirements set forth in the quoted portion of the Ruberoid opinion have not been met.

To begin with, the defendant's initial compliance report, dated January 3, 1974, contains the explicit—and highly damaging—admission that while the statutory defenses were available to it during the negotiations preceding the consent order, it failed to assert them because to do so would have been too costly:

> Although respondent contends that any such deviations [from its published list prices] were fully justified under subsections 2(a) and (b) of the amended Clayton Act, to avoid lengthy and burdensome litigation, respondent elected in 1973 to enter into an Agreement containing a Consent Order to Cease and Desist with the Commission . . . (Exhibit L to plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, at p. 7) (emphasis supplied).

Moreover, in its January 23, 1974 compliance report to the Commission—attached to plaintiff's motion for summary judgment as Exhibit N—the defendant specifically stated:

> . . . if we had not continued the discount to customers who had been afforded a discount price over the past several months, they would have switched to competition . . . . Under the circumstances, Conso Products had no alternative but to continue to rely upon its meeting competition defenses (Exhibit N, at p. 2) (emphasis supplied).

This very language was repeated verbatim in the affidavit submitted by David E. Tittle, the President of Conso Products Division of Consolidated Foods Corporation, as evidence to support his conclusion that had the defendant switched to a uniformly low pricing system as required by the order it would have incurred "substantial loss[es]." Tittle Affidavit, ¶ 17.

The defendant's affidavits continually advert to the circumstance that competitive conditions before the order were substantially similar to those existing thereafter. The phrase "vigorous price competition" is used repeatedly to characterize the competitive situation both before and after November 26, 1973—the date the order became final. For example, paragraph 3 of the Tittle Affidavit reads, insofar as here relevant:

> Conso is engaged in the manufacture and sale of decorative fabric trimmings and trimming accessories. In the period both prior to November 26, 1973 and subsequent thereto up to the present, Conso has experienced vigorous price competition from other manufacturers and sellers of these product lines. (emphasis supplied.)

See also paragraph 2 of Robert B. Schwartz Affidavit. Indeed, the only change in the above-described competitive situation to which these affidavits refer is the entry of the consent order itself. According to the deponents.

> Competition in the manufacture and sale of decorative and fashion trimmings and accessories has accelerated rapidly since November 1973 when competitors became aware of the Federal Trade Commission Order against Conso. This has caused increasing demands from customers that Conso meet new competitive prices or lose sales and the situation cited above of our need to meet competition since November 26, 1973 or lose sales is a direct outgrowth of this new competitive situation since November 1973." (emphasis supplied) Tittle Affid., ¶ 13. See also Schwartz Affid., ¶ 12.

This contention presents the question whether the Supreme Court in speaking of "a new competitive situation involving different circumstances", intended to include the entry of a cease and desist order itself as such a "new" and "different" circumstance. Such a conclusion would by hypothesis render a nullity every FTC order whether obtained upon consent or after extensive litigation. We cannot, therefore, attribute such a meaning to the Court's opinion.

Legal arguments aside, the emotional thrust of the defendant's papers is that it would be impossible for it to do profitable business under the terms of the order. Conceding that it could keep those customers who were already receiving discounts by uniformly reducing its prices to all its customers, defendant urges that such a course would be financially ruinous. However, those are precisely the contentions that the defendant should have urged before the Commission—either in argument to its staff or in formal litigation—before permitting any order to have been entered. Defendant, having neglected to urge such considerations when it had an opportunity to do so, and having consented to the entry of this particular order, may not now rely upon them as grounds for defying that order. Financial difficulty, even where "ruinous", is not a defense to an FTC penalty action, but is relevant, if at all, to the assessment of penalties. United States v. Beatrice Foods Co. [1972 Trade Cases ¶ 74,057], (D. Minn. 1972) 344 F. Supp. 104, 116, aff'd [1974–1 Trade Cases ¶ 74,948], (8th Cir. 1974) 493 F. 2d 1259, cert. pending, 43 U.S.L.W. 3008.

We are left, therefore, with the inescapable factual conclusion that defendant failed to discontinue the discriminatory pricing practices proscribed by the order. Having determined that it failed to suggest a genuine issue of fact with respect to the claimed statutory defense, we find the defendant to have been in violation of the order between November 26, 1973 and March 1, 1974. Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment is, accordingly, granted.

In view of the circumstances that the Commission is treating this as a test case, we will entertain an application for certification pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), if either party wishes to apply upon due notice to the other.

So Ordered.

JOHN BODNER AND SHELL OIL CO. v. F.T.C., ET AL.*

Civ. A. No. 74-1189. F.T.C. File No. 99-187.

(United States District Court, District of Columbia, January 9, 1975)

On motion for dismissal or summary judgment under a Freedom of Information Act request, court held that the index as submitted by the Commission did not contain a sufficiently detailed description of the documents sought nor sufficient claims for their exemption. For plaintiffs to be in a better position to argue against asserted exemptions, the Government is under an obligation to make the factual description of the documents as detailed as possible without discussing the exempted material.

William Simon, Washington, D.C., for plaintiffs.

Michael J. Ryan, Washington, D.C., for defendants.

Before FLANNERY, District Judge.

ORDER

Presently before the court is defendants' motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment, and plaintiffs' opposition thereto. This action concerns efforts to obtain disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552, of three memoranda. Under Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D. C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 94 S. Ct. 1564 (1974), and subsequent cases in this Circuit, defendants have submitted an index concerning the three memoranda in question. After careful consideration of the index, of the documents in camera, and the parties' memoranda, the court concludes that the index which has been submitted is insufficient and that defendants must submit a new one.

In Vaughn v. Rosen, supra, and Cuneo v. Schlesinger, 484 F.2d 1086 (D. C. Cir. 1973), the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit stressed the necessity for the Government to index carefully documents which are alleged to fall within one of the exemptions of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). Such an index is necessary where there is a factual dispute as to the nature of the documents in question. Vaughn v. Rosen, supra at 824. The index serves at least three functions, two of which are particularly relevant in the instant case. First, the index assists the trial court in its review of often voluminous documents. In this case there are only three documents of moderate length and thus the burden on the court is minimal. Second, by setting forth a detailed description of the documents and detailed justification for withholding them, the plaintiffs are put in a better position to argue against the claimed exemption. Finally, the index assists the appellate court in review of any district court decision. The Court of Appeals recently has reaffirmed the necessity for the Government to provide a "detailed justification" for withholding documents. See Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. The Renegotiation Bd., No. 73-2093 (D. C. Cir. Oct. 8, 1974). Repeatedly the Court of Appeals has warned against conclusory and generalized allegations of exemptions. See id. at 4; Cuneo v. Schlesinger, supra at 1092; Vaughn v. Rosen, supra at 826. While this court does not doubt the Government's good faith and efforts in preparation of the present index, it finds after a review of the documents that the index could contain considerably greater detail.

* Not reported in Federal Reporter. Reported Trade Reg. Rep. ¶60,118 at 65,268 (1975-1 Trade Cases). See also pp. 1122 and 1227 herein.

As to document A(1), the "undated draft memorandum," the court notes several deficiencies. First, while the document is undated, from its context the agency easily could estimate the date of preparation. Second, while the agency has revealed one handwritten notation, "not used by CG," it has not revealed other handwritten notations indicating other persons who saw or used the document. These other notations also will assist in dating the document. Finally, the Government has failed to indicate who authored the document or who may have received copies of it.

As to documents A(2) and A(3) the Government has failed to provide a sufficiently detailed breakdown of the documents themselves. Concerning document A(2) the Government has described in considerable detail the appendices but has failed to break down the parts of the staff report itself. A similar detailed breakdown can be made of document A(3) without revealing any possible exempt material. The Government should provide descriptions of each part of these documents and, if a particular part falls within the request made by plaintiffs, should describe why disclosure of that part would constitute an unwarranted invasion of the deliberative or policy making processes of government.

The deficiencies in the index that have been noted above are not intended to be exclusive but rather to be examples. The Government is under an obligation to make the factual description of the documents as detailed as possible without actually revealing exempted material. In this effort the Government should describe the documents themselves, their various parts, the uses made of the documents, the people to whom the documents were transmitted, and a detailed explanation concerning why disclosure of particular documents or parts thereof would violate the FOIA. E.g. Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. The Renegotiation Bd., supra at 4-5. It is insufficient for the Government to say merely that a "document reflects only the legal reasoning and deliberative process of the Commission's counsel." See Index, document A(1). This is the sort of conclusory statement which the courts repeatedly have warned against. The burden is upon the Government to provide a detailed justification for each claim of exemption. See 5 U.S.C. § 522(a)(3). See also Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. The Renegotiation Bd., supra at 4-5. Should the Government fail to supply a detailed index, the court will be forced to reopen discovery or to declare that the Government has failed in its burden to sustain its action.

The Government will have one week from the date of this Order to submit a new index. Thereafter, plaintiffs may file supplemental memoranda within a week incorporating in their argument any of the new data supplied by the Government's submission. Accordingly, it is this 9th day of January, 1975.

Ordered that defendants submit a new index of documents on or before January 17th, 1975; and it is further Ordered that plaintiffs may submit supplemental memoranda concerning this new index on or before January 24, 1975.

Civ. A. No. 74 Civ. 3094 F.T.C. Docket No. C—2454

(United States District Court, Southern District of New York, January 24, 1975)

On motion for certification for interlocutory appeal, court held that even though previous decision giving F.T.C. partial summary judgment in civil penalties suit raised controlling questions having ground for differences of opinion, certification would not materially advance the ultimate termination of litigation, but would in fact unnecessarily burden the appellate court.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Defendant has moved, in accordance with the suggestion made at the conclusion of the court's December 16, 1974 Memorandum and Order, for certification to the Court of Appeals—pursuant to 28 U. S. C. § 1292(b)—of the issues raised by plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment. After conducting a hearing on defendant's application and reviewing defendant's memorandum submitted in support, it became quite clear to me that, although the December 16, 1974 Order "involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion", certification would not "materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation." 28 U. S. C. § 1ears that an interlocutory appeal at this time would not save any significant amount of time or expense, and would in fact unnecessarily burden the Court of Appeals. On the one hand, affirmance of my Order would leave open many as yet unresolved questions concerning the necessity of a hearing on the matter of statutory penalties, the amount—if any—of such penalties to be assessed, and the availability to defendant of various defenses in mitigation. Reversal of my Order, on the other hand, would leave the Court of Appeals without the benefit of any rulings on these questions, thus necessitating an additional hearing before that Court should there be an appeal from my eventual final Order.

Defendant's motion for certification is, accordingly, denied.

CORNING GLASS WORKS v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION*

No. 73-1723. F.T.C. Docket No. 8874.

(United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, January 29, 1975)

1. STATE LAW GOVERNS MCGUIRE ACT CUSTOMER RESALE PRICE RESTRICTION CLAUSE EXEMPTION.

McGuire Act's exemption of customer resale price restriction clause in wholesaler contract depends on law of state in which resale of product by wholesaler to retailer takes place.

2. PROPOSED FORM OF ORDER ACCOMPANYING COMPLAINT GAVE RESPONDENT AMPLE OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD ON PROPRIETY OF ORDER.

Where complaint of Federal Trade Commission was accompanied by proposed order which Commission felt should issue if facts were found to be as alleged in complaint, motion for summary decision filed by complaint counsel some eight months after issuance of complaint sought that proposed order be entered against respondent, and respondent did not attack proposed order even though complaint counsel's motion sought complete disposition of case, respondent was given ample opportunity to be heard on propriety of order.

3. TO INSURE EFFECTIVE TERMINATION OF ANY VIOLATION, F.T.C. MUST BE ACCORDED BROAD DISCRETION IN FRAMING ITS ORDERS.

Federal Trade Commission must be accorded broad discretion in framing its orders to insure effective termination of any violation.

4. WITH FINDING OF ILLEGALITY OF AGREEMENT, F.T.C. WAS NOT "UNNECESSARILY PUNITIVE" IN ITS CORRECTIVE ACTIONS.

Where agreement between manufacturer of products used in food preparation and service and its wholesalers obligating latter not to sell to any reseller unless such reseller had agreed with manufacturer to maintain its fair trade prices was found illegal wherever it was not sanctioned by law of state in which resale of product by wholesaler to retailer took place, Commission's order implementing finding was not "unnecessarily punitive" in requiring that manufacturer mail copy of order to all retailers in nonsigner fair trade states, that it "encourage" its signer-only state retailers to ig[294]nore its fair trade prices, and that it refrain for three years from use of pre-price product containers and use of fair trade prices in advertisements in areas where manufacturer might not lawfully control resale prices.

5. F.T.C.'S STATUS AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY WITH QUASI-JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS IS IN NO WAY QUALIFIED BY FACT THAT F.T.C. EXPRESSES CONSUMER POINT OF VIEW IN CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS INTO ANTITRUST AMENDMENTS OR EXEMPTIONS.

It is proper for Federal Trade Commission to express consumer point of view when antitrust amendments or exemptions are being considered by Congress, and its performance of that public service in no way qualifies its status as independent agency entitled to respect in discharge of its quasi-judicial functions.

6. COMPLAINT COUNSEL VIEWS MAY NOT BE USED AS BASIS FOR QUESTIONING COMMISSION MEMBERS' INDEPENDENCE.

Views of complaint counsel as reported in preface may not be used as basis for questioning independence of members of Federal Trade Commission.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 509 F.2d 293)

On petition for review of F.T.C. cease and desist order, court held that the McGuire Act exemption of a customer restriction clause in a wholesale contract depends on the law of the state in which the resale of the product by the wholesaler to the retailer takes place.

Order affirmed and enforced.

[295] The Sherman Act condemns vertical as well as horizontal, agreements in restraint of trade. However, by virtue of § 2 of the McGuire Act, two types of vertical agreements—those requiring a vendee to resell at prices fixed by his vendor, and those requiring the vendee to require his customers to resell only at fixed prices—are exempt from the antitrust laws if such agreements are lawful under applicable state law.[1] The question presented by this case is whether the state law which governs the legality of the latter type of agreement between a vendor and a vendee is that of the state where the vendee is located or that of the state or states where the vendee's customers are located. We have no doubt that the vendee's location is determinative for the latter, as well as the former, type of agreement.

I.

Corning Glass Works manufactures and distributes various trademarked products used in food preparation and service.[2] Corning sells to wholesalers located in 45 states and the District of Columbia; those wholesalers, in turn, sell to retailers who resell to consumers in all 50 states and the District.

Corning's form contract with its distributors contains a fair trade agreement obligating the wholesalers (a) to sell only at prices set by Corning, and (b) not to sell to any reseller unless such reseller has agreed with Corning to maintain Corning's fair trade prices.[3] These [295] agreements are only effective "as to each state and as to such sales where it is lawful so to agree." Since the legal effect of fair trade agreements varies from state to state, the Corning form contract has a varying impact on its wholesalers.

There are currently 14 states and Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia in which fair trade agreements are illegal as a matter of state, as well as federal law; they are described as "free trade" states.[4] The remaining 36 "fair trade" states comprise two principal types. In

There is no question that, absent such a statutory exemption, both types of vertical agreements violate § 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1) and § 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1)). See Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 341 U.S. 384, 386, 71 S.Ct. 745, 95 L.Ed. 1035; Federal Trade Commission v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U.S. 441, 453-455, 42 S.Ct. 150, 66 L.Ed. 307; United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 377-378, 87 S.Ct. 1856, 18 L.Ed.2d 1249; United States v. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., 321 U.S. 707, 721, 64 S.Ct. 805, 88 L.Ed. 1024.

[2] The products are known as "Corning Ware," "Pyrex," and "Corelle." The Commission does not question the fact that these products are trademarked and are "in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class" within the meaning of 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(2).

[3] The relevant provisions in Corning's wholesale contracts are as follows: "6. FAIR TRADE AGREEMENT—As to each state and as to such sales where it is lawful so to agree (but not elsewhere or otherwise). (a) Distributor agrees that it will not (except as specifically permitted by statute) directly or indirectly advertise, offer for sale or sell any PYREX ware or CORNING WARE products at prices less than the fair trade prices now or hereafter designated and set forth in Schedule A less discounts listed in Schedule B applicable to the products sold. . . . (b) Distributor agrees that it will not sell or transfer PYREX ware or CORNING WARE products to any reseller unless such reseller has agreed with Corning to maintain Corning's fair trade prices." "7. APPLICABLE LAW—This agreement, entered between Corning and Distributor at Corning, New York, is governed by the laws of the State of New York. The agreements contained in the Fair Trade Agreement set out in paragraph 6 hereof shall apply solely to sales, offers or advertisements only when and where agreements of the character of those therein contained shall be lawful as applied to intrastate transactions under any statute, law or public policy, now or hereafter in effect, in the state in which such resale is to be made or to which products are to be transported for such resale. In other states the prices referred to in paragraph 6 hereof are merely suggested as possible resale prices which may or may not be adopted for resale in those states in the sole discretion of the Distributor."

each of the "non-signer" states the legislature has authorized judicial enforcement of fair trade prices even against sellers who have not signed a fair trade contract and has permitted the use of customer restriction clauses; there are currently 14 such "non-signer" states.[5] In the "signer-only" states—of [296] which there are currently 22—either the courts have refused, usually on state constitutional grounds,[6] to enforce the statutory remedy against non-signers, or, in some instances, no remedy against non-signers has been provided by the state legislature. In either event, in such a state a fair trade agreement is lawful although it is enforceable against the "signer only." With the exception of Maine, each of these "signer-only" states also authorizes the use of customer restriction clauses.[7]

The problem presented by this case has assumed significance as the number of "free trade" and "signer-only" states has increased. For it principally involves the validity of Corning's customer restriction clause as applied to wholesalers in free trade states who sell to retailers in signer-only states. Does § 2 of the McGuire Act legalize Corning's attempt to require those wholesalers to refuse to sell to retailers in fair trade states who have not agreed to maintain Corning's fair trade prices?

In Count II of its five-count complaint against Corning,[8] the Commission took the position that this requirement is a non-exempt restraint of trade forbidden by § 1 of the Sherman Act, and therefore unlawful under § 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Based on a stipulated record, the Administrative Law Judge dismissed all counts of the complaint, but on appeal the Commission unanimously reversed as to Count II and issued its cease and desist order.[9] The case is here on Corning's petition for review, claiming that the Commission misconstrued the McGuire Act and that, in all events, the Commission's order was "unnecessarily punitive." We find no merit in Corning's position.

II.

[297] [1] The decision of this case depends upon the proper construction of the words "such resale" as used in the so-called "when lawful" clause in paragraph (2) of § 2 of the McGuire Act. Before

A typical signer-only state fair trade act is that of Arkansas:

"No contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trademark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which commodity is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others shall be deemed in violation of any law of the State of Arkansas by reason of any of the following provisions which may be contained in such contract:

(a) That the buyer will not resell such commodity at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(b) That the buyer will require of any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity an agreement that he will not, in turn, resell at less than the minimum price stipulated by the seller.

(c) That the seller will not sell such commodity:

(1) To any wholesaler, unless such wholesaler will agree not to resell the same to any retailer unless the retailer will in turn agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price, and such wholesaler will likewise agree not to resell the same to any other wholesaler unless such other wholesaler will make the same agreement with any wholesaler or retailer to whom he may resell; or

(2) To any retailer, unless the retailer will agree not to resell the same except to consumers for use and at not less than the stipulated minimum price." Acts 1937, No. 92, § 2, p. 345; Arkansas Stat.1947, 1957 Replacement, Title 70, ch. 2 § 70-202.

[8] Count I charged Corning with using its fair trade contracts to fix free trade state wholesaler minimum resale prices whenever these wholesalers sell to a fair trade state retailer. Count III alleged that Corning has required wholesalers in signer-only fair trade states to refuse to sell to retailers who fail to sign fair trade contracts with Corning. Count IV alleged that Corning worded its fair trade contracts so as to obfuscate the circumstances in which price and customer restrictions are applicable. Count V charged Corning with establishing an illegal quantity discount schedule.

[9] The parties had stipulated that relief could also be granted on Counts I and IV if the violation alleged in Count II were found.

quoting the relevant language, it is appropriate to note that the "when lawful" clause was originally enacted as part of the antitrust exemption contained in the Miller-Tydings Act[10] in 1937 and was retained verbatim when Congress broadened the vertical price-fixing exemption in 1952.

The principal ways in which the McGuire Act broadened the exemption were (1) by including the non-signer aspects of state fair trade legislation;[11] (2) by making the exemption applicable to stipulated, as well as minimum prices;[12] and (3) by adding an exemption for agreements requiring a vendee to limit his resales to persons who agree to maintain fair trade prices.[13] This last provision—the so-called "vendee clause"—is relevant to our problem.

To facilitate our explanation of our understanding of the second paragraph of § 2 of the McGuire Act, we italicize the portions of the paragraph which were not a part of the Miller-Tydings Act, we underline the "vendee clause" and the "when lawful" clause, and we print in bold face the word "resale" which appears once in the phrase following the vendee clause and twice in the "when lawful" clause.

> (2) Nothing contained in this Act or in any of the Antitrust Acts shall render unlawful any contracts or agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices, or requiring a vendee to enter into contracts or agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices, for the resale of a commodity which bears, or the label or container of which bears, the trade-mark, brand, or name of the producer or distributor of such commodity and which is in free and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced or distributed by others, when contracts or agreements of that description are lawful as applied to intrastate transactions under any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which such resale is to be made, or to which the commodity is to be transported for such resale. 66 Stat. 632; 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(2).

As originally enacted in the Miller-Tydings Act, it is manifest that the word "resale" had the same meaning each time it was used. Since the vendee clause was not then a part of the statute, the word "resale" consistently referred to the first resale by a vendee, [298] rather than to any subsequent resale by a purchaser from the vendee, for at that time the exemption covered only the terms of the minimum resale price maintenance agreement between a vendor and his immediate vendee, and made no reference to agreements restricting the vendee's right to choose his own customers.

[11] This change—made necessary by the Supreme Court's decision in Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 341 U.S. 384, 71 S.Ct. 745, 95 L.Ed. 1035—was made in paragraph (3) of § 2 of the McGuire Act.

"(3) Nothing contained in this Act or in any of the Antitrust Acts shall render unlawful the exercise or the enforcement of any right or right of action created by any statute, law, or public policy now or hereafter in effect in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, which in substance provides that willfully and knowingly advertising, offering for sale, or selling any commodity at less than the price or prices prescribed in such contracts or agreements whether the person so advertising, offering for sale, or selling is or is not a party to such a contract or agreement, is unfair competition and is actionable at the suit of any person damaged thereby." 66 Stat. 632; 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(3). The "vendee" clause and the "when lawful" clause, which we construe in this case, are found in paragraph (2) of § 2, quoted in the text infra.

[12] Note the inclusion of the phrase "or stipulated" in paragraph (2) of § 2 of the Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(2), quoted infra.

[13] The McGuire Act amendments were to § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, and not to § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, as was the Miller-Tydings Act. Nevertheless, the changes made in the McGuire Act were clearly intended to affect § 1 of the Sherman Act as well, as the "Nothing contained in this Act or in any of the Antitrust Acts . . ." language in paragraphs (2) and (3) of § 2 indicates.

We have no doubt, therefore, that if the words "such resale" as used in the McGuire Act retain the same meaning as they did in the Miller-Tydings Act, the Commission is correct in its view that the legality of a customer restriction clause in an agreement between a manufacturer and a wholesaler is governed by the law of the state in which the wholesaler resells the trademarked article.

The question, then, is what change, if any, in the meaning of the word "resale" resulted from the insertion of the vendee clause in the forepart of the paragraph. Before attempting to answer this question, it is useful to note that the word "resale" performs two quite different functions. First, it is part of the description of the kind of agreements that are covered by the exemption, and, second, it is part of the identification of the states whose law determines whether the agreement is valid or invalid. There is no doubt about Congress' intent to modify its description of exempt agreements to include customer restriction clauses as well as price-fixing clauses. There is, however, no indication that Congress intended to make any change in the identity of the states whose laws would determine the availability of the exemption, or to have the law of more than one state applicable to any one agreement. We first consider the meaning of the word "resale" as part of the description of covered agreements and then as part of the "when lawful" clause.

To make sense out of the vendee clause, and also to retain the significance of the price-fixing clause, it is necessary to give the word "resale" a double meaning in the phrase immediately following the vendee clause.[14] For, to the extent that the phrase modifies the price-fixing clause, it obviously still refers to the first resale by the immediate vendee; but to the extent that the same phrase modifies the vendee clause, it must refer to a resale by a person who has purchased from that vendee.[15] Unless the phrase performs this dual function, either the original price-fixing exemption would have been changed or else the vendee clause would be meaningless. The word "resale" as first used in paragraph (2) of § 2, therefore, has a different meaning in the two contexts in which it modifies its two antecedent clauses.

[14] If the same descriptive language had been used twice to describe two types of vertical agreements, it would be obvious that the word "resale" had two different meanings. Comparable meaning would be conveyed by a provision describing "(a) agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices for the resale of a commodity . . ., and (b) agreements requiring a vendee to enter into contracts or agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices for the resale of a commodity. . . ." In part (a) of such a provision the word "resale" would refer to the first resale whereas in part (b) the same word would refer to a subsequent resale.

[15] Alternatively, the word "vendee" might be interpreted as referring to a retailer who purchased from a wholesaler-party to a fair trade contract with the defendant manufacturer. Under that interpretation, the word "resale" would still refer to the sale by the retailer, rather than to the wholesaler's resale.

When the same word appears in the "when lawful" clause, logically it might have either of the two meanings it first conveyed, or it might again convey a double meaning. As a matter of pure grammar, there is force to the argument that the word should be given a double meaning every time it is used, particularly since it is modified by the adjective "such" when it is repeated in the "when lawful" clause.[16]

[299] Under this reading, the word "resale" would have a double meaning every time it is used, and would make the validity of a single agreement between Corning and one of its wholesalers in a free trade state depend upon the law of at least two different states.[17] Although, purely as a matter of literal construction, the word "resale" could be given a consistent double meaning, that reading is certainly not a necessary one. When it is recalled that the original phrasing of the "when lawful" clause as it appeared in the Miller-Tydings Act used the words "such resale" to refer to the first resale by the immediate vendee, it is perfectly reasonable to retain the same construction after the addition of the vendee clause. Indeed, if we were to give the word a double meaning in the "when lawful" clause, we would unnecessarily complicate the statute and broaden the exemption.[18]

The basic purpose of the statute was to exempt certain "contracts or agreements" from the Sherman Act. The statutory language—in both the prohibitory portion of the Sherman Act and the exemptions found in the Miller-Tydings Act and the McGuire Act—focuses our attention on the agreement which is challenged.[19] In this case, that agreement is between a manufacturer and a wholesaler; it restricts the wholesaler's freedom to resell in two ways: first, it establishes the prices at which he may resell and, second, it limits the persons to whom he may resell. It would be anomalous, indeed, for Congress to provide that the lawfulness of the two restrictive clauses in the same agreement should be determined by the law of two different states.[20] It is only logical that the law of the same state should control the legality of the entire fair trade agreement and, further, that the state be the one in [300] which the vendee—in this case the wholesaler—is to make the resales described in the contract.

[16] Although Corning argues for a literal interpretation of the clause, it does not expressly suggest that the word "resale" should be given a double meaning. On the contrary, Corning argues that the words "such resale" refer to the first resale the first time they are used in the "when lawful" clause and to the [299] second resale the second time they are used in that clause. It is, however, perfectly clear that any difference in meaning between the first and second portions of the "when lawful" clause—between contracts "lawful . . . in any State . . . in which such resale is to be made" and "lawful . . . in any State . . . to which the commodity is to be transported for such resale"—could not have been intended to have any relevance to the problem presented by this case. For, we reiterate, the vendee clause was not a part of the statute when that language was first enacted. We therefore need not express any opinion on the significance, or possible superfluity, of that clause as applied to situations not before us. See the discussion in the Commission opinion, Corning Glass Works, 82 F.T.C. 1675, 1759 (1973). We find neither textual nor historical support for Corning's suggestion that the word "resale" has one meaning when it is used in the first portion of the "when lawful" clause and a different meaning when it is used in the second portion of that clause. If this is not a fair statement of Corning's argument, and if it is really contending that the word refers to the second, rather than the first, resale in both parts of the "when lawful" clause, then the transport clause would be just as superfluous as Corning asserts it to be under the Commission's interpretation; for in that event, the first portion of the "when lawful" clause would compel the result for which Corning contends.

[17] The price-fixing clause would be tested by the law of the state where the wholesaler is located but the customer restriction clause would be tested by the law of the state or states where the wholesaler's customers are located.

[18] It is, of course, "common experience that identical words may be used in the same statute, or even in the same section of a statute, with quite different meanings." Wood v. Dennis, 489 F.2d 849, 853 (7th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 960, 94 S.Ct. 1490, 39 L.Ed.2d 575, and cases cited therein. We attach greater significance to the Supreme Court's repeated admonition that exemptions from the antitrust laws are to be strictly construed, see, e. g., United States v. McKesson & Robbins, Inc., 351 U.S. 305, 316, 76 S.Ct. 937, 100 L.Ed. 1209; United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 348, 83 S.Ct. 1715, 10 L.Ed.2d 915, than to following a nice literal construction which is certainly not compelled by either the history or the purpose of this statute.

Corning's construction would allow a manufacturer to impose an otherwise illegal restraint upon a wholesaler in a free trade state because of the fair trade policies in effect in a state where some of his customers are located. Such construction would be inconsistent with the basic explanation of both the Miller-Tydings amendment and the McGuire Act as forms of "state's rights" legislation. Thus, in 1937 Senator Tydings noted that the bill under consideration would simply enable the states "to carry into effect their own public policy."[21]

The Amendment was seen as immunizing contracts in restraint of trade where such contracts were lawful under the fair trade acts of the states "where made or where they are to be performed." S.Rep.No.257, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1937). See also H.R.Rep.No. 382, 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1937). The focus was on the immunization of specific contracts and not on the immunization of a series of consensual transactions.

This underlying policy, that a contract's antitrust immunity is to be determined by looking to the law of the state where the contract is executed or to be performed, was reaffirmed in the passage of the McGuire Act. The preamble of the Act provided that its purpose was "to protect the rights of States . . . to regulate their internal affairs."[22] As Representative McGuire, sponsor of the measure, noted,

[19] Moreover, the language of Corning's own agreement purports to make its application to the parties depend upon the law of the place "where it is lawful so to agree." One might expect this language to refer to the place where the agreement at issue was either made or is to be performed rather than to the place where persons who are not parties to the agreement conduct their business.

[20] It would be particularly anomalous to have the validity of a customer restriction clause which restrains a wholesaler in free trade state "A"—and merely affects the prices at [300] which retailers may sell in fair trade state "B"—turn on the legality of customer restriction clauses in state "B". Corning's position would be less anomalous if it made the validity of the customer restriction clause in state "A" turn on the legality of the price-fixing section in state "B". There is no way the present statutory language can be so interpreted.

[21] "[I]t should be observed, in the first place, that the bill under consideration is simply an enabling act. It permits the States, without the complications of possible violation of Federal law, to carry into effect their own public policy, and it is limited to a specific type of legislation now on the statute books of 27 States.

"These State laws are applicable only to transactions consummated wholly within the borders of the State in which the legislation is in effect, that is to say, they apply only to sales made by one person to another within the territorial confines of the State." Hearings on S. 100 before the Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, "Resale Price Maintenance," 75th Cong., 1st Sess. 42 (1937).

[22] "That it is the purpose of this Act to protect the rights of States under the United States Constitution to regulate

> This bill is merely an enabling measure. . . . If a State does not believe in price maintenance, it is not forced to tolerate the practice. In the absence of State legislation authorizing price maintenance, the Federal law remains unchanged. No State need fear any encroachment on its internal affairs by neighboring States pursuing a different policy. 97 Cong.Rec. 13404—05 (1951) (emphasis added).

Each state has an interest in determining whether its citizens should buy and sell subject to fair trade restraints or free of such restraints. That interest is essentially the same with respect to both types of vertical restraints authorized by the McGuire Act. As Corning recognizes,[23] were it to impose a resale price restriction on resales by its Missouri [301] wholesaler, such a contract provision would violate the antitrust laws.[24] Missouri is a free trade state; Missouri's public policy is not to immunize price restrictions placed on the sales of goods by Missouri merchants. It is equally clear that Missouri has not immunized customer restrictions placed on the sale of goods by Missouri merchants.[25]

Corning incorrectly assumes that the significance of the vendee provision in its fair trade contract with wholesalers is limited to price maintenance in fair trade states.[26] But even if maintaining the retail price may be the ultimate purpose of the vendee clause, it is clearly not the clause's only effect. The clause seriously restricts the Missouri wholesaler's freedom of choice in selling to retailers located in neighboring fair trade states. Thus, the clause imposes a restraint of trade in Missouri, and is inconsistent with Missouri public policy. To paraphrase Representative McGuire, a state like Missouri should not be their internal affairs and more particularly to enact statutes and laws, and to adopt policies, which authorize contracts and agreements prescribing minimum or stipulated prices for the resale of commodities and to extend the minimum or stipulated prices prescribed by such contracts and agreements to persons who are not parties thereto. It is the further purpose of this Act to permit such statutes, laws, and public policies to apply to commodities, contracts, agreements, and activities in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce." 66 Stat. 631-632; 15 U.S.C. § 45 ("Purpose of Act July 14, 1952") (1970) (emphasis added).

[23] "Corning does not in any way fix the price at which the Missouri wholesaler resells the merchandise to any customer. The Missouri wholesaler determines the price at which he sells to any of his customers—including an Illinois retailer. . . ." Brief for Petitioner at 26.

[24] Thus, where a Washington, D.C., wholesaler sold fair traded goods to a New York retailer for resale in New York, the New York fair trade act determined the antitrust immunity of price maintenance provisions. See Mead Johnson & Co. v. G-E-X, Inc. of Albany, 37 Misc.2d 491, 496-497, 235 N.Y.S.2d 951, 956-957 (Sup.Ct.1963). Where, however, a Washington, D.C., establishment sold fair traded goods directly to consumers in Maryland and New York, the manufacturers were unable to rely on the fair trade acts of those states to impose resale price maintenance. The fair trade public policy of the District of Columbia, where the resale at issue took place, governed. See General Electric Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co., 244 F.2d 681, 684 (2d Cir. 1957), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 824, 78 S.Ct. 32, 2 L.Ed.2d 39; Revere Camera Co. v. Masters Mail Order Co., 128 F.Supp. 457 (D.Md. 1955).

[25] It is clear that, absent statutory exemption, such a customer restriction clause would violate the federal antitrust laws.

> "A distributor of a trade-marked article may not lawfully limit by agreement, express or implied, the price at which or the persons to whom its purchaser may resell, except as the seller moves along the route which is marked by the Miller-Tydings Act." United States v. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., 321 U.S. 707, 721, 64 S.Ct. 805, 812, 88 L.Ed. 1024 (emphasis added).

The Commission concluded that such customer restriction clauses would also be unlawful as a matter of state law in free trade states. 82 F.T.C. 1675, 1754 n. 9 (1973). Corning has not disputed this conclusion.

[26] As Corning states at page 28 of its brief, "Since the only purpose of the vendee provision in Corning's Wholesaler Fair Trade Agreement is to effectively maintain the price in the second resale, it follows that we must look to the law of the state in which the second resale occurs to determine the propriety of the vendee provision."

forced to tolerate a practice which its own public policy does not condone; it should not be subjected to encroachment on its internal affairs by neighboring states pursuing a different policy.[27]

The Commission's interpretation of the "when lawful" clause fully respects the public policies of the three classes of states.

a. In free trade states, the policy of preventing restraints of trade is fully vindicated. Neither a vertical price-fixing clause nor a customer restriction clause contained in a contract governing the resale in the free trade state is exempt from the antitrust laws.

b. In signer-only states, the policy of permitting vertical restraints of trade which are voluntarily assumed by contracting parties while prohibiting the imposition of involuntary restraints on noncontracting [302] parties is fully vindicated. In those states Corning may continue its price maintenance program to the extent that it is able to persuade retailers to enter into price-fixing agreements voluntarily and to induce wholesalers in those states to accept customer restriction clauses in their contracts. But Corning may not restrain the freedom of a non-signing retailer to purchase from accessible wholesalers in neighboring free trade states by imposing customer restriction clauses on such wholesalers. The involuntary restraint resulting from such a clause would offend the policies of both the free trade state and the signer-only state.[28] As the Commission noted, the fact that signer-only states no longer have or enforce non-signer legislation reflects their desire to protect non-signing merchants from involuntary restraints. It would be inconsistent with that interest to deny those retailers the right to purchase from wholesalers in free trade jurisdictions free of any restraint which they had not voluntarily accepted.

c. In non-signer states, Corning's fair trade program is essentially unimpaired.[29] Even though non-signer state retailers may now obtain goods from free trade state wholesalers without first contracting with Corning, they may not lawfully sell these items below the fair trade

[27] Amicus Rubbermaid, Inc., argues that since goods shipped from a free trade state become subject to fair trade control upon arrival for resale in a fair trade state, "it opposes logic to invest the shippers with [fair trade control] immunity on the basis of their geographic locations." Brief for Amicus at 19 n. 14. What Rubbermaid ignores is that the determination of the antitrust immunity of an eventual price restriction upon resale in a fair trade state is logically separate from the determination of the immunity of a contractual vendee clause that imposes a serious restraint on the free selection of customers by a free trade state wholesaler. Congress' express desire to immunize specific "contracts" should not be broadly read to mean the immunization of a series of contracts simply because the end result, price maintenance, is sanctioned by a state fair trade law.

[28] In Schwegmann Bros. v. Calvert Distillers Corp., 341 U.S. 384, 71 S.Ct. 745, 95 L.Ed. 1035, the Court recognized a comparable distinction between "price fixing by contract or agreement" and "price fixing by compulsion" (p. 388, 71 S.Ct. 747), or between "coercive" and "voluntary" schemes or arrangements (p. 394, 71 S.Ct. 745).

[29] We recognize that as a practical matter a fair trade program in a non-signer state may be impaired to the extent that a manufacturer is unwilling to assume the litigation costs associated with enforcement, particularly since such costs include the risk that a non-signer state will be judicially changed into a signer-only state, as recently occurred in North Carolina. Bulova Watch Co., Inc. v. Brand Distributors of North Wilkesboro, Inc., 285 N.C. 467, 206 S.E.2d 141 (1974). Although possible infirmity in the state of the law in a non-signer jurisdiction may provide a legitimate explanation for a manufacturer's decision to avoid litigation and to use customer restriction clauses as a method of enforcing its fair trade program, such possible infirmity is not a factor we may properly assess in considering the impact of our holding in a non-signer jurisdiction. For, if the test of litigation would disclose that some jurisdictions are price. (See, e. g., § 2 of the Illinois Fair Trade Act, supra n. 5). Corning may continue to insist on vendee clauses in its contracts with non-signer state wholesalers, as such clauses are lawful under the fair trade acts of all non-signer states.

In sum, we agree with the Commission's interpretation of the McGuire Act; the exemption of a customer restriction clause in a wholesaler contract depends on the law of the state in which the resale of the product by the wholesaler to the retailer takes place. This interpretation fully respects the public policies of all three types of jurisdictions and accords with the basic federal "policy in favor of competition." Bowman Transportation, Inc. v. Arkansas-Best Freight System, Inc., 419 U.S. 281, 95 S.Ct. 438, 42 L.Ed.2d 447 (1974).

III.

[2] With respect to the Order issued by the FTC in this case, Corning argues that it was not given an adequate opportunity to be heard on the terms of the final order. We disagree.

The Commission's Complaint, issued January 13, 1972, was accompanied by a proposed order, described in the accompanying Notice as "the form of Order which the Commission has reason to believe should issue if the facts are found to be as alleged in the Complaint." The Motion for Summary Decision filed by complaint counsel sought "that the order to cease and desist proposed by the Commission be entered against Respondent." This motion was served on October 2, 1972, some eight months after the issuance of the Complaint. Corning did not attack the proposed order, even [303] though complaint counsel's motion sought a complete disposition of the case. Only in its Motion for Reconsideration, filed after the Commission's decision, did Corning contest the form of the Order. While concluding that Corning's contentions were not timely, the Commission nevertheless considered, and rejected, the merits of Corning's arguments. We feel that Corning was given an ample opportunity to be heard on the propriety of the Order.

Corning, finally, contends that the Order is "unnecessarily punitive" in three respects. It objects to the requirements that it mail a copy of the Order to all retailers in the 14 non-signer fair trade states, that it "encourage" its signer-only state retailers to ignore Corning's fair trade prices, and that it refrain for three years from the use of pre-priced product containers and the use of fair trade prices in advertisements in areas where Corning may not lawfully control resale prices.

[3] The Commission must be accorded broad discretion in framing its improperly classified as non-signer states, the policy considerations applicable to free trade and signer-only states should be respected in those states.

orders to insure the effective termination of any violation. As we stated in L. G. Balfour Co. v. F.T.C., 442 F.2d 1, 23 (7th Cir. 1971),

> It is well settled that the choice of the remedial order is committed to the discretion of the Commission. F.T.C. v. Mandel Bros., Inc., 359 U.S. 385, 392–393, 79 S.Ct. 818, 3 L.Ed.2d 893 (1959); Niresk Industries, Inc. v. F.T.C., 278 F.2d 337, 343 (7th Cir. 1960), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 883, 81 S.Ct. 173, 5 L.Ed.2d 104 (1960). Except where the remedy selected bears no reasonable relation to the unfair practices found to violate Section 5, the courts will not reverse or modify the Commission's choice. F.T.C. v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 428–429, 77 S.Ct. 502, 1 L.Ed.2d 438 (1957); National Bakers Services, Inc. v. F.T.C., 329 F.2d 365, 367 (7th Cir. 1964).

[4] The Commission has met these requirements. While the retailers in the 15 non-signer states will still be required to maintain the fair trade retail prices for Corning's products, they now may purchase those products from free trade state wholesalers at non-fixed prices.[30] Thus, by requiring Corning to inform these retailers of the FTC Order, the Commission furthers the goal of removing the vestiges of past Corning violations.

Similarly, the FTC decision may open a significant source of supply for retailers in signer-only states who do not wish to maintain the fair trade price. Some of those retailers who signed fair trade contracts with Corning may have acted under the compulsion of the illegal Corning customer restriction clause in the free trade state wholesale contracts. The Commission could reasonably conclude that the most effective way to abolish the effects of this violation is to inform those signer-only state retailers whose fair trade contracts were submitted through free trade state wholesalers that "unless and until [they] enter into new retailer contracts, [they] may and are encouraged to" sell Corning's merchandise at such prices as they wish. This is what the FTC order requires.

We also agree with the Commission that any practical problems Corning may have in preventing the use of pre-marked containers and fair trade priced advertisements in areas where Corning may not lawfully fix prices are best resolved as a compliance matter, rather than by revising the language of the Order.

[5,6] Finally, we note Corning's challenge to the impartiality of the Commission because of its consistent opposition to resale price maintenance in general and legislative exemptions from the antitrust laws for this form of pricefixing in particular. There is no merit to this challenge. It is certainly proper for the [304] Commission to express the consumer point of view when antitrust amendments, or exemptions, are being considered by the Congress. Its performance of that public service in no way qualifies its status as an independent agency entitled to our respect in the discharge of its quasi-judicial functions. Moreover,

[30] This relief was ordered based on the violation alleged in Count I of the Complaint. See n. 7, supra. The parties had stipulated prior to the FTC decision that if a violation were found on Count II, relief could be ordered on Counts I and IV as well.

contrary to Corning's argument, the views of complaint counsel as reported in the press certainly may not be used as a basis for questioning the independence of the members of the Commission itself. Indeed, we think our interpretation of the statute is strongly buttressed by the fact that it accords with the expert and experienced views of the agency charged with administration of the statutory scheme of which the McGuire Act is a part.[31]

Accordingly, we affirm and enter judgment enforcing the order of the Federal Trade Commission.

ALUMINUM COMPANY OF AMERICA, ET AL. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, ET AL.*

Civ. A. No. 75 Civ. 17. F.T.C. File No. 99-196

(United States District Court, Southern District of New York, February 5, 1975)

1. PLAINTIFFS HAD BURDEN OF DEMONSTRATING (1) PROBABLE SUCCESS OR MERITS AND PROBABILITY OF IRREPARABLE HARM OR (2) EXISTENCE OF SERIOUS QUESTIONS TO MERITS OF CASE IN ACTION SEEKING PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF FROM F.T.C. REQUIREMENT OF ANNUAL LINE OF BUSINESS REPORTS.

   In respect to motion for a preliminary injunction filed by plaintiff corporations, which brought class action against Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, plaintiffs had the burden of clearly demonstrating either (1) probable success on the merits and the possibility of irreparable damages, or (2) the existence of serious questions going to the merits and the tipping of the balance of hardships sharply in their favor.

2. THE FIRST BRANCH OF PLAINTIFFS' MOTION FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF WOULD BE CONFINED TO NAMED PLAINTIFFS THAT SUBMITTED INFORMATION IN SUPPORT OF RENEWED MOTIONS TO QUASH WITHOUT CONSENT TO RELEASE, IN CLASS ACTION ALLEGING COMMISSION EXCEEDED STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY.

   In class action brought by 12 corporations against the Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, the first branch of plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunctive relief, seeking to enjoin the Commission from disclosing any information received in connection with the program, would be confined to the ten named plaintiffs that submitted information to the Commission in support of renewed motions to quash without consenting to its release.

[31] [304] See, e. g., Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16, 85 S.Ct. 792, 13 L.Ed.2d 616, and cases cited therein.

* Reported in 390 F. Supp. 301 (1975).

Whether or not Federal Trade Commission had altered its policy, by making its confidentiality rules applicable only to information contained in or of the type that would be contained in so-called LB forms, as distinguished from information submitted in connection with motions attacking Commission's or[302]der to corporations to file annual line of business reports, was not dispositive of motion filed by certain corporations for preliminary injunctive relief.

4. MOVANTS FAILED TO DEMONSTRATE EITHER THE POSSIBILITY OF IRREPARABLE INJURY OR THE TIPPING OF THE BALANCE OF HARDSHIPS SHARPLY IN THEIR FAVOR IN MOTION ALLEGING COMMISSION EXCEEDED ITS STATUTORY AND CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY.

Motion of corporations, which brought class action against Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, for a preliminary injunction enjoining the Commission and its employees from disclosing any materials submitted by the movants in support of renewed motions to quash Commission order requiring the submission of financial data would be denied, as the movants failed to demonstrate either the possibility of irreparable injury or the tipping of the balance of hardships sharply in their favor.

5. THE COMMISSION WOULD NOT BE COMPELLED TO GIVE NOTICE THAT IT MIGHT LACK AUTHORITY TO PREVENT PUBLIC DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION SUBMITTED IN CONNECTION WITH THE LINE OF BUSINESS PROGRAM BY VIRTURE OF THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT.

In class action brought by 12 corporations against Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, the Commission would not be compelled to give notice to all members of the purported class that, by virtue of the Freedom of Information Act, the Commission might lack authority to prevent public disclosure of information submitted in connection with the program, since the other members of the purported class had access to legal advice and required no advice or guidance from plaintiffs.

6. PLAINTIFFS WOULD NOT BE GRANTED AN ORDER ENJOINING THE F.T.C. FROM SERVING DEFAULT NOTICES PENDING DETERMINATION OF CLASS ACTION ISSUE.

In class action brought by 12 corporations against Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, plaintiffs would not be granted an order enjoining the Commission from serving default notices pending determination of the class action issue, since efficient judicial administration required no such order and since, even if the court were moved by a desire to avoid additional complaints by other members of the purported class, there would be no need to enjoin the issuance of default notices.

7. SINCE IT IS NOT A FUNCTION OF THE CLERK'S OFFICE NOR ONE DELEGATED BY CONGRESS, THE DISTRICT COURT CLERK WOULD NOT BE AUTHORIZED TO RECEIVE REPORTS SUBJECT TO DISCLOSURE ONLY UPON COURT ORDER.

In class action brought by 12 corporations against Federal Trade Commission and others, alleging that the Commission, in adopting and implementing an information-gathering program requiring annual line of business reports from corporations, exceeded its statutory and constitutional authority, the district court clerk would not be authorized to receive such reports from those companies electing to file them, subject to disclosure only upon court order, since that was not a function of the clerk's office or one delegated to it by Congress, and since, moreover, no reason existed to burden the clerk in the manner suggested.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 390 F. Supp. 301.)

On motion for preliminary injunctive relief, court held inter alia, that motion for preliminary injunction enjoining F.T.C. and its employees from disclosing materials submitted by movants in support of motions to quash order requiring submission of financial data would be denied because movants failed to demonstrate irreparable injury or the tipping of balance of hardships sharply in their favor.

OPINION EDWARD WEINFELD, District Judge.

Plaintiffs, twelve corporations, commenced this class action on behalf of [303] themselves and all other corporations similarly situated against the Federal Trade Commission and its members ("Commission") and the Comptroller General of the United States. The plaintiffs' claims, among others, are that the Commission, in adopting an information gathering program ("LB Program") requiring Annual Line of Business Reports ("LB Forms") from corporations,[1] and in implementing and attempting to implement the program, exceeded its authority under the Federal Trade Commission Act,[2] and violated the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Federal Constitution; the Federal Reports Act;[3] the Administrative Procedure Act;[4] section 1905 of the United States Criminal Code;[5] section 103 of the Budget and Accounting Procedure Act of 1950;[6] and section 9 of the Census Act.[7] Plaintiffs seek, in addition to other relief, a judgment enjoining the Commission from implementing the LB Program.

The purpose of the LB Program is to enable the Commission to publish aggregate financial data for various industries derived from information contained in the LB Forms to be submitted by leading manufacturing firms for each of their "lines of business" as defined by the Commission. The Commission's objectives, as stated by it, are (1) to effectuate and foster resource allocation by competitors and potential competitors, investors, labor groups and others; and (2) to enable the Commission to pinpoint non-competitive markets for law enforcement purposes.

The twelve named plaintiffs and the companies on whose behalf the action is asserted to be brought are 345 of the leading manufacturing companies of the United States, each of whom the Commission served with an Order to File Special Report ("Order") requiring the submission of certain financial data. The matter now before the court is a motion by the twelve plaintiffs for preliminary injunctive relief pending the decision of a motion for class action determination, which motion has yet to be argued. The motion for injunctive relief, the plaintiffs explain, is addressed only to so much of the complaint as alleges that the Commission has violated and has unlawfully modified its Confidentiality Rules governing the LB Program,[8] and has misrepresented its legal authority to limit disclosure of information obtained from plaintiff corporations.

In substance, the sought-for relief would:

(1) enjoin the Commission and all its employees from disclosing to any person not expressly authorized to have access thereto under the Commission's Confidentiality Rules any information received from the companies in connection with the LB Program, and from publishing any such information in any manner or form;

(2) direct the Commission to notify all companies required to file reports that, notwithstanding the Commission's representation that access to all information submitted by the companies in connection with the LB Program could and would be limited to certain specified Commission employees, the Commission may lack the authority to prevent the public disclosure of, and so limit access to, all such information, by virtue of the Freedom of Information Act[9] and other provisions of law;

(3) enjoin the Commission from serving a notice of default[10] upon any company prior to ten days after this court's [304] determination as to whether this action may be maintained as a class action; and

(4) authorize the deposit with the Clerk of this Court of LB Forms by companies which elect to file them, subject to disclosure only upon order of this court.

[1] The broad sweep of the proposed relief upon its face is such that it would, pending a trial, effectively halt the LB Program in its tracks.

[8] Rules and Procedures for the Use of Confidential Individual Company Data Collected under the FTC's Line of Business Program.

The plaintiffs, under the frequently enunciated rule in this circuit, have the burden of clearly demonstrating either (1) probable success on the merits and the possibility of irreparable damages, or (2) the existence of serious questions going to the merits and the tipping of the balance of hardship sharply in their favor.[11] We therefore turn to the essential facts to decide if plaintiffs have made a sufficient case for such drastic relief.

The LB Program had its genesis in the Commission's view that the data sought from the companies was required in order to carry out two distinct aspects of its statutory responsibility: first, its duty to investigate the extent of competition in the United States economy in general and in specific industries, and to report its findings to the Congress and the public; second, its responsibility to develop rational policy planning procedures for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. In addition, the Commission considered that the data was needed to encourage favorable decisions by potential investors in particular industries. Accordingly, the Commission, pursuant to 44 U.S.C., section 3512, submitted its proposed LB Form to the Comptroller General for his approval, which was granted on May 13, 1974.[12] The Comptroller General found that the information sought in the Commission's LB Form was not presently available from another source within the federal government.

Thereafter, on August 2, 1974, the Commission passed a "Resolution Requiring Annual Line of Business Reports from Corporations," in which it resolved to proceed to collect the information called for in the LB Form. The resolution further provided that the data submitted by an individual company would be afforded confidential status in accordance with rules which were incorporated by reference in the resolution. In pertinent part these Confidentiality Rules provide:

> The names of companies, financial data and all other information which are obtained from respondent companies in connection with the Federal Trade Commission's Line of Business Reporting Program are confidential, and persons authorized to have access to this information may not release, discuss or in any way provide access to such information to anyone not authorized to have access. Further, all such Line of Business data are considered to be exempt from the disclosure provisions of the Freedom of Information Act.

On or about August 19, 1974, the Commission served its Order on 345 companies, comprising the purported class in this case, directing them to file completed LB Forms within 150 days. The following day, on August 20, 1974, eight of the named plaintiffs herein[13] filed with the Commission a joint motion to quash the Order to file the LB Forms and for ancillary relief.[14] The movants advanced, among other contentions, (1) [305] that the order was in excess of the Commission's authority and in violation of the movants' constitutional rights in that it was excessively burdensome, broad, vague, arbitrary and capricious, and (2) that the order was unlawful because it failed to provide adequate protection against disclosure of confidential data to be filed by individual reporting companies, and because aggregate LB data to be published by the Commission could be broken down to disclose the confidential financial data of individual reporting companies. Simultaneously the movants themselves publicized their motions, and their counsel consented to the release by the Commission of copies of their motion papers. Thereafter, other companies filed motions to quash, based on substantially the same grounds advanced by the initial eight movants. In all, approximately 226 of the 345 companies required to file LB reports made such motions.

On September 24, 1974, the Commission denied the various motions to quash. The denial, however, was without prejudice to a renewal of the motions limited solely to the issues of undue burden and lack of confidentiality. As to the issue of lack of confidentiality the Commission stated it would only consider claims relating to the possible discovery of confidential corporate information through techniques of disaggregating individual firm data from the aggregate multi-firm data to be published under the LB Program, and further required the companies to particularize the techniques relied upon in support thereof. As to the issue of undue burden, the Commission limited this issue to the cost of compliance with the Order and required those asserting such claims to give specific information in support thereof.

On October 4, 1974, a joint renewed motion to quash was filed by the twelve named plaintiffs herein—the eight original movants and four other companies.[15] The briefs in support of the joint renewed motion specifically authorized the Commission "to release the present motion and the names of the moving parties to the public." Thereafter 111 other companies filed renewed motions to quash.

On October 30th the attorneys representing the twelve plaintiffs herein submitted to the Commission the opinion of an expert, whose opinion in turn was supported by another expert, that disaggregation of the information contained in the aggregate reports was feasible. The Commission was expressly authorized by the movants to release both experts' opinions to the public. Also submitted on October 30, on the issue of undue burden, were letters from each of the joint movants (plaintiffs herein) except one, B. F. Goodrich Co. Simultaneously the attorneys requested of the Commission that "[b]ecause confidential information is contained in some of these letters, and to preserve the rights of the Moving Parties with respect to confidentiality, . . . these letters be afforded confidential treatment pursuant to all applicable Commission rules." However, one of these companies, General Electric, expressly stated it had no objection to the publication of the material contained in its letter.

In addition to the eleven plaintiffs, thirty-nine other companies submitted information in support of their claims of lack of confidentiality or undue burden. Thus, out of 226 companies who originally moved to quash, after the denial thereof, 123 renewed such motions, and of that number only fifty submitted information purporting to support the claims of confidentiality or undue burden.

While the Commission had under consideration the renewed motions to quash, by letter dated November 27, 1974, it advised the attorneys representing the 123 companies that had filed renewed motions that a request had been received [306] from the Consumers Union under the Freedom of Information Act[16] to inspect and copy all motions to quash, including renewals thereof, as well as the identity of each movant. The Commission further advised the attorneys that its Confidentiality Rules did not apply to motions to quash or materials submitted in support of such motions, but only to information contained in the LB Forms, none of which had yet been filed; accordingly, that it had granted the Consumers Union's request as to the initial motions to quash, as none of the motions contained any information exempt from the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act. Parenthetically it should be noted that those motions contain no information other than general arguments in support of the attack upon the validity of the Order directed to the companies to file LB Forms; they contained no information about any particular company.

With respect to the Consumers Union's request for copies of all renewed motions to quash and materials in support thereof, the Commission advised that it had deferred final determination in order to consider whether any of the commercial or financial information contained therein was exempt from disclosure under Exemption 4 of the Freedom of Information Act.[17] The Commission further requested that it be advised of any information or material contained in the documents filed which was not public and which, if disclosed, was likely to cause harm to the competitive position of the company. The company was required to support such a claim by an affidavit specifying which portions of the document contained alleged confidential information and a written justification of any contention that disclosure was likely to cause substantial harm to its competitive position. The information was to be submitted within fifteen days, and if no response was received, all materials in connection with the renewed motions to quash would be immediately released to the Consumers Union. The Commission promised to give ten days' notice of any determination to release information submitted by any company advancing a proper and timely claim of confidentiality. The Commission is yet to rule upon the requests of individual companies that material be granted confidential status. It has agreed to withhold decision pending a determination by this court of the instant application.

At the time of the commencement of this suit, the Commission had not ruled on the renewed motions to quash; accordingly, one of its contentions in opposition to this motion for preliminary injunctive relief was that administrative procedures had not been exhausted. However, on the very day of the argument the Commission denied the renewed motions to quash, but did not inform the court and the parties until the following day.[18] As to the issue of undue burden, the Commission found that no company had demonstrated that the cost of complying with the LB Form is unduly burdensome. As to the issue of confidentiality, it found that while many of the companies made general arguments as to the techniques that might be employed to disaggregate material, none went into sufficient detail to prove that disaggregation is possible. It took note of the experts' opinion offered by the companies, but deemed disaggregation in the circumstances "highly improbable." In any event, the Commission specifically noted its purpose to adhere to its Confidentiality Rules with respect to the LB Forms and not to publish aggregate information in such a way that it would disclose information about private companies.

Of the 345 companies originally served with the Order, only 164 were required to file their LB Forms on or about January 15, 1975. Of these 164, [307] 123 had filed LB Forms with the Commission as of January 28, 1975.[19] The Commission granted extensions to February 15, 1975 to 147 companies, including the plaintiffs herein.[20]

Against this background the court turns to the relief requested by the plaintiffs. With respect to the first request—that the Commission be preliminarily enjoined from disclosing any information received from the companies in connection with the LB Program—the court considers only the potential disclosure of information contained in the ten letters in support of the renewed motion submitted by the named plaintiffs other than B. F. Goodrich, which did not submit a letter, and General Electric, which consented to the release of its letter. As to the General Electric letter and the names of the parties who made motions and publicized or consented to the publication of such motions, there is clearly no occasion for injunctive relief.

[18] It appears that the Commission lawyers who were present at the argument of the motion were unaware of the Commission ruling.

[19] Of the 123 LB Forms that had been filed as of January 28, 18 are considered by the Commission to have been filed under protest.

[20] The Commission staff has apparently granted extensions to 34 additional companies.

[2] The plaintiffs urge that they are acting on behalf of all 345 companies that received the Order; they request that injunctive relief be extended to the thirty-nine other companies who filed material in support of the renewed motions, as well as to all other corporations to the extent that relief may be available, such as restraining the Commission from publishing their names or disclosing information contained in LB Forms. The plaintiffs, together with the remaining 333 corporations that the Commission requested to file reports are the giant manufacturing corporations of the nation. Each is possessed of substantial financial resources; each has at its command capable legal representation; each is sensitive to and fully aware of the nature of the information submitted or yet to be submitted to the Commission; each is fully aware of the claims asserted by these plaintiffs that the Commission exceeded its authority and violated both contractual and statutory provisions. Yet as of the date of argument on this motion, none of the corporations other than the named plaintiffs had filed suit against the Commission or sought to intervene in this action. While the matter was sub judice, only a handful of these other corporations have taken such action.[21] Indeed, as noted, 123 companies have already filed LB Forms. Moreover, there is no indication that any of the thirty-nine corporations other than the named plaintiffs object to disclosure of material submitted in support of the renewed motions. It may well be that, like General Electric, they do not regard disclosure as contrary to their interest. Under the circumstances, consideration of the first branch of the instant motion will be confined to the ten named plaintiffs that submitted information in support of the renewed motions to quash without consenting to its release.[22]

Plaintiffs emphasize that the relief they seek on this motion is restricted. It is limited to their claim that disclosure of the material submitted in support of the renewed motions to quash would violate the Commission's Confidentiality Rules. Plaintiffs' purpose in so confining the issue is evident from their acknowledgment that notwithstanding the Rules, disclosure may be mandated under the Freedom of Information Act[23]—in short, that the Commission's rules may contravene the statute—a point emphasized by their re[308]quest as part of the relief sought on this motion that the Commission notify each of the 345 companies that the Commission "may lack legal authority to limit" under its Confidentiality Rules access to the information submitted under the LB Program. Thus, by design, there is not now before the court the issue of whether or not the material is subject to mandatory disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act.

[21] 23 companies have joined in motions to intervene in this action. 2 other companies have filed with this court a complaint adopting by reference the allegations made in the complaint in this case. 7 companies have brought a similar action in the District Court in Delaware.

[22] Since none of the named plaintiffs have filed LB Forms, there is no need to consider the potential release of these Forms or of aggregate LB data, which plaintiffs claim can be disaggregated to reveal individual company LB data.

[3] The plaintiffs contend that the Commission's decision to examine the material to determine whether any part is confidential is inconsistent with its stated position, as set forth in its Confidentiality Rules, that all information submitted in connection with the LB Program is confidential, and that this alteration in the Commission's policy squarely presents to this court the question whether the Commission may violate its own rules or modify them after companies have acted in reliance upon them. The court does not agree that this is the focal point for decision. Whether or not the Commission has altered its policy, by making its Confidentiality Rules applicable only to information contained in or of the type that would be contained in the LB Forms, as distinguished from information submitted in connection with motions attacking the Commission's Order, is not dispositive of this motion for preliminary injunctive relief.

[4] The essential question at this juncture of the litigation is whether the plaintiffs have made out a sufficient case to warrant this court's invoking its equitable powers on their behalf. This they have failed to do. The Commission, through its attorneys appearing for it on this motion, has represented that it will give all affected companies, including plaintiffs, ten days' notice of any determination to release information submitted in support of the renewed motions to quash.[24] While the named plaintiffs have submitted in camera to this court copies of the material, disclosure of which they contend would be detrimental to their interest, it does not appear from the face of such material in what respect publication would be harmful to them. True, general statements are made to this effect, but there is no factual support therefor. And, as already noted, one plaintiff expressly consented to disclosure. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs have

[24] Thus there is no longer any question whether the Commission's promise to give ten days' notice extends to those companies, including all named plaintiffs except Kraftco Corp., which failed to follow the required procedures in filing responses to the November 27 letter.

not satisfied either branch of the oft-stated standard for the issuance of a preliminary injunction;[25] they have not demonstrated either the possibility of irreparable injury or the tipping of the balance of hardship sharply in their favor. In short, plaintiffs will suffer no injury by awaiting notice of the Commission's determination. If the Commission decides against the release of the information, obviously there will be no basis for the relief requested; if the Commission decides to release the information, plaintiffs will have ten days in which to apply for injunctive relief upon a factual showing, here lacking, that equity requires it be granted. Accordingly, plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction to enjoin the Commission from disclosing information received in connection with the LB Program is denied.

[5] Plaintiffs' second request for relief is that the Commission be directed to give notice to all the members of the purported class that by virtue of the Freedom of Information Act the Commission may lack the authority to prevent the public disclosure of all information submitted in connection with the LB Program. The purpose of such an order, in the plaintiffs' view, would be to minimize the possibility that companies will file LB Forms or other material in reliance upon the Commission's assurance that such material is confiden[309]tial and considered exempt from the disclosure provisions of the Freedom of Information Act, which assurance plaintiffs contend exceeded the Commission's authority. Clearly the named plaintiffs, which have raised this issue of the Commission's authority to protect the material submitted, are in no need of notice that such a question exists. This second request for relief is assertedly made for the benefit of the other members of the purported class, and it is denied for the same reason that the court confined consideration of the first branch of the motion to the named plaintiffs. The other corporations no doubt have access to thorough legal advice and have been sensitive to the issues posed in this action. They do not require the advice or guidance of plaintiffs, with which some are in competition; each has the capacity and resources to fend for itself.

[6] Both the plaintiffs and the Commission agree that a company need not file an LB Form if it is judicially contesting the lawfulness of the LB Program. Plaintiffs make their third request, for an order enjoining the Commission from serving default notices pending determination of the class action issue, in order to remove the need for all the members of the purported class to file lawsuits to protect themselves. The plaintiffs' expressed concern is to avoid a multiplicity of lawsuits and promote efficient judicial administration. The court is unpersuaded that efficient judicial administration requires any such order. Any problems that may arise by reason of multidistrict litigation can readily be resolved pursuant to the terms of section 1407 of Title 28 or other applicable statutory provisions.

Even if the court were moved by the desire to avoid additional complaints by the other members of the purported class, there would be no need to enjoin the issuance of default notices. Under section 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act,[26] daily fines for failure to file reports such as the LB Form do not begin to accrue until 30 days after a default notice is issued. Default notices by themselves carry no adverse consequences, and there is therefore no need to enjoin their issuance. If any company receives a default notice, it will have ample time to seek the court's protection before suffering any injury.[27] It should also be noted that the Commission may decide to enforce its Order without resort to default notices and the threat of consequent fines. Under section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act,[28] the Commission can bring suit for a mandatory injunction to enforce its Order without issuing a default notice. Upon argument of this motion, plaintiffs' counsel conceded that in such an action plaintiffs could advance as defenses thereto all claims asserted in this action.

[7] Finally, the plaintiffs request that the Clerk of the Court be authorized to receive LB Forms from those companies that elect to prepare them for the purpose of facilitating an assessment of the reliability and meaningfulness of the data to be collected. This is not a function of the Clerk's office, or one delegated to it by Congress. Moreover, there is no reason to burden the Clerk of the Court in the manner suggested; to the extent that plaintiffs believe that any data is necessary to demonstrate the strength of their claims in this lawsuit, such data may be submitted at the appropriate time in camera under adequate provisions, as was done in the instance of eleven plaintiffs herein.

For the above reasons, plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunctive relief is denied.

UNITED STATES v. ITT CONTINENTAL BAKING COMPANY*

No. 73-1290. F.T.C. Docket No. 7880.

(United States Supreme Court, February 19, 1975)

1. FAILURE TO CROSS-PETITION FOR CERTIORARI PROHIBITED RESPONDENT FROM ATTACKING JUDGMENT INSOFAR AS IT SUSTAINED IMPOSED PENALTIES.

Not having cross-petitioned for certiorari to review judgment affirming findings of trial court that it had violated FTC consent order prohibiting it from making certain business acquisitions within given time period, respondent could not attack judgment insofar as it sustained such findings and imposed penalties for such violations.

2. SUPREME COURT DOES NOT, AS A MATTER OF PRACTICE, ENTERTAIN CHALLENGE TO DECISION ON MERITS WHERE PETITION FOR CERTIORARI PRESENTS QUESTION SOLELY ON REMEDY GRANTED FOR LIABILITY FOUND TO EXIST.

Ordinarily, as matter of practice and control of Supreme Court's docket, if not its power, it does not entertain challenge to decision on the merits where only petition for certiorari presents solely a question as to the remedy granted for a liability found to exist, even if respondent is willing to accept whatever judgment has already been entered against him.

3. CONSENT DECREES SHOULD BE CONSTRUED BASICALLY AS CONTRACTS.

Since consent decrees and orders have many of the attributes of ordinary contracts, they should be construed basically as contracts, without reference to legislation government originally sought to enforce but never proved applicable through litigation.

4. CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING FORMATION OF CONSENT ORDER AND TECHNICAL MEANINGS OF WORDS USED IN DOCUMENTS ARE AIDS IN CONSTRUING CONSENT DECREES.

Since consent decree or order is to be construed for enforcement purposes basically as a contract, reliance upon certain aids to construction is proper, as with any other contract; such aids include circumstances surrounding formation of consent order, any technical meaning words used may have had to the parties, and any other documents expressly incorporated in the decree.

5. BOTH COMPLAINT AND APPENDIX WERE PROPER AIDS TO CONSTRUCTION OF CONSENT ORDER WHERE F.T.C. AND RESPONDENTS SO PROVIDED.

In interpreting Federal Trade Commission consent order for enforcement purposes, and particularly because parties themselves so provided, both the complaint and appendix incorporated by reference in the consent order were proper aids to construction of order and of agreement of which it was part.

6. SINCE THE PARTIES WERE COMPOSING A LEGAL DOCUMENT IN SETTLEMENT OF ANTITRUST MATTERS, SUPREME COURT ASSUMED THAT SPECIALIZED TERMS WERE USED RELATIVE TO THE ANTITRUST FIELD.

Supreme Court, in construing consent order issued under provisions of Clayton and Federal Trade Commission Acts, would assume that parties used words with the specialized meaning they had in the antitrust field, since they were composing a legal document in settlement of an antitrust complaint.

7. "ACQUIRING" MEANT BOTH THE ORIGINAL ACQUISITION OF ASSETS AND THEIR SUBSEQUENT RETENTION AND USE.

* Reported in 420 U.S. 223, 95 S.Ct. 926 (1975), Trade Reg. Rep. ¶60,164 at 65,485 (1975 Trade Cases), 43 L.Ed.2d 148. See also pp. 306,775 herein. For case before the Commission, see 60 F.T.C. 1183.

As used in Federal Trade Commission consent order prohibiting manufacturer of baking goods from "acquiring" other bakeries within specified time period, word "acquiring" meant both act of first obtaining assets of other bakeries and subsequent retention and use of those assets; since order banned continuing act of obtaining and retaining certain assets, violation of order was a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" order, and daily penalties could therefore be imposed under Clayton and Federal Trade Commission Acts. Since order banned the continuing act, violation of the order was a "continuing failure or neglect to obey", and daily penalties could be imposed.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 95 S.Ct. 926.)

In an action seeking to resolve a conflict between Courts of Appeals concerning proper application of the continuing violation clauses of the Clayton and Federal Trade Commission Acts toward the wording employed in a large number of F.T.C. consent orders, the Supreme Court held, under the consent order as it was written, the word "acquiring" meant both the act of obtaining assets and the subsequent retention and use of those assets, that violation of the order constituted a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" it, and daily penalties could be imposed under the Federal Trade Commission and Clayton Acts.

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice Stewart dissented and filed opinion in which Mr. Chief Justice Burger, Mr. Justice Powell and Mr. Justice Rehnquist joined. Daniel M. Friedman, Washington, D. C., for petitioner. John H. Schafer, III, Washington, D. C., for respondent.

The question presented by this case is whether violations of the prohibition of a Federal Trade Commission (FTC) consent order against "acquiring" other companies constituted single violations [929] within the meaning of the applicable civil penalty statutes, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) or whether such violations constituted a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" within the meaning of those statutes, authorizing imposition of daily penalties. The United States District Court for the District of Colorado interpreted the consent order to proscribe only the initial act of acquisition and held that therefore only a single penalty might be imposed. 1972 CCH Trade Cases ¶ 73,993 (Aug. 2, 1971). The Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit affirmed the District Court to that extent, 485 F.2d 16 (1973). A subsequent decision of the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit is in conflict, United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 493 F.2d 1259 (1974), cert. pending No. 73-1798. In interpreting a consent order worded in its pertinent terms similarly to that in this case, the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit held that acquisition is a continuing offense until it is undone, noting that the construction of "acquiring" as a single rather than continuing violation "ignores the crucial effects of an acquisition and would render nonacquisition orders virtually meaningless." 493 F.2d, at 1270.

[1,2] We granted certiorari in order to resolve this conflict between courts of appeals concerning the proper application of the continuing violation clauses of 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l) to wording employed in a large number of FTC consent orders.[1] Since we interpret "acquiring" as used in the consent order in this case to mean both the initial transaction and the maintaining of the rights obtained without resale, we hold that violation of the consent order is a continuing violation subject to daily penalties, and reverse.[2]

I

[930] The FTC alleged in 1960 that Continental Baking Company ("Continental"),[3] a major producer of bread and other bakery products, had violated § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45, by various acquisitions which "may have the effect of substantially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly. . . ." Before any decision in the case, the

---

[1] According to the Petition for Writ of Certiorari and Brief for the United States in this case, there were in all as of June 18, 1974, 68 FTC orders, of which most are consent orders but some are litigated orders, which bar acquisitions in language similar to the language of the order in this case. All of these orders bar future acquisitions but do not expressly bar the "holding" or "retention" of stock or assets acquired in violation of their terms.

[2] The petition for certiorari of the United States presented the single question whether its prayer for daily penalties was properly denied. Respondent did not cross-petition, yet seeks to raise several issues not presented by the petition. Respondent contends that (1) the three transactions for which penalties have been or are to be imposed did not violate the consent order; (2) the consent order was not binding upon ITT Continental as successor after Continental ceased to exist, so that daily penalties could not accrue for the period after the merger; and (3) daily penalties could not be imposed because the Commission had not advised respondent of the alleged violations prior to the filing of the complaint. We do not address any of these issues in deciding this case.

Respondent recognizes that not having cross-petitioned, it cannot attack the judgment insofar as it sustained the findings of violations and imposed penalties for such violations. United States v. American Railway Express Co., 265 U.S. 425, 435, 44 S.Ct. 560, 563, 68 L.Ed. 1087 (1924). Cf. Morley Construction Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co., 300 U.S. 185, 57 S.Ct. 325, 81 L.Ed. 593 (1937). Respondent argues that it may nevertheless seek to sustain the Court of Appeals' limitation on the penalties on the theory that no penalty should have been awarded at all. Ordinarily, however, as a matter of practice and control of our docket, if not of our power, we do not entertain a challenge to a decision on the merits where the only petition for certiorari presents solely a question as to the remedy granted for a liability found to exist, even if the respondent is willing to accept whatever judgment has already been entered against him. Strunk v. United States, 412 U.S. 434, 437, 93 S.Ct. 2260, 2262, 37 L.Ed.2d 56 (1973); NLRB v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48, 52 n. 4, 93 S.Ct. 74, 77, 34 L.Ed.2d 201 (1972); NLRB v. Express Publishing Co., 312 U.S. 426, 431-432, 61 S.Ct. 693, 697-698, 85 L.Ed. 930 (1941). Cf. Langnes v. Green, 282 U.S. 531, 538, 51 S.Ct. 243, 246, 75 L.Ed. 520 (1931). But see LeTulle v. Scofield, 308 U.S. 415, 60 S.Ct. 313, 84 L.Ed. 355 (1940). We follow that rule of practice in this case, particularly because the issue of whether there were any violations concerns only a particular order as applied to a discrete set of facts and therefore would not merit this Court's grant of a petition for certiorari.

The courts below did not decide the other two issues because they were not pertinent once it was determined that there was no [930] continuing violation. (The District Court did express the opinion that "it would seem unreasonable to permit the Commission to knowingly let daily penalties accrue without giving notice of the Commission's position at the earliest reasonable time," 1972 CCH Trade Cases, at 92,129, but it said that this statement was "obiter dictum.") In the absence of decisions on these questions by the courts below, we decline to address them. FTC v. Anheuser Busch, Inc., 363 U.S. 536, 542, 80 S.Ct. 1267, 1270, 4 L.Ed.2d 1385 (1960); Jaffke v. Dunham, 352 U.S. 280, 77 S.Ct. 307, 1 L.Ed.2d 314 (1957); Aetna Casualty & Surety Co. v. Flowers, 330 U.S. 464, 468, 67 S.Ct. 798, 800, 91 L.Ed. 1024 (1947). Cf. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 476, n. 7, 90 S.Ct. 1153, 1157, 25 L.Ed. 2d 491 (1970).

[3] Continental was merged on September 13, 1968, with a wholly owned subsidiary of International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation called ITT Continental Baking Company ("ITT Continental"). While ITT Continental has never contested its liability under the merger agreement for any violations of the consent order committed by Continental before the merger, it continues to maintain in this Court, as it did below, that it is not itself bound by the consent order. See n. 2, supra.

parties agreed to a proposed consent order which was approved by the Commission in May 1962. The order, among other things, prohibited Continental for 10 years[4] from "acquiring, directly or indirectly, through subsidiaries or otherwise, the whole or any part of the stock, share capital, or assets of any concern, corporate or noncorporate, engaged in any State of the United States in the production and sale of bread and bread-type rolls unless the Commission, on petition for modification of this Section III of this order permits such an acquisition. . . ." Alleging that Continental had acquired assets in three companies in violation of this order, the Government brought suit in the District of Colorado under § 11(l) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 21 (l)[5] and § 5(l)of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l),[6] for civil penalties and [931] other relief. The complaint prayed for penalties of $1,000 per day from the date of the contract of acquisition to the day of filing of the complaint on each of the three counts.

The District Court held that two of the three transactions were in fact in violation of the consent order. It declined, however, to order daily penalties, finding that "the terms of the consent order proscribe only the act of acquisition and that the violations of the consent order . . . did not constitute a 'continuing failure or neglect to obey' [15

---

[4] The consent order expired by its own terms on May 15, 1972. In April 1972, the FTC ordered ITT Continental Baking Company to show cause why the order's ban on acquisitions should not be extended until April 1977. Although the administrative law judge recommended the extension, the FTC declined to approve the extension because of inadequate proof of increased concentration in the relevant, local markets. In the Matter of ITT Continental Baking Co., No. 7880, 84 F.T.C. 1349 (1974). However, the Commission did express a continuing concern with the levels of concentration in the baking industry. It issued an order requiring ITT Continental to inform the Commission "of any acquisitions of any interest in any concern engaged in the production and sale of bread and bread-type rolls, such report to be filed not less than sixty (60) days prior to each such acquisition." Id., at 1400. ITT Continental and other members of the baking industry were informed that "Any significant mergers in this industry, and particularly any that promises to raise concentration still higher in a metropolitan area that already appears to be dangerously close to the borderline between effective competition and effective monopoly, will receive the most searching attention from this agency." Id., at 1399.

[5] 15 U.S.C. § 21(l) provides:

"(l) Any person who violates any order issued by the commission or board under subsection (b) of this section after such order has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of any such order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the commission or board each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense."

[6] 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) provides:

"(l) Any person, partnership, or corporation who violates an order of the Commis[931]sion to cease and desist after it has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $5,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States. Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense."

The maximum penalty for each violation under both 15 U.S.C. § 21(l) and 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) has since been increased from $5,000 to $10,000. Pub.L. 93-153, § 408(c), 87 Stat. 591.

Although the Government requested $1,000 per day per violation, the statutes prescribe no minimum penalty, and the District Court has discretion to determine the amount of the penalty for each violation whether the transactions are construed as single or as continuing violations. Thus, while totalling the penalty as a series of daily violations rather than as a single violation could raise substantially the total penalty assessed, the statutory scheme does not require that result, and the trial judge's determination would prevail in the absence of an abuse of discretion.

U.S.C. §§ 21(l), 45(l)] said order. . . . Once these two acquisitions were accomplished, the violations were complete." 1972 CCH Trade Cases, at 92,129. The District Court therefore entered a judgment against ITT Continental for $5,000 for each of the two violations found.[7]

The Court of Appeals reversed the District Court only insofar as it had held one of the three transactions not in violation of the consent order. It affirmed on the matter of daily penalties, holding that "whether the order was directed to the acquisition or to the acquisition and retention of assets or interests . . . [is] an interpretation of the consent order, and the result is in accordance with the prevailing standards." 485 F.2d, at 21. Remand to the District Court was ordered only for imposition of a penalty for the third violation.

II

The basic question before us is whether there has been a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" an FTC order within the meaning of 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l).

The "continuing failure or neglect to obey" provision of § 45(l) was added to the Federal Trade Commission Act in 1950, and the like provision of § 21(l) to the Clayton Act in 1959. Although the legislative history of these provisions is sparse, some examples of behavior intended to be covered by the "continuing" violation provisions do appear in the legislative history. These include continuing conspiracies to fix prices or control production, maintenance of a billboard [932] in defiance of an order prohibiting false advertising, failure to dissolve an unlawful merger, and failure to eliminate an interlocking directorate. See Letter from FTC General Counsel to Senator Fulbright, 96 Cong.Rec. 3026-3027 (1950); Hearings on H.R. 432, H.R. 2977, H.R. 6049, and S. 726 before the Antitrust Subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 21 (1959); H.R.Rep. No. 580, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 7 (1959). These violations share two discernable characteristics: the detrimental effect to the public and advantage to the violator of each continues and increases over a period of time, and the violator could eliminate the effects of the violation if it were motivated to do so, after it had begun. Without these characteristics, daily penalties for such violations would probably have no greater deterrent effect than a single penalty and accumulating daily penalties would therefore be unfair.

[7] The complaint also requested a permanent injunction enjoining future compliance with the consent order. The District Court found that it was empowered in a civil penalty proceeding based on an FTC order to grant equitable relief, and it issued an injunction in the exact words of the FTC order. This injunction expired, as did the consent order, on May 15, 1972. See n. 4, supra. Since the Court of Appeals decision in this case, Congress has amended 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) expressly to empower district courts in civil penalty proceedings to grant equitable relief. Pub.L. 93-153, § 408(c), 87 Stat. 591.

Although the complaint did not request a divestiture order, the Government later requested divestiture, and this request was embodied in the District Court's pretrial order. App., at 27. However, the District Court declined to order this relief, 1972 CCH Trade Cases at 92,129, and the Court of Appeals affirmed this denial as within the discretion of the trial court. 485 F.2d, at 21.

The legislative history also makes clear that Congress was concerned with avoiding a situation in which the statutory penalty would be regarded by potential violators of FTC orders as nothing more than an acceptable cost of violation, rather than as a deterrence to violation. For example, Senator Aiken, chief proponent of the 1950 amendment, said that if daily penalties for certain violations of the Federal Trade Commission Act were not permitted, "the fine would amount to a license in the amount of $5,000 for misrepresentation, which would be a very cheap fine, indeed." 96 Cong.Rec. 3025 (1950). Similarly, the House of Representatives Judiciary Committee said in its report on the 1959 amendments:

> Although the maximum penalty may be severe, in certain cases it would be appropriate. In the absence of the maximum penalty for a continuing offense, for example, commission and board orders with respect to mergers and interlocking directorships would be ineffective. In such cases, unless the maximum penalty applied and each day of a continuing violation considered a separate offense, an order dissolving an unlawful merger could be ignored after the mere payment of a $5,000 fine.

H.R.Rep. No. 580, 86th Cong., 1st Sess., 7, U.S.Code Cong. & Admin.News, p. 1807 (1959). See also Hearings on H.R. 432, H.R. 2977, H.R. 6049, and S. 726, supra, at 30 (Letter from FTC General Counsel).

Thus, the "continuing failure or neglect to obey" provisions of 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l) were intended to assure that the penalty provisions would provide a meaningful deterrence against violations whose effect is continuing and whose detrimental effect could be terminated or minimized by the violator at some time after initiating the violation. It seems apparent that acquisition in violation of an FTC order banning "acquiring" certain assets could be such a violation. Any anticompetitive effects of an acquisition continues as long as the assets obtained are retained, and the violator could undo or minimize any such effect by disposing of the assets at any time after the initial transaction. On the other hand, if violation of an order prohibiting "acquiring" assets were treated as a single violation, any deterrent effect of the penalty provisions would be entirely undermined, and the penalty would be converted into a minor tax upon a violation which could reap large financial benefits to the perpetrator. As we have seen, Congress added the continuing penalty provisions precisely to avoid such a result.

III

Respondent insists, however, that the underlying FTC order was a consent order proscribing only the initial act or acquisition, and that therefore the imposition of daily penalties which might otherwise be mandated cannot be permitted. Their argument is that "acquiring" in the consent order unambiguously refers only to the initial transaction, [933] and that to read it otherwise is to add the words "holding" or "retaining" assets to the literal language of the order. This addition to the language of the order, ITT Continental contends, violates the principle of a line of cases culminating in United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 91 S.Ct. 1752, 29 L.Ed.2d 256 (1971), that any command of a consent decree or order must be found "within its four corners," 402 U.S. at 682, 91 S.Ct. at 1757, and not by reference to any "purposes" of the parties or of the underlying statutes. See United States v. Atlantic Refining Co., 360 U.S. 19, 79 S.Ct. 944, 3 L.Ed.2d 1054 (1959); Hughes v. United States, 342 U.S. 353, 72 S.Ct. 306, 96 L.Ed. 394 (1952). Respondents ask us to conclude that the "acquirings" prohibited by the consent order are not capable of persisting over time, and that therefore there can be no "continuing failure or neglect to obey" the order. The Government, on the other hand, contends that the parties meant "acquiring" to include both purchase and retention of assets, and that therefore it is unnecessary to depart from the "four corners" rule of Armour to conclude that there has been a continuing violation.

In Armour, it was first determined that the construction of the consent decree urged by the Government was inconsistent with the express terms of the consent decree it was seeking to enforce.[8] The decree involved in Armour was the Meatpackers Consent Decree of 1920, entered in settlement of an antitrust case filed in district court. Paragraph Four of the decree enjoined Armour from engaging in certain businesses. The Greyhound Corporation, which was engaged in some of those businesses, acquired control of Armour. The Government claimed that this acquisition was in violation of the consent decree, contending that the purpose of the decree was structurally to separate the meatpackers from the retail food business entirely, and that the relationship, between Armour and Greyhound was therefore prohibited.

The Court noted that the language of the decree "taken in its natural sense, bars only active conduct on the part of the defendants. . . . [T]he decree does not speak in terms of relationships in general, but, rather, prohibits certain behavior, and in doing so prohibits some but not all economic interrelationship between Armour and the retail food business. . . . In short, we do not find in the decree a structural separation such as the Government claims. . . . [T]he decree leaves gaps inconsistent with so complete a separation." 402 U.S., at 678–680, 91 S.Ct., at 1755. (Emphasis supplied.)

[8] The Court in Armour noted that the Government might be able to obtain the relief sought in ways other than by construction of the consent decree. First, it could have brought a new action to enjoin the acquisition under § 7 of the Clayton Act. Second, "if the Government believed that changed conditions warranted further relief against acquisition, it could have sought modification of the Meatpackers Decree itself." 402 U. S., at 674-675, 91 S.Ct., at 1754. Respondents argue that these alternatives are also present in this case, and that it is therefore unnecessary to adopt the construction of the order urged by the Government. However, the possible availability of other means of obtaining sanctions against the acquisitions challenged here cannot preclude the Government from obtaining whatever penalties may be proper for violations of the consent order.

Similarly, in both Atlantic Refining and Hughes the Court first undertook to determine whether the language of the decree could support the construction urged by the Government and concluded that it could not. In Hughes, the decree provided that Hughes was either to dispose of his stock in certain corporation or commit the voting rights of his stock to a trustee "until [he] shall have sold his holdings of stock." 342 U.S., at 355, 72 S.Ct., at 307. The Court said that "A reading of the either/or wording would make most persons believe that Hughes was to have a choice of two different alternatives. Hughes would have [934] no such choice if the first 'alternative' was to sell the stock and the second 'alternative' was also to sell the stock." 342 U.S., at 356, 72 S.Ct., at 308. (Emphasis supplied.) Therefore, the Court concluded, the consent decree could not be construed, as the Government desired, to require Hughes to sell his stock.

In Atlantic Refining, the Court concluded that the construction urged by the Government was a "strained construction." 360 U.S., at 22, 79 S.Ct., at 946, inconsistent with the "normal meaning," 360 U.S., at 23, 79 S.Ct., at 946, of the language used. It commented that if the parties had intended the meaning urged by the Government, "one can hardly think of less appropriate language." 360 U.S., at 22, 79 S.Ct., at 946.

[3] In all three of these cases, it was only after concluding that the language, fairly read, could not support the Government's construction that the Court turned to the contention that the restrictive reading was inconsistent with the purposes of the decree and of the antitrust laws assertedly violated. It was in this context that the Court noted that, because consent decrees are normally compromises in which the parties give up something they might have won in litigation and waive their rights to litigation, it is inappropriate to search for the "purpose" of a consent decree and construe it on that basis. "[T]he decree itself cannot be said to have a purpose; rather the parties have purposes generally opposed to each other, and the resultant decree embodies as much of those opposing purposes as the respective parties have the bargaining power and skill to achieve. . . . [T]he instrument must be construed as it is written, and not as it might have been written had the plaintiff established his factual claims and legal theories in litigation."[9] Armour, 402 U.S., at 681-682, 91 S.Ct., at 1757. Thus, the basic import of

---

[9] In Hughes, the Court likewise rejected an invitation to further the asserted "purposes" of the consent decree by approving an interpretation the "language cannot support." 342 U.S., at 356, 72 S.Ct., at 307. It noted that evidence might show that the sale requirement was justified, but it regarded the construction urged by the Government as effecting "a substantial modification of the original decree." [Emphasis supplied.] 342 U.S., at 357, 72 S.Ct., at 308. While it believed this modification could be had after a proper hearing proving the need for such modification under applicable standards, it would not sanction such modification in the guise of construing a consent decree. 342 U.S. at 357-358, 72 S.Ct., at 308.

Similarly, in Atlantic Refining, while the Court agreed that the interpretation offered by the Government might

Armour, Atlantic Refining, and Hughes is that, since consent decrees and orders have many of the attributes of ordinary contracts,[10] they should be construed basically as contracts, without reference to the legisla[935]tion the Government originally sought to enforce but never proved applicable through litigation.

We note that this case differs from Armour, Hughes, and Atlantic Refining in a most important respect. In each of those cases the question of whether or not the consent decree was violated was the question for decision; in this case respondent was found to have committed violations, and the issue before us affects only the manner of assigning penalties for each violation found. Thus, respondent is subject to some penalty, and there is no possibility as there was in Armour, Atlantic Refining, and Hughes that respondent will be penalized for behavior not prohibited at all by the order "within its four corners," United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U. S., at 682, 91 S.Ct., at 1757. Nothing in the consent order suggests that although the parties agreed that Continental would refrain from "acquiring," they also agreed to limit the penalties which would otherwise apply if respondent did not refrain from that behavior. Such an agreement would be exceedingly odd, for it would undermine whatever prohibitions were imposed. As we have seen, Part II, supra, it is quite possible that under §§ 21(l) and 45(l) violation of an FTC adjudicated order against "acquiring" would be subject to daily penalties. It is not clear that Armour would require a different result merely because we are dealing with a consent order, since the parties reached no agreement at all concerning penalties to be applied in case of violation of the order.

We need not, however, determine whether §§ 21(l) and 45(l) would permit the imposition of daily penalties even if the consent order must be read as respondent maintains to proscribe only the initial act of acquisition. For we agree with the Government that the order "as it is written" does support an interpretation that the act of acquisition continues until the assets acquired are disgorged.

better effectuate the purposes of the Acts assertedly violated, this "does not warrant our substantially changing the terms of a decree to which the parties consent without any adjudication of the issues. And we agree with the District Court that accepting the Government's present interpretation would do just that." 360 U.S., at 23, 79 S.Ct., 946. (Emphasis supplied.) Again, the Court noted that modification might be appropriate, but modification disguised as construction was not. See also Liquid Carbonic Corp. v. United States, 350 U.S. 869, 76 S.Ct. 114, 100 L.Ed. 769 (1955), reversing 123 F.Supp. 653 (EDNY1954); United States v. International Harvester Co., 274 U.S. 693, 47 S.Ct. 748. 71 L.Ed. 1302 (1927).

[10] Consent decrees and orders have attributes both of contracts and of judicial decrees, or, in this case, administrative orders. While they are arrived at by negotiation between the parties and often admit no violation of law, they are motivated by threatened or pending litigation and must be approved by the Court or administrative agency. Compare United States v. Swift & Co., 286 U.S. 106, 115, 52 S.Ct. 460, 462, 76 L. Ed. 999 (1932), with the language in Armour cited in the text, p. 933, supra. Because of this dual character, consent decrees are treated as contracts for some purposes but not for others. See Jinkinson, Negotiation of Consent Decrees, 9 Antitrust Bull. 673, 675-676 (1964); Handler, Twenty-fourth Annual Antitrust Review, 72 Col.L. Rev. 1, 33-34 (1972).

IV

[4] Since a consent decree or order is to be construed for enforcement purposes basically as a contract, reliance upon certain aids to construction is proper, as with any other contract. Such aids include the circumstances surrounding the formation of the consent order, any technical meaning words used may have had to the parties, and any other documents expressly incorporated in the decree.[11] Such reliance does not in any way depart from the "four corners" rule of Armour.

[5] In this case, the consent order was part of an agreement between the parties entitled "Agreement Containing Consent Order to Divest and to Cease and Desist." The agreement incorporates by reference an "appendix," which sets forth at length the background leading to the complaint and the proposed order. In addition, the agreement provides that "[t]he complaint may be used in construing the terms of the order." Since the parties themselves so provided, both the appendix and the complaint are proper aids to the construction of the order and of the agreement of which it is part.[12]

The complaint alleged that Continental had pursued "a continuous practice of [936] acquiring various bakeries throughout the United States," (emphasis supplied), which were thereby "eliminated . . . as independent competitive factors in the manufacture, sale and distribution of bread and bread-type rolls . . . ." If the "acquiring against which the order and the complaint incorporated in it was directed were limited to the single transaction by which Continental obtained rights in another company, it is hard to see why the effect which the complaint alleged followed from acquisitions would necessarily occur. Even if Continental had sold the companies acquired as soon as the initial transactions were completed to other, independent companies, the bakeries would not have been "eliminated . . . as independent competitive factors."

Reference to the appendix also supports the conclusion that "acquiring" as used in the order means both the initial transaction granting Continental rights in an independent bakery and the maintaining of those rights without resale. The appendix notes that "One of the principal problems in the baking industry is the tendency towards concentration and the continuous growth of major baking companies through acquisition. Such acquisitional growth and tendency towards concentration places in the hands of a few large companies the means to set the pattern of competition. . . . If this order is adopted by the Commission, the respondent's alleged continuous practice of acquiring companies baking and selling bread and bread-type rolls will be brought to a halt . . . ." (Emphasis supplied.) It is apparent that the "acquisitional growth" referred to in the appendix cannot be achieved merely by discrete transactions without reference to what is done with the assets obtained after those transactions. If Continental were merely a speculator in baking companies, buying assets in them and selling them soon thereafter, it would not necessarily create "through acquisition" a "tendency towards concentration" giving it the "means to set the pattern of competition." Thus, "acquiring" in both the appendix and the order, parts of the same agreement, must mean obtaining and retaining assets, not merely the former.

[11] "Assuming that a consent decree is to be interpreted as a contract, it would seem to follow that evidence of events surrounding its negotiation and tending to explain ambiguous terms would be admissible in evidence." Handler, Twenty-fourth Annual Antitrust Review, 72 Col.L.Rev. 1, 23 n. 148 (1972).

[12] Respondent argues that even if the complaint and appendix can be used as aids to construction, they only show that the parties could use broader language than that in the order itself, making the limited language actually used highly significant and controlling. One Court of Appeals has used similar reasoning to approve a strict reading of a consent decree which was accompanied by a collateral agreement. Artvale, Inc. v. Rugby Fabrics Corp., 303 F.2d 283 (CA 2 1962). However, this reasoning is erroneous as applied to this case. Where parties in one agreement include both a consent order and an explanation of that order, and also provide that the complaint is to be used to con-[936]strue the order, it seems logical to conclude that, at least as to interpretations not precluded by the words of the order itself, the collateral documents can and should be used to give meaning to the words of the order.

[6] Even without the aid of these explanatory documents properly usable to construe this particular order, we would have to conclude that "acquiring" as used in an antitrust decree or order continues until the assets obtained are disgorged. As the foregoing analysis of the ancillary documents here illustrates, "acquiring" and related words do not, as respondent insists, unambiguously refer to a single transaction. Rather, as a matter of ordinary usage they can, and in the antitrust context they do, encompass the continuing act of obtaining certain rights and treating them as one's own. We must assume that the parties here used the words with the specialized meaning they have in the antitrust field, since they were composing a legal document in settlement of an antitrust complaint.

We need not go beyond the Clayton Act itself to conclude that "acquisition" as used in § 7 of the Act means holding as well as obtaining assets. The Act provides that the FTC, if it finds a violation of § 7, can require a party to "divest itself of the stock, or other share capital, or assets, held . . . contrary to the provisions of [§ 7 of the Clayton Act]." 15 U.S.C. § 21(b). (Emphasis supplied.) Thus, the framers of the Act did not regard the terms "acquire" and "acquisition" as unambiguously banning only the initial transaction of acquisition; rather, they read the ban against "acquisition" to include a ban against holding certain assets.

This Court's opinions reflect the same understanding. For example, in FTC v. Western Meat Co., 272 U.S. 554, 47 S.Ct. [937] 175, 71 L.Ed. 405 (1926), the Court, in discussing an FTC order based on a violation of § 7, said that "The order here questioned was entered when respondent actually held and owned the stock contrary to law. The Commission's duty was to prevent continuance of this unlawful action by an order directing that it cease and desist therefrom and divest itself of what it had no right to hold." 272 U.S., at 559, 47 S.Ct., at 177. (Emphasis supplied.) See also Arrow-Hart & Hegeman Elec. Co. v. FTC, 291 U.S. 587, 596-599, 54 S.Ct. 532, 536, 78 L.Ed. 1007 (1934).

Similarly, this Court's opinion in United States v. du Pont, 353 U.S. 586, 77 S.Ct. 872, 1 L.Ed.2d 1057 (1957), rests upon the conclusion that "acquisition" can mean, and in the context of § 7 of the Clayton Act does mean, both the purchase of rights in another company and the retention of those rights.

In du Pont, a § 7 case was brought in 1949 but based on a purchase of stock by du Pont in 1917-1919. It was argued that "the Government could not maintain this action in 1949 because § 7 is applicable only to the acquisition of stock and not to the holding or subsequent use of stock." 353 U.S., at 596-597, 77 S.Ct., at 879. Thus, du Pont was seeking to interpret "acquire" as used in § 7[13] much as respondent here seeks to read "acquiring" in the consent decree.

The Court in du Pont rejected the interpretation urged upon it. Instead, the Court held that there is a violation "any time when the acquisition threatens to ripen into a prohibited effect. . . . To accomplish the congressional aim, the Government may proceed at any time that an acquisition may be said with reasonable probability to contain a threat that may lead to a restraint of commerce or tend to create a monopoly of a line of commerce." 353 U.S., at 597, 77 S.Ct., at 879. Thus, there can be a violation at some time later even if there was clearly no violation—no realistic threat of restraint of commerce or creation of a monopoly—at the time of the initial acts of acquisition. Clearly, this result can obtain only because "acquisition" under § 7 is not a discrete transaction but a status which continues until the transaction is undone.[14]

[938] [7] Thus, under the order "as it is written" "acquiring" must

[13] The first paragraph of § 7, at the time the du Pont case was brought, provided:

"That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community, or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

The statute was amended in 1950 to provide:

"No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly."

While the change in the wording is substantial, no reason suggests itself why the meaning of "acquire" and "acquisition" should differ in the two versions. Du Pont was decided several years after the 1950 amendments and makes not the slightest suggestion that the result pertinent here would not obtain under the new version.

[14] The dissent in du Pont recognized that this was the import of this holding, with which it disagreed. 353 U.S., at 619-621, 77 S.Ct., at 890-891 (Burton, J., dissenting).

Some lower federal courts have also recognized that the status approach to acquisition is the proper one. See Gottesman v. General Motors Corp., 414 F.2d 956, 965 (CA 2 1969): "[T]he very acquisition and position of potential control which was found violative of the Clayton Act as of 1949 [in du Pont] continued through 1961. . . . [W]hat was mean both the act of first obtaining assets and the retention and use of those assets. To conclude otherwise would be to ignore the flexibility of the English language, as well as the circumstances surrounding the order and the context in which the parties were operating. And, since the order bans the continuing act of obtaining and retaining certain assets, a violation of the order is a "continuing failure or neglect to obey" it, and daily penalties may be imposed under 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l).

Because the Court of Appeals erred in concluding that daily penalties could not be imposed, we reverse and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Reversed and remanded.

Mr. Justice STEWART, with whom THE CHIEF JUSTICE, Mr. Justice POWELL, and Mr. Justice REHNQUIST join, dissenting.

The respondent Continental made corporate acquisitions in violation of a 1962 consent order that, in pertinent part, prohibited Continental from "acquiring" described baking companies. The Government sought to impose daily penalties upon Continental for the continued holding of those assets. The Government's theory was that daily penalties were appropriate because Continental's retention of the assets was a "continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order," within the meaning of the relevant civil penalties statutes, 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l), 45(l).[1] The issue in this case is whether the consent order can be so construed.[2] The District Court and the Court of Appeals ruled that the consent order prohibited only the distinct acts of "acquiring" the bakeries, not the "retaining" or the "holding" of the assets after acquisition. The Court of Appeals indicated that an order to divest would have been an appropriate remedy for the unlawful acquisitions, but held that the retention of the assets was not in itself a continuing refusal to obey the consent order such as would support the sanction of daily penalties. I think that under our controlling precedents, the District Court and the Court of Appeals were clearly correct.

The governing rule of construction, and its rationale, were stated plainly and aptly by this Court in United States v. Armour & Co., 402 U.S. 673, 681-682, 91 S.Ct. 1752, 1757, 29 L.Ed.2d 256 (1971):

> Consent decrees are entered into by parties to a case after careful negotiation has produced agreement on their precise terms. The parties waive their right to litigate the unlawful was du Pont's status as stockholder in General Motors, and that status continued until divestiture." (Emphasis supplied); United States v. Schine, 260 F.2d 552, 555-556 (CA 2 1958): "[I]t is the maintenance of conditions in violation [938] of the decree [prohibiting acquisitions, among other things] which is the charge against respondents." Therefore, the court in Schine concluded, it was irrelevant that the initial transactions occurred prior to the statutory limitations period.

[1] These provisions are set out in full in the Court's opinion, ante, at 930 nn. 5, 6. [p. 1192 herein]

[2] For the reasons stated by the Court, I agree that the other issues that the respondent seeks to raise in this case need not and should not be addressed.

> issues involved in the case and thus save themselves the time, expense, and inevitable risk of litigation. Naturally, the agreement reached normally embodies a compromise; in exchange for the saving of cost and elimination of risk, the parties each give up something they might have won had they proceeded with the litigation. Thus the decree itself cannot be said to have a purpose; rather the parties have purposes, generally opposed to each other, and the resultant decree embodies as much of those opposing purposes as the respective parties have the bargaining power and skill to achieve. For these reasons, the scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it. Because the defendant has, by the decree, waived his right to litigate the issues raised, a right guaranteed to him by the Due Process Clause, the [939] conditions upon which he has given that waiver must be respected, and the instrument must be construed as it is written, and not as it might have been written had the plaintiff established his factual claims and legal theories in litigation. (Emphasis added) (footnote omitted.)

See also United States v. Atlantic Refining Co., 360 U.S. 19, 79 S.Ct. 944, 3 L.Ed.2d 1054 (1959); Hughes v. United States, 342 U.S. 353, 72 S.Ct. 306, 96 L. Ed. 394 (1952).

The application of this straightforward standard to the consent order here is hardly a difficult task. The order literally prohibits only the "acquiring" of the forbidden assets. Once an acquisition was consummated, the violation was complete. A prohibition on the retention of assets cannot be found in any provision of the order. Because the order is a compromise agreement negotiated without any adjudication of antitrust liability, we are not at liberty under Armour to construe the unambiguous term "acquiring" in the light of conjecture or argument about the "purposes" of the decree or of the parties. We may not, consistent with Armour, conclude that the Government intended that the order should prohibit as a continuing offense the retention of unlawfully acquired assets, when the Government did not insist upon language objectively manifesting that intention. Nor may we conclude that Continental agreed to restrict its future business conduct or become subject to penalties in any manner not clearly delineated in the order itself. The provisions of the order are something less than the Government could have sought and might have obtained. The rule of construction of consent decrees, however, depends not upon an expedient construct of what the parties are thought to have intended, but upon the explicit provisions to which the parties have agreed.

After giving a casual nod in the direction of the standard of construction required by Armour, the Court embarks upon a laborious search for "purposes" that are "incorporated in" the consent order in order to change the meaning of the unambiguous term "acquiring." We are led through the antecedent complaint, through an appendix to the consent order, through the intricacies of an opinion of this Court construing the term "acquisition" in light of the policies underlying the Clayton Act, and through the legislative history of the statutory provisions that impose daily penalties for continuing refusals to obey Commission orders. Drawing upon these disparate sources, the Court determines that the consent order, despite its literal language, must be construed to prohibit not only the proscribed acquisitions but also the "retention" of unlawfully acquired assets.[3] One is reminded of an observation once made by Mr. Justice Grier in a somewhat different context: "[T]he fact that it required so ingenious and labored an argument by my learned brother to vindicate such a construction . . . seems to me, of itself, conclusive evidence that the construction should not be given to it." [940] Chenango Bridge Co. v. Binghamton Bridge Co., 70 U.S. (3 Wall.) 51, 83, 18 L.Ed. 137 (dissenting opinion).

What the Court does today is to proclaim a new rule of construction for consent orders or decrees totally at odds with our previous decisions:

> Since a consent decree or order is to be construed for enforcement purposes basically as a contract, reliance upon certain aids to construction is proper, as with any other contract. Such aids include the circumstances surrounding the formation of any consent order, any technical meaning words used may have had to the parties, and any other documents expressly incorporated in the decree. Ante, at 935. [p. 1197 herein]

This novel approach, for which the Court cites not a single supporting precedent, is directly contrary to the "four corners" rule of Armour. For an inquiry into the purpose of a consent decree is precisely what that rule forecloses: "[T]he scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it." 402 U.S., at 682, 91 S.Ct. at 1757. The Court today thus indulges in precisely the exercise that Armour sought to preclude: a wide-ranging search for a "purpose" in a decree that, as explained in Armour, cannot be said to have a purpose except to delineate explicitly the terms and provisions of the settlement that the parties negotiated.[4]

Before straining to pull the Government's chestnuts out of the fire,

[3] Upon this premise, the Court then proceeds to hold that the conjured-up "continuing offense" of retaining these assets is a "continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order" within the meaning of the daily penalty statutes. 15 U.S.C. §§ 21(l) and 45(l). But even if the consent order could be correctly read to prohibit not only the acquisition of the described assets but also the retention of assets unlawfully acquired, it is far from crystal clear that the "continuing offense" of retaining the assets would be a "continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order" within the meaning of the daily penalty statutes. Penalty provisions must be strictly construed, and due process requires that such provisions must give fair warning of the conduct that invokes their extraordinary sanction. Cf. Giacco v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 86 S.Ct. 518, 15 L.Ed.2d 447 (1966). The legislative history of the daily penalty statutes, as recited in the Court's opinion, shows that the mischief sought to be remedied was precisely the mischief to which Congress addressed its language: a "continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order," as, for example, the refusal to divest after a specific order of divestiture has been entered.

[4] Whatever the utility of extrinsic aids in construing a typical commercial contract, this technique is singularly inappropriate in an area where certainty of prohibition is necessary and where, as Armour makes clear, there can be found no guiding purpose underlying a negotiated decree. Moreover, even assuming, arguendo, that such aids might be admissible to construe borderline issues of application—for example, whether a particular acquired company was engaged in the production of "bread-type" rolls within the meaning of the consent order—such aids must not be used to impose a wholly separate prohibitory requirement upon a company that consented to be bound only by the plain language of the consent order. This is demonstrably not a case of ambiguity or of borderline construction. It is a case, instead, where the Court has used extrinsic aids to alter a term that is, on its face, wholly unambiguous.

The Court relies upon the decision in United States v. du Pont, 353 U.S. 586, 77 S.Ct. 872, 1 L.Ed.2d 1057 (1957), for the Court should count with greater care the costs of abandoning the rule stated in Armour. Until today, the parties to any consent decree could have confidence that its explicit terms alone would control the judicial construction of its prohibitory language. Now, otherwise unambiguous terms of a consent decree may be construed in light of such considerations as the antecedent complaint, the "meaning" of antitrust decisions, and the policies said to underlie the statutory provision for daily penalties. Certainty and reasoned reliance have always been the sine qua non of the consent orders that terminate about 70 to 80% of the antitrust complaints that are filed by the Justice Department.[5] But after today's decision that kind of certainty will no longer exist. For there will be no apparent limit on the power of the judiciary to alter the plain language of a decree in light of the "circumstances surrounding the order and the context in which the parties were operating." Ante, at 938 [p. 1200 herein]. If a negotiated consent decree fails to leave a dispute clearly [941] and firmly settled, the necessary result will be that those charged with antitrust violations will be less inclined to settle their cases and more apt to insist upon time-consuming and costly litigation. Today's decision will also pose serious difficulties for the enforcement of all existing and all future consent decrees. For, as Mr. Justice Jackson once observed, "the validity of a doctrine does not depend on whose ox it gores."[6] The same purpose-oriented techniques of construction that the Court today serves up to expand this consent order beyond its terms can be expected to be availed of by alleged violators of consent orders who will seek to narrow and thereby to evade the plain language of any prohibition.

The Court concludes that "if violation of an order prohibiting 'acquiring' assets were treated as a single violation, any deterrent effect of the penalty provisions would be entirely undermined, and the penalty would be converted into a minor tax upon a violation which could reap large financial benefits for the perpetrator." Ante, at 932 [p. 1194 herein]. This is not merely overstatement; it is incorrect. Both the parties agree, and the Court of Appeals held, that an order to divest unlawfully acquired assets is an appropriate remedy for violation of a consent order barring acquisition. Moreover, the Armour rule of construction would not impair in any way the power of the Govern-the proposition that the term "acquire" in a consent order is a term of art that prohibits a "status which continues until the transaction is undone." Ante, at 937. But the Court's reliance on the policy considerations discussed in the du Pont opinion is wholly inconsistent with the Armour rule. The opinion in United States v. du Pont does not, in any event, render the term "acquiring" in a consent decree a term of art. That case addressed the positive reach of the Clayton Act under certain circumstances. The Court fails to explain how its opinion there has served to transform the plain term "acquiring" into a "term of art" that would by common understanding have the meaning that the Court today ascribes to it.

ment, in future cases, to obtain through negotiations consent orders that contain a clear and explicit description of the conduct that is prohibited.[7]

In my view, the Court's departure from precedent threatens to retard significantly the effective use of consent decrees in the administration of the antitrust laws. I would adhere to the rule stated in Armour that "the scope of a consent decree must be discerned within its four corners, and not by reference to what might satisfy the purposes of one of the parties to it." 402 U.S., at 682, 91 S.Ct., at 1757 (emphasis added). Applying this standard, I would affirm the considered judgments of the District Court and the Court of Appeals.

[7] The Gqvernment informs us that as of May 1974 there were outstanding 54 consent orders with language that prohibits acquiring certain assets but does not expressly prohibit the retaining of these assets. This Court need not assume that flagrant violations of consent orders will occur, nor that the remedies of divestiture and fine for the single offense of acquisition will not adequately deter unlawful conduct.

[*] Reported in 396 F.Supp. 1108 (1975). See also, pp. 1293, 1474 herein.

The Administrative Procedure Act did not contain any provision depriving federal district court of jurisdiction to judicially review final agency action of Federal Trade Commission.

6. IN VIEW OF FITNESS OF ISSUES RAISED FOR JUDICIAL REVIEW AND IN VIEW OF HARDSHIP IF COURT REFUSED TO HEAR CASE, ISSUES PRESENTED WERE RIPE FOR PREENFORCEMENT REVIEW.

   Issues presented by action challenging Federal Trade Commission order in regard to preparation of certain business reports were ripe for preenforcement review in view of fitness of issues raised for judicial review and in view of hardship to plaintiffs if court refused to hear the case.

7. F.T.C. LINE OF BUSINESS ORDERS CONSTITUTED FINAL AGENCY ACTION UNDER ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT.

   Orders of the Federal Trade Commission requiring certain line of business reports by plaintiffs constituted final agency action within review provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act.

8. HARDSHIPS ARISING FROM F.T.C. ORDER REQUIRING CERTAIN BUSINESS REPORTS WOULD BE VIEWED AS SUFFICIENTLY GREAT, IMMEDIATE AND COMPELLING TO RENDER CONTROVERSY RIPE FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

   Where plaintiffs who sought preenforcement review of a Federal Trade Commission order requiring certain business reports would be subject to an [1109] enforcement action, criminal sanctions of up to three years' imprisonment, a $5,000 fine, civil penalties of $100 per day, and burden of compliance was substantial in that significant, time-consuming and costly efforts would be required to prepare required reports, such hardships would be viewed as sufficiently great, immediate and compelling to render controversy ripe for preenforcement review.

9. MOVING PARTY MUST GENERALLY SHOW A REASONABLE PROBABILITY OF EVENTUAL SUCCESS, THAT IT WILL BE IRREPARABLY INJURED pendente lite, THE POSSIBILITY OF HARM TO OTHERS, AND PUBLIC INTEREST AS A PREREQUISITE TO ISSUANCE OF A PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

   As a prerequisite to issuance of a preliminary injunction moving party must generally show a reasonable probability of eventual success, that it will be irreparably injured pendente lite if relief is not granted, possibility of harm to other interested persons and public interest.

10. GROUNDS THAT PLAINTIFFS HAD ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW BASED ON RAISING LEGAL DEFENSES IN ENFORCEMENT PROCEEDING, WHERE NO ENFORCEMENT PROCEEDING WAS INITIATED WAS INSUFFICIENT TO DENY PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF AGAINST ENFORCEMENT OF LINE OF BUSINESS ORDERS ISSUED BY F.T.C.

    Preliminary injunctive relief against enforcement of a Federal Trade Commission order requiring furnishing of certain business reports would not be denied on ground that plaintiffs had an adequate remedy at law based on raising legal defenses in enforcement proceeding where in fact no enforcement proceeding had been filed by the Federal Trade Commission.

11. EVIDENCE ESTABLISHED PLAINTIFFS WOULD SUFFER IMMEDIATE IRREPARABLE INJURY, BASED ON COST OF COMPLYING WITH F.T.C. ORDER.

    Evidence, in action wherein plaintiffs sought preliminary injunctive relief against a Federal Trade Commission order requiring furnishing of certain business reports established that plaintiffs would suffer immediate, irreparable injury based on unrecoverable costs and commitment of diverse business resources incident to preparation and compliance with Commission order.

12. THOUGH POSSIBILITY OF HARM TO OTHERS WAS NONEXISTENT OR AT BEST SPECULATIVE, PREENFORCEMENT PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF WOULD NOT BE DENIED.

Preenforcement preliminary injunctive relief against a Federal Trade Commission order requiring preparation of certain business reports would not be denied on basis of possibility of harm to other interested persons where such possibility of harm was nonexistent or at best speculative.

13. CONFLICT WITH PUBLIC INTEREST NOT BEING ESTABLISHED WAS INSUFFICIENT TO PRECLUDE PREENFORCEMENT PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION AGAINST F.T.C. LINE OF BUSINESS ORDER.

Preenforcement preliminary injunctive relief against a Federal Trade Commission order requiring certain line of business reports would not be denied on basis of conflict with public interest where, under the evidence, it was not established that public interest would be harmed by delay in corporate plaintiffs' filing their line of business reports.

14. PLAINTIFFS FAILED TO ESTABLISH A REASONABLE PROBABILITY OF PROBABLE SUCCESS IN LITIGATION CHALLENGING VALIDITY OF ORDER, BUT DID ESTABLISH SUFFICIENT PROBABILITY OF SUCCESS ON BASIS THAT F.T.C. VIOLATED ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT.

Certain business corporations seeking preenforcement preliminary injunctive relief against a Federal Trade Commission order requiring line of business reports did not establish a reasonable probability of eventual success in litigation challenging validity of the order on basis of unreasonable search and seizure, failure to comply with appropriate statutes in evolving the LB-report, on theory of taking of property without due process, on theory of vagueness of instructions in the LB form, on theory of undue burden imposed by the order, or on theory of lack of statutory authority, but plaintiffs did establish a sufficient probability of success on merits on basis that Commission violated the Administrative Procedure Act in promulgating its LB program.

15. WHEN ITS ACTION CONSTITUTES RULE-MAKING, F.T.C. IS BOUND BY PROCEDURES SET FORTH IN THE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT.

Mere fact that Federal Trade Commission seeks disclosure of information under broad authority granted by the Federal Trade Commission Act does not relieve it of the necessity to proceed in a manner prescribed by the Administrative Procedure Act when its action, whatever the Commission may label it, constitutes rule-making.

16. INVESTIGATORY AND RULE-MAKING POWERS ARE NOT MUTUALLY EXCLUSIVE, BUT COMPLEMENTARY, AS CONTEMPLATED BY F.T.C. ACT.

The investigatory and rule-making powers contemplated by the Federal Trade Commission Act are not mutually exclusive but complementary.

17. INSTITUTION OF LINE OF BUSINESS PROGRAM UNDER FTC'S BROAD STATUTORY POWERS OF INVESTIGATION DOES NOT IPSO FACTO COMPEL CONCLUSION THAT PROGRAM INVOLVED NO ELEMENTS OF RULE MAKING UNDER A.P.A.

[1110] Fact that Federal Trade Commission's line of business-reporting program was instituted pursuant to its broad statutory powers of investigation did not ipso facto compel conclusion that such program involved no elements of rule making contemplated by the Administrative Procedure Act.

18. FACT THAT REPORTING AND RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS OF FTC LB PROGRAM HAD GENERALIZED ACROSS-THE-BOARD APPLICABILITY TO A LARGE NUMBER OF INDUSTRIAL CONCERNS AND REQUIREMENTS WERE PROSPECTIVE IN EFFECT, THE PROGRAM POSSESSED EARMARKS OF RULE MAKING.

Federal Trade Commission order requiring a line of business-reporting program possessed earmarks of rule making for purposes of requiring compliance with Administrative Procedure Act in view of fact the reporting and rule-making requirements of the program had generalized across-the-board applicability to a large number of industrial concerns, and requirements were prospective in effect requiring compliance on or before specified future dates.

19. FOR PURPOSES OF DETERMINING RIGHT TO PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIVE RELIEF, RULES PROMULGATED BY FTC IN WAY OF ORDER MIGHT BE FOUND INVALID WHERE PROCEDURES UTILIZED DID NOT COMPLY WITH THE APA.

Where procedures utilized by government did not constitute substantial compliance with the APA, rules promulgated by FTC in way of orders might, for purposes of determining right to preliminary injunctive relief, be found invalid.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 396 F.Supp. 1108.)

On petition for declaratory and preliminary injunctive relief, court held that plaintiffs failed to show probable success of challenging validity of order on basis of unreasonable search and seizure, failure to comply with appropriate statutes, or on theories of taking of property without due process, of vagueness of instructions in LB form, of undue burden imposed by order or of lack of statutory authority; however, plaintiffs did establish sufficient probability of success on merits on basis F.T.C. violated the Administrative Procedure Act.

Injunction order in accordance with opinion; motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction denied.

OPINION

MURRAY M. SCHWARTZ, District Judge.

This case arises from a complaint filed by A. O. Smith Corporation ("Smith") and six other corporations seeking a declaratory judgment and preliminary and permanent injunctive relief against the Federal Trade Commission ("Commission" or "FTC"), its chairman and each commissioner separately, and the Comptroller General of the United States. This suit is, in effect, a request for pre-enforcement judicial review of an order by the Commission requiring the plaintiffs, along with 338 other large corporations engaged in manufacturing in the United States, to file with the Commission annual line-of-business reports ("LB Reports").[1] The grounds for relief asserted in the complaint are, inter alia, lack of statutory authority to issue the order, failure to follow the rule-making procedure prescribed by the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"), undue burden required to prepare the report, and various constitutional grounds.

[1] From the record it appears the Commission at one time contemplated receipt of LB Reports from 500 large manufacturing corporations representing 70% of the manufacturing capacity of the United States. The record is silent as to why the number of proposed reporting corporations was reduced to 345 and the percentage of manufacturing capacity represented by those companies. Nonetheless, one can infer the percentage of manufacturing capacity of the proposed reporting companies is significant.

Defendants responded by filing a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction.[2] [1111] Defendants' motion was joined for hearing with plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunction. This opinion contains the Court's decision on defendants' motion and constitutes its findings of fact and conclusions of law as to plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunction.

I. BACKGROUND

Pleadings, affidavits, and briefs establish the following undisputed facts.

During the period from August 1973 to August 1974 the Federal Trade Commission was evolving a plan which eventually became the current Line-of-Business Program ("LB Program"). On August 3, 1973 an early proposal for annual line-of-business reports was submitted to the Office of Management and Budget ("OMB") for approval as then required under the Federal Reports Act, 44 U.S.C.A. § 3501 et. seq. (1969).[3] Some oral comments apparently were received by OMB on the proposal, but no statement of approval was forthcoming from OMB, as then required by law, 44 U.S.C.A. § 3509(2) (1969), before Congress amended the Federal Reports Act on November 16, 1973 by enactment of Section 409 of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act, P.L. 93-153, 44 U.S. C.A. §§ 3502, 3512 (1975 Supp.).

In March 1974 the Commission forwarded for approval a revised LB Report form to the Comptroller General of the United States, who assumed certain responsibilities previously held by OMB. During April and May of 1974 the Comptroller General received oral and written comments on the program. On May 13, 1974 the Acting Comptroller General formally approved with certain "provisions" the LB Report form which had been submitted to that office for review.

Meanwhile, the Business Roundtable ("Roundtable"), an unincorporated association of which most plaintiffs are members, through its attorneys, requested the Commission to hold hearings on its various proposed annual LB Reports by letters dated November 13, 1973, January 29, 1974 and March 21, 1974. The last letter also mentioned the necessity of the Commission complying with the APA. By letter dated April 4, 1974 the Commission denied these requests.

In May 1974 the Roundtable made a letter request that the [2] Defendants' motion cites "lack of jurisdiction" without specifying whether subject matter or personal jurisdiction is implied. Defendants' Brief Outline cites an absence of "subject matter jurisdiction," and the brief itself makes clear this includes issues of justiciability (e.g. ripeness) and limitations on a court's discretion to invoke equitable remedies.

[3] The statutes in question reference the "Director of the Bureau of the Budget." A 1970 Administrative Reorganization resulted in the terminology of Office of Management and Budget.

Commission "fully comply" with the requirements of Section 409 of P.L. 93-153 by engaging in "meaningful exchange between the Commission and business representatives to 'advance the ease and accuracy of line-of-business reporting' " as expressed in a provision of the Acting Comptroller General's letter to the Commission and by exploring coordinating or consolidating the Commission's line-of-business data needs with data collected by other Federal agencies. The same letter again drew attention to the necessity for compliance with the APA. The Commission denied all requests and asserted the APA was inapplicable by letter dated June 11, 1974.

On June 14, 1974 a meeting was held between top financial executives from several domestic corporations assembled by the Roundtable and the Commission's Bureau of Economics staff. Views were exchanged but apparently not to the satisfaction of the Roundtable, which next requested by letter dated the same day that proposals raised by corporate representatives at the meeting be presented directly to the Commission at a special meeting. This last letter was never acknowledged, nor was such a meeting ever held.

On August 2, 1974 the Commission issued a "Resolution Requiring Annual Line of Business Reports from Corporations," which appeared on August 22 in the Federal Register. By this act the Commission resolved to adopt the LB Program requiring annual LB Reports to include detailed information as to [1112] each corporation's affiliations and a breakdown of costs, profits, assets, and other expenditures according to line-of-business categories established by the Commission. Also on August 2, 1974 the Commission issued an identical "Order to File Special Report" ("Order") to 345 of the nation's largest manufacturing companies, requiring them to complete and file annual LB Reports. The initial report limited the data required as to each firm's fiscal year ending between July 1, 1973 and June 30, 1974. Subsequent reports were to include all the data indicated as required by the form itself although at oral argument the FTC indicated the LB Report form might be modified in the future. This Order and the accompanying form were served upon the instant plaintiffs on varying dates between August 13, 1974 and August 23, 1974. Filing with the Commission was required within 150 days of receipt of the Order or within 150 days of the end of the fiscal year, whichever was later. The Order ended with this warning: "You are advised that penalties may be imposed under applicable provisions of Federal law for failure to file this report or for the filing of a false report."

Pursuant to the Commission's Procedures and Rules of Practice, each plaintiff seasonably moved to quash the aforementioned orders in August and September 1974. On September 24, 1974 the Commission denied the motions of four of the plaintiffs, subject to a limited right to renew such motions "solely on the issues of undue burden and lack of confidentiality." In its denial the Commission stated neither the original motion to quash nor filing of a renewal motion would toll the 150 day period directed by the Commission. This right to renew or amend was also made available to those whose original motions had not yet been acted upon by the Commission. Five of the seven plaintiffs did timely renew or amend their motions to quash, the last having been filed on October 29, 1974. The Commission not having disposed of plaintiffs' outstanding motions by December 27, 1974, and the 150 day period having nearly drawn to a close, counsel for plaintiffs wrote to the Commission pointing out its inaction was effectively becoming a denial on the merits in a manner violative of due process. On the same date, the Commission denied the three remaining plaintiffs' motions to quash; on January 7, 1975 the Commission denied all renewed or amended motions filed by plaintiffs.

Because the Commission's staff required considerable time to respond to all of these motions, the Director of the Commission's Bureau of Economics granted a thirty day extension of time to file the LB Report to all plaintiffs. The new deadline for filing was February 10, 1975 as to one plaintiff, February 17 as to five plaintiffs, and February 19 as to one plaintiff. Argument was had on plaintiffs' and defendants' motions on February 5, 1975. By letter to the Court dated February 7, 1975 the Commission advised that no injunctive enforcement action would be sought against any plaintiff until after February 19, 1975, and no notice of default would be served upon any plaintiff until this Court had issued its opinion on the pending motions.[4] Disposition of the motions requires a discussion of jurisdiction, ripeness, and the merits. With regard to the latter, all expressions are in the procedural context of an application for preliminary injunction.

II. JURISDICTION

[1,2] But for the ripeness question raised by the seeking of pre-enforcement [1113] review of Federal agency action, this Court has non-discretionary jurisdiction to entertain plaintiffs' complaint. Because this case arises under the Federal Trade Commission Act, September 26, 1914, 38 Stat. 717, as amended, 15 U.S. C.A. § 41 et seq., and the requisite amount appears to be in controversy as to each

---

[4] The Court has been advised two other actions against the FTC are currently pending in the Southern District of New York which involve suits by several other corporations required to file LB Reports. In addition, the Commission has within the last two weeks initiated enforcement action in the Southern District of New York. Finally, six other actions similar to the matter sub judice were filed in this district on February 14, 1975.

plaintiff, this Court has Federal Question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1331.[5] Alternatively, jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1337[6] is obvious because the Federal Trade Commission Act falls clearly within the ambit of that statute. Because jurisdiction is so easily found, other bases of jurisdiction urged by plaintiffs as conferring jurisdiction will not be considered.

[3] Because plaintiffs urge this Court to review action of a federal agency, reference must be made to the APA to ascertain whether it contains any provision which would deprive the Court of jurisdiction. Plaintiffs urge they are aggrieved by final agency action and are entitled to judicial review thereof under Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C.A. §§ 702, 704. In support, they cite the August 2, 1974 order and the final denial of their motions to quash dated January 7, 1975. There is a presumption of reviewability of final agency action under the APA.[7] Reference to the statute indicates two grounds upon which review is to be denied:

> § 701(a). This chapter [on judicial review] applies, according to the provisions thereof, except to the extent that—
> (1) statutes preclude judicial review;[8] or

[4,5] The second ground is neither urged by defendants nor is any basis for asserting it readily obvious to the Court. As to the first ground, the legislative intent to preclude review must be "clear and convincing." Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 141, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967).[9] Defendant has cited no legislative history and the Court has found nothing in the statute which suggests a Congressional intent to deny judicial review.

III. RIPENESS

Under the Abbott Laboratories trilogy, and in view of the equitable relief here sought, the Court must now examine justiciability, focusing with particularity upon ripeness. Ripeness in the context of pre-enforcement review involves a two-pronged test of 1) fitness of the issues raised for judicial review and 2) hardship to the plaintiffs if the Court refuses to hear the case.

[5] § 1331. Federal question; amount in controversy; costs

(a) The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions wherein the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs, and arises under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

[6] § 1337. Commerce and anti-trust regulations

The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action or proceeding arising under any Act of Congress regulating commerce or protecting trade and commerce against restraints and monopolies.

[7] Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 140, 87 S.Ct. 1507, 18 L.Ed.2d 681 (1967) and cases cited therein. See 5 U.S. C.A. § 701(a).

[8] No opinion is expressed as to the constitutionality of a statute which might deny judicial review.

[9] Both parties agree that the Abbott Laboratories case and the cases of Toilet Goods Association v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158, 87 S. Ct. 1520, 18 L.Ed.2d 697 (1967), and Gardner v. Toilet Goods Association, 387 U.S. 167, 87 S.Ct. 1526, 18 L.Ed.2d 704 (1967) constitute the relevant trilogy of Supreme Court opinions on the subject. Little force remains to older statements of the law on pre-enforcement review found in St. Regis Paper Co. v. United States, 368 U.S. 208, 82 S.Ct. 289, 7 L.Ed.2d 240 (1961), and Federal Trade Commission v. Claire Furnace Co., 274 U.S. 160, 47 S.Ct. 553, 71 L.Ed. 978 (1927). See Docket 22, pp. 98-99, 137.

[1114] As to fitness of the issues, there are two prime considerations: (1) Are the issues tendered for resolution either purely legal ones or, if not, are the facts readily accessible to this Court? (2) Has there been final agency action within the meaning of Section 10(c) of the APA, 5 U.S.C.A. § 704? With respect to the first consideration, if important facts cannot now be known with certainty or if a judicial appraisal of factors surrounding the controversy would be on a surer footing in the context of a specific enforcement proceeding, then the Court should decline to hear the case.

Not one but several issues are presented for resolution. Plaintiffs allege the Commission exceeded its statutory authority in issuing the controverted order and that in any event it failed to follow appropriate rulemaking procedure under the APA. They also charge that the Comptroller General either exceeded his authority or failed to follow requirements imposed on him by the law. These issues are either purely legal or related to facts already in the record or easily accessible to this Court with the aid of the parties.

Another allegation that the required reports are unduly burdensome may, under plaintiffs' theory, require this Court to balance the burden of compliance with the value of the data collected. Assuming arguendo that the Court is within its proper province to consider the value of the data collected, this also would require facts either now in the record or easily accessible. No facts are now lacking which could best be developed by awaiting agency enforcement.

Plaintiffs also charge that ambiguous and, at times, contradictory reporting instructions, coupled with the requirement of certifying as true all data submitted at risk of criminal sanction, amounts to a violation of plaintiffs' due process rights under the Fifth Amendment. They also urge the reporting requirement constitutes a taking of property without due process because of its cost to plaintiffs and the alleged substantial risk of making confidential material public. Finally, plaintiffs urge the requirement violates their Fourth Amendment right to be free from unwarranted searches and seizures. These constitutional grounds are basically legal issues.

[6] The Court finds the issues presented in this case fit for review at this time, in the sense that little benefit would be gleaned from postponing their judicial resolution.

[7] The second aspect of fitness goes to whether the August 1974 orders and the subsequent denials of all motions to quash constitute final agency action within the meaning of Section 10(c) of the APA, 5 U.S.C.A. § 704. The Court has no problem finding these actions are final. These were not informal agency actions or the rulings of some subordinate agency official subject to review by a higher agency authority. Rather they were actions taken by the members of the Commission themselves. The August 1974 orders were made effective immediately upon their issuance, and they explicitly state that compliance is expected. They have the effect of law, and violations of the orders are punishable by criminal fines and imprisonment. They were every bit as final as if the Congress itself had enacted the orders and they had been signed into law. The FTC orders constitute final action and are fit for review.

Having found the issues fit for review, attention is now turned to the second prong of the ripeness test, viz., hardship accruing to the plaintiffs if this Court withholds exercise of its jurisdiction.[10] What are the burdens suffered by plaintiffs if there is compliance vis-a-vis the detriments to be incurred by plaintiffs if they should choose noncompliance?

[1115] Four cases provide special guidance to this Court in determining whether the severity of hardship to a plaintiff in the form of costs of compliance versus costs of noncompliance is sufficient to cause a matter to be labeled "ripe" for pre-enforcement jurisdiction. Those cases are Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, Toilet Goods Association v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 158, 87 S.Ct. 1520, 18 L.Ed.2d 697 (1967), Gardner v. Toilet Goods Association, 387 U.S. 167, 87 S.Ct. 1526, 18 L.Ed.2d 704 (1967) and General Motors Corp. v. Volpe, 321 F.Supp. 1112 (D. Del.1970), aff'd as modified, 457 F.2d 922 (3d Cir. 1972).

In Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, the plaintiffs would have been faced with substantial hardship whether they chose to comply or not to comply. If they chose to comply with the regulation there at issue, they would have been required to incur substantial costs in changing their promotional labeling and advertisements, destroying stacks of printed matter, and investing heavily in new supplies. These activities would have had a direct and immediate impact on their day-to-day affairs. If they chose noncompliance they incurred risks of severe criminal and civil penalties and seizure of their goods as "misbranded drugs" with attendant adverse publicity in a sensitive industry. The Court found sufficient hardship. 387 U.S. at 156, 87 S.Ct. 1507.

In Gardner v. Toilet Goods Association, supra, the Court found that plaintiffs would suffer a substantial burden, whether they would choose to comply or not with the regulation in question, in the absence of pre-enforcement review. Failure to comply would pose the same risks of criminal prosecution, civil injunction, or seizure of goods with the accompanying bad publicity found in Abbott Laboratories. Compliance would require changing immediately longstanding practices of pre-market testing and clearance to accommodate new items not previously covered by regulation. Great expense would flow from such changes which would have a substantial impact upon day-to-day affairs of these plaintiffs. The Court found ripeness. 387 U.S. at 174, 87 S.Ct. 1526.

[10] Hardship in the context of irreparable injury for preliminary injunctive relief is discussed infra pp. 1117-1118.

The issues were not found sufficiently ripe in Toilet Goods Association v. Gardner, supra. The failure to comply with the regulation at issue would create a risk of the FDA's suspending certification services to the plaintiff. Such suspension was open to immediate administrative review. It would not result in criminal sanctions or seizure of goods. The burden of complying involved no direct and immediate impact on plaintiff's day-to-day affairs and was one sufficiently remote in time and effect to be deemed speculative. At most there would be a possible future request for inspection of plaintiff's plant and facilities at which time certain confidential material might be exposed to agency officials which, in turn, could possibly lead to publication.

In General Motors Corp. v. Volpe, supra, the issue was the hardship to the plaintiff corporation if the Court refused to hear a case involving a National Highway Safety Board order. The order directed the plaintiff to notify owners of certain GM trucks of a safety hazard resulting from use of a particular type of wheel last incorporated in GM trucks five years prior to the date of litigation. The cost of noncompliance was a possible loss of $400,000 in civil penalties. No criminal or other sanctions were possible. The cost of compliance was found to be de minimis being only the cost of mailing the notices, and in no way could compliance affect the day-to-day affairs of the plaintiff because such trucks had not been sold for five years. The Court found no ripeness. 321 F.Supp. at 1131.

[8] Turning to the facts in this case, the risks of noncompliance are evident from the enforcement sections of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S. C.A. §§ 49, 50. Plaintiffs would be sub[1116]ject to an enforcement action,[11] criminal sanctions of up to three years imprisonment and $5,000 fine, [12] and civil penalties of $100 per day beginning thirty days after receipt of a notice of default.[13]

[11] The Federal Trade Commission has expressed to this Court an "intention" to proceed against the plaintiffs for enforcement after February 19, 1975.

[12] In the instant matter, FTC counsel advised the Court at oral argument of the unlikelihood of imposition of criminal sanctions. The Supreme Court has discounted analogous representations noting that the existence of the statutory criminal sanction is the governing criteria. Cf. Abbott Laboratories v. Gardner, supra, 387 U.S. at 154, 87 S.Ct. 1507.

[13] The Court reads the February 7, 1975 letter of counsel for the Commission as the Commission not being prohibited from issuing notices of default if plaintiffs did not prevail on their motion for injunctive relief.

The burden of compliance is also substantial. Significant, time-consuming, and costly[14] efforts will be required to prepare the LB Reports. Initially there is the need to review past transactions to supply data of sufficient quality to satisfy the requirement for certification. Because the Commission has announced its intention that this program will be a continuing one, some companies understandably feel they must take immediate steps to anticipate future reporting requirements to produce consistent results from year to year. Meanwhile the Commission has not specified what those requirements will be in future years, except that they will likely be different than those now incumbent upon affected corporations. In addition there is a necessary diversion and dispersion of executive time and talent which has an indirect impact on the day-to-day affairs of business.

Plaintiffs also allege compliance will redound to their detriment in the form of possible breaches of confidentiality[15] and by misleading the public through publication of false or erroneous material.[16] As to these the burden is too speculative, based upon information now available, for the Court to consider in determining ripeness.

In summary, the risks of noncompliance are substantially greater than that found in Toilet Goods, but substantially less than in Abbott Laboratories or Gardner where seizure and adverse publicity were prominent considerations. Drawing a comparison with the General Motors case is less easy since civil penalties per plaintiff would probably be substantially less but there is present in the matter sub judice criminal sanctions which were not a factor in General Motors. The hardships of compliance are greater than in Toilet Goods and General Motors, but less than in Abbott Laboratories or Gardner both as to absolute monetary cost and type of impact on the day-to-day business affairs. In the instant matter the impact is indirect and hence of a less immediate consequential nature than the impact on day-to-day business affairs in Abbott Laboratories or Gardner. The severity of the hardship of compliance and noncompliance to these plaintiffs falls between that present in those cases used for guidance. On balance, the hardships are viewed as sufficiently great, immediate, and compelling regardless of whether compliance or noncompliance is pursued, to hold this controversy ripe for pre-enforcement review.

Having determined this matter to be ripe, attention is turned to the merits of plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief.

[14] One plaintiff, W. R. Grace & Co., estimated its cost for compliance for the first year at $400,000. The FTC advised $50,000 per corporation was the median estimated cost of compliance by those corporations who chose to reveal that data to the Commission.

[15] See Aluminum Co. of America, Inc. et al. v. FTC et al., 390 F.Supp. 301 (S.D.N.Y., 1975). [p. 1177 herein]

[16] The latter argument goes to plaintiffs' continuing assertion that the data required will be useless to the Commission and, indeed, misleading to those who study it.

IV. MERITS ON APPLICATION OF THE FACTS TO STANDARD FOR ISSUANCE OF A PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

[1117] [9] The legal standard to be followed in this Circuit in determining whether to issue a preliminary injunction has been recently restated:

> "[A]s a prerequisite to the issuance of a preliminary injunction the moving party must generally show: (1) a reasonable probability of eventual success in the litigation, and (2) that it will be irreparably injured pendente lite if relief is not granted to prevent a change in the status quo." A.L.K. Corp. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 440 F.2d 761, 963 (3d Cir. 1971). Moreover, this court has repeatedly stated that the district court, in considering whether to grant a preliminary injunction, should take into account, when they are relevant, (3) the possibility of harm to other interested persons from the grant or denial of the injunction, and (4) the public interest. Delaware River Port Authority v. Transamerican Trailer Transport, Inc., 501 F.2d 917, 919-920 (3d Cir. 1974).

Immediate, Irreparable Injury

[10] An analysis of immediate, irreparable injury must not only encompass the injury allegedly suffered by these plaintiffs, but also whether plaintiffs have an adequate remedy at law. Defendants vigorously contend that plaintiffs do have an adequate remedy at law in that they need only await enforcement proceedings at which time all grounds for relief raised in this proceeding can be raised as legal defenses in the enforcement proceeding to be brought in the Southern District of New York.[17] The Court does not concur. In the first place, there is no absolute assurance that the "present intention" of the Commission to initiate enforcement proceedings in the form of mandamus, 15 U.S.C.A. § 49, will in fact be carried out. Secondly, even if there were such assurances, it is difficult to imagine the Commission not urging upon the enforcement forum that the proceeding is summary in nature thereby depriving plaintiffs of the opportunity to engage in discovery, if necessary, so as to buttress their "undue burden" theory.[18] Cf. United States v. Associated Merchandising Corp., 256 F.Supp. 318 (S.D.N.Y. 1966); see also Donaldson v. United States, 400 U.S. 517, 91 S.Ct. 534, 27 L. Ed.2d 580 (1971); Federal Maritime Commission v. New York Terminal Conference, 262 F.Supp. 225 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 373 F.2d 424 (2d Cir. 1967). For this reason, this Court would be ill-advised to withhold ruling on plaintiffs' Motion for Preliminary Injunction so as to permit the FTC to commence an enforcement proceeding elsewhere. Finally, there appears to be little

---

[17] "The Commission agrees not to file notices of default against the plaintiffs pending your decision on the motions to dismiss and for a preliminary injunction. We further agree not to sue any of the seven plaintiffs for enforcement until after February 19, 1975, and to notify you before any such suit is instituted. Our present intention, however, for reasons hereafter noted is to proceed against the plaintiffs for enforcement in the Southern District of New York after February 19, 1975, if they are in default in complying with the orders." Portion of FTC February 7, 1975 letter addressed to the Court.

[18] At oral argument, plaintiffs were unable to represent whether they would need additional discovery.

authority for the proposition that, in a case where plaintiff has no other action available, nonetheless he has an adequate remedy at law by waiting for some anticipated enforcement proceeding, not yet filed. General Motors Corp. v. Volpe, supra, and Travis v. Pennyrile Rural Elec. Co-op., 399 F.2d 726 (6th Cir. 1968), are distinguishable not only because all discovery could be fully employed in those enforcement proceedings, but also by reason of the pendency of the enforcement proceeding prior to a ruling on injunctive relief. It is concluded plaintiffs have no adequate remedy at law.

[1118] [11] The alleged injury suffered by plaintiffs goes either to the unrecoverable costs and commitment of diverse business resources including managerial talent with concomitant loss of profits incident to preparation and compliance with the Commission orders plaintiffs assert to be invalid, or in the event of noncompliance, irreparable harm threatened by criminal and civil sanctions. The immediacy of the injury is evident; plaintiff has already incurred some costs incident to compliance and the time constraints placed upon plaintiffs by the FTC are narrow. The Court concludes plaintiffs will suffer immediate, irreparable injury.

The Possibility of Harm To Other Interested Persons

[12] The possibility of harm to other interested persons from the grant or denial of the injunction is non-existent or at best speculative. The Commission has suggested no such harm.

The Public Interest

[13] The Commission presumably represents the public interest. While not specifically appearing in the Commission resolution published in the August 22, 1974 Federal Register, two of the laudable avowed Commission objectives in seeking the LB Reports are to enable it to more intelligently utilize its own enforcement resources and, through publication of aggregated data, encourage improved resource allocation in the nation's economy.

The objective of more intelligent deployment of Commission enforcement resources will not be significantly affected by a delay of these seven corporate plaintiffs[19] in filing their LB Reports. For reasons which follow, the Court cannot say the public interest will be harmed by the issuance of an injunction. In fact, the Court cannot be confident the public interest might not benefit in the long run even if this Commission objective were temporarily frustrated.

[19] The Court recognizes that while a possibility exists that the benefit of this decision may inure to the six additional plaintiffs who have filed in this district, the issue is not before the Court.

The data to be collected in the initial LB Reports will "be unreliable at best, and may be seriously misleading"[20] because of a "fundamental dilemma[21] with regard to classification and related matters which is not yet fully resolved or compromised." The median cost to industry for collecting the unreliable and perhaps seriously misleading information is, according to reports furnished the FTC, $50,000 per corporation[22] or $17,250,000 for the first year. Five of the nine larger corporations surveyed by the Comptroller General estimated their costs with supporting methodology in excess of one million dollars each.[23]

[1119] The Comptroller General also identified an FTC interest in learning from the initial, "unreliable" information, so that succeeding reports may be improved: "FTC regards this as a very significant benefit, worth the additional burden it imposes. Clearly, the early receipt of 1973 and 1974 reports would afford earlier opportunity for essential face-to-face meetings focused on resolution of problems."[24]

It is also clear that the provision of more accurate data in the future is in everyone's interest—the FTC, the business community, and the public (which, to the extent reporting expenses make business less profitable, suffers either through higher prices or lower tax income from affected companies). A delay in implementation of the LB Program which results in progress in the collective, joint, good-faith efforts of all parties to devise a less burdensome and more effective reporting system certainly would not be adverse to the public interest, even if it resulted in the LB Reports being available at a date later than anticipated. Given the holding infra that it is unlikely that plaintiffs' challenge to the FTC's power to implement the program will prevail, it is reasonable to assume that the parties' future efforts will be cooperatively directed toward improving the program's operation. In these circumstances, the public interest in efficiency outweighs any interest in speed.

[20] The quoted language is taken from the Report to the Comptroller General of the United States on the Evaluation of the Federal Trade Commission's Proposed Annual Line of Business Report (Form LB) p. 15. Complaint Exhibit Folder, Exhibit F. It does not constitute a definitive finding of fact by the Court at this stage in this proceeding.

[21] ". . . On the one hand, individual business firms vary greatly in their organization, financial structure, and product lines. These variations are products of historical accident or the individual preferences of business leadership. To accurately reflect management, financial, and product-line structure of a specific business, therefore, the classifications and allocations must take account of these individualities.

"On the other hand, if information is to be collected from 500 firms and compared and aggregated, the data must be collected on the basis of definitions and specifications sufficiently uniform to make comparison and aggregation possible. Given the variations in business structure, uniform definitions will require most, if not all, responding businesses to report on a basis different than that on which they operate, with consequent impact on management practices and costs. . . ." Probability of Success

[14] Finally, the Court must determine whether, as to any ground urged by plaintiffs, there exists a "reasonable probability of eventual success in the litigation." Delaware River Port Authority, supra, 501 F.2d at 920.

Plaintiffs allege the LB Reports constitute an unreasonable search and seizure. Neither side addressed the point with any citations in briefs or at oral arguments. However, in view of cases such as Oklahoma Press Pub. Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 202-08, 66 S.Ct. 494, 90 L.Ed. 614 (1946), there appears at present to be no great likelihood of success on the merits of this claim.

Likewise, arguments based upon the Comptroller General's failure to follow the thrust of recommendations in his own report by rejecting the Commission's proposed program have no substantial probability of success. This applies as well to arguments based on the Commission's failure to resubmit the changed LB form to the Comptroller General for another review. There appears to have been strict compliance with the appropriate statutes, which plaintiffs themselves came very close to conceding if not in fact doing so.[25] In any event, this entire area of the Federal Reports Act and its amendment through Section 409 of P.L. 93-153 does not appear pregnant with possibilities for success on the merits.

Plaintiffs argue that the LB Report, with its burdensome effect on the resources of private business and the threat it poses to confidential secrets of those businesses, constitutes a taking of property without due process of law, in violation of the Fifth Amendment. Neither side referred to the point in brief or argument; accordingly, the Court cannot conclude that it constitutes a ground likely for success on the merits.

Plaintiffs ostensibly argue that the vague instructions in the LB form, as modified by subsequent communication with the Commission, coupled with the permission granted to use estimates and divergent existent records, conflict with the certification requirement as to truthfulness and accuracy of such data. It is believed the plaintiffs argue that the certification requirement carrying with it criminal sanctions renders the criminal statute unduly vague so as to be in violation of the Fifth Amendment. [1120] Without further elaboration by the plaintiffs, this Court decision declines to postulate further as to the outcome of such an argument in terms of likelihood of success.

Undue Burden

By far, the overwhelming weight of plaintiffs' argument and evidence presented at the preliminary injunction hearing goes to the allegedly undue burden imposed upon them by the requirements in the Commission's order. The legal underpinning of this argument appears to be Federal Trade Commission v. Baltimore Grain Co., 284 F. 886 (D.Md. 1922), aff'd. per curiam, 267 U.S. 586, 45 S.Ct. 461, 69 L.Ed. 800 (1925), in which the District Court said that there must be "some reasonable proportion between the public value of the information likely to be obtained and the private annoyance and irritation it will occasion." Plaintiffs attempt to demonstrate the unduly burdensome nature of compliance vis-a-vis the extremely limited public value of the information being gathered.

---

The Court is of the opinion that the procedures the FTC followed have not been those which best serve the public interest, infra, pp. 1121-1125, and that collection of the best data possible is in the public interest. Supra, p. 1119. Nonetheless the Court doubts the propriety of its scouring the record in an effort to evaluate the probable value of the data sought. Courts have tended to limit their inquiry into investigative information requests to a determination only of the possible utility of the materials sought. See, e.g., United States v. Feaster, 376 F.2d 147 (5th Cir. 1967). Further, the vitality of the Baltimore Grain dictum has been, at the least, curtailed by United States v. Morton Salt, 338 U.S. 632, 70 S.Ct. 357, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950).[26]

In any event, if it were to engage in such a balancing process, the Court would require a record more fully developed than that now before it. On the basis of the current record, there is no reasonable likelihood that the LB Program would be shown to be unreasonably burdensome in light of its public value.

Statutory Authority

Plaintiffs urge three separate contentions in support of their position on the merits that the Commission exceeded its statutory authority by adoption of the LB Program:

> a) Congress limited the Commission's Section 6 [15 U.S.C.A. § 46] powers to investigations in aid of substantive authority and rejected regulation by publicity
> b) Section 6(b) [15 U.S.C.A. § 46(b)] reports are limited to production of information kept in ordinary course of business
> c) Congress rejected a uniform system of reports and uniform accounting system which are contemplated by the LB Program. Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Support of Plaintiffs' Motion for Preliminary injunction—Contents.

A reading of 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(a)[27] effectively disposes of plaintiffs' primary contentions that investigation by the Commission is sanctioned only if made in conjunction with or related to an en[1121]forcement proceeding. There is no limitation in Section 46(a) which limits its applicability to enforcement proceedings.

[26] It would appear the shift of judicial concern from substantive to procedural due process would direct the force of this argument to procedural requirements where agencies initiate programs of substantial and widespread effect. See, e.g., discussion infra, pp. 1121-1125.

[27] The Commission shall also have power—

(a) To gather and compile information concerning, and to investigate from time to time the organization,

With respect to reports by corporations, 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(b) and United States v. Morton Salt, supra, effectively dispel plaintiffs' contentions. In Morton Salt plaintiffs argued that Section 6(b), 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(b), reports could be used only in support of information-gathering activities and not enforcement under Section 5. The Supreme Court stated:

> While we find a good deal which would warrant our concluding that § 6 was framed with the pre-existing antitrust laws in mind, and in the expectation that the information procured would be chiefly useful in reports to the President, the Congress, or the Attorney General, we find nothing that would deny its use for any purpose within the duties of the Commission, including a § 5 proceeding. 338 U.S. at 649, 70 S.Ct. at 367.

The above-quoted language leaves one with a conviction bordering upon certainty that the Supreme Court does not read 15 U.S.C.A. § 46 as limited in application to use in conjunction with enforcement activity.

Plaintiffs' contention with respect to publicity is effectively disposed of by reference to 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(f) which expressly empowers the Commission . . . "[t]o make public from time to time such portions of the information obtained by it hereunder, . . . as it shall deem expedient in the public interest; . . ."

Plaintiffs' assertion that 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(b) reports are limited to production of information kept in the ordinary course of business is contraindicated by the holding of Morton Salt.

Plaintiffs argument predicated upon Congressional rejection of proposals presently sought to be implemented by the LB Program, while ingenious, is nonetheless unconvincing.

All of the above coupled with the broad language of Morton Salt cause this Court to find there is no reasonable probability that plaintiffs will prevail on their contention that the Commission exceeded its statutory authority by reason of its adoption of the LB Program.

Compliance With Section 4 of the Administrative Procedure Act

There remains for discussion plaintiffs' contention that the Commission has violated the APA in promulgating the LB Program.

Section 4 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C.A. § 553, establishes the procedure to be followed when an agency seeks to implement specified types of rules. In essence, it requires the originating agency to publish all proposed rules, with an invitation to business, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce, excepting banks and common carriers subject to the Act to regulate commerce, and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

interested parties to make written comments. After consideration of relevant matters presented, the agency formulates the final rule, incorporating therein a concise general statement of their basis and purpose. The final rules must be published or served, but do not become effective for thirty days thereafter, thus allowing comment to be made to the final version.[28] The described procedure was designed not only to permit the public to participate in the rulemaking process, but "[to enable] the agency promulgating the rule to educate itself before establishing rules and procedures which have a substantial impact on those regulated." Texaco, Inc. v. Federal Power Commission, 412 F.2d 740, 744 (3d Cir. 1969); see also NLRB v. Wyman-Gordon Co., 394 U.S. 759, 777-78, 89 S.Ct. 1426, 22 L.Ed.2d 709 (1969) (Douglas, J., dissenting); National Petroleum Refiners Ass'n v. FTC, 157 U.S.App.D.C. 83, 482 F.2d 672, 682 (1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 951, 94 S.Ct. 1475, 39 L. Ed.2d 567 (1974).

[1122] In the instant case, the Commission, on August 22, 1974, published in the Federal Register a summary description of the LB Program entitled "Resolution Requiring Annual Line of Business Reporting Program." The "resolution" was nowhere characterized as a proposed Commission rule, nor did it invite comments from the public. It does not appear that comments were, at that point, received or considered, that the resolution was subsequently republished or served as a final rule, or that thirty days elapsed between the date of publication and the effective date of the LB Program.[29]

Defendant has made no attempt to persuade the Court that the Commission complied with the rulemaking provisions of the APA. Rather, the government contends that these procedures are inapplicable to the promulgation and implementation of the LB Reporting Program because the Program is designed solely to gather information; the Program does not entail "an agency statement . . . designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy."[30] Implicit in this argument is the premise that agency investigation and rulemaking are mutually-exclusive functions and that investigatory activities conducted by an agency relieve it from the need to comply with the rulemaking strictures of the APA. This Court disagrees.

[15] Many federal and state agencies are possessed of broad investigatory and rulemaking powers. The investigatory grant of authority to the Commission is particularly far-reaching, authorizing, among other things, the power to investigate corporations, to require annual and special reports from corporations, and to investigate

[28] Certain exceptions to this procedure are recognized by the APA; for purposes of the instant case, they are not applicable. See 5 U.S.C.A. § 553(b).

[29] Nothing in the record indicates that the FTC had previously published a notice of proposed rulemaking, thereby rendering the August 22, 1974 publication its final statement of a proposed rule.

compliance with antitrust statutes and decrees. 15 U.S. C.A. § 46. However, it does not follow that because the Commission seeks disclosure of information under the broad authority granted by the Federal Trade Commission Act, it is relieved of the necessity to proceed in the manner prescribed by the APA when its action, whatever the Commission may label it, constitutes "rulemaking." Section 6(g) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 46(g), provides:

The Commission shall also have power—

> (g) From time to time to classify corporations and to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 41 to 46 and 47 to 58 of this title.

Congress specifically intended in Section 6(g) to authorize the promulgation and implementation of rules relating to the Commission's investigatory powers. National Petroleum Refiners Ass'n v. FTC, 340 F.Supp. 1343, 1348-49 (D.D.C. 1972), rev'd on other grounds, 157 U.S. App.D.C. 83, 482 F.2d 672 (1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 951, 94 S.Ct. 1475, 39 L.Ed.2d 567 (1974).[31] See also FTC v. Scientific Living, Inc., 150 F.Supp. 495, 498-99 (M.D.Pa.1957), aff'd. 254 F.2d 598 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 940, 78 S.Ct. 429, 2 L.Ed.2d 421 (1958), reh. denied, 358 U.S. 867, 79 S.Ct. 98, 3 L. Ed.2d 99 (1958). In the latter case, the court stated:

> Section 9 [of the FTC Act] specifically provides that the Commission . . . shall have access to any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against (emphasis in original) . . . . Having such power the Commission could make rules under § 6(g), Id. § 46(g) regulating the procedure in connection therewith. (emphasis supplied).

[1123] [16,17] The investigatory and rule-making powers contemplated by the Federal Trade Commission Act are thus not mutually-exclusive, but complementary. The fact that the Commission's LB Program was instituted pursuant to its broad statutory powers of investigation does not ipso facto compel the conclusion that the LB Program could involve no elements of rulemaking. The Court must now determine whether rulemaking of the type contemplated by the Administrative Procedure Act did in fact occur.

Most commentators and courts have attempted to determine the earmarks of the rulemaking process by comparing it with the adjudicatory process. See, e. g., K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 5.01, at 285-90 (1958); Hoffman-LaRoche, Inc. v. Kleindienst, 478 F.2d 1, 13 (3d Cir. 1973). So juxtaposed, the salient characteristics of rulemaking appear to be two: (1) rules apply in an across-the-board manner to classes of persons, independent of special circumstances or equities peculiar to individuals within those classes; and (2) rules are primarily of prospective application. See Hoffman-LaRoche, Inc. v. Kleindienst, supra at 13.

[31] In reversing, the Circuit Court of Appeals held that the rulemaking powers conferred by Section 6(g) encompassed not only rules relating to FTC procedure and investigation, but substantive trade regulations as well.

[18] Judged by these criteria, the FTC LB Program arguably possesses the earmarks of rulemaking. The reporting and recordkeeping requirements of the Program have generalized, across-the-board applicability to a large number of industrial concerns; moreover, the requirements are entirely prospective in effect, requiring compliance on or before specified future dates.

However, the utility of these traditional criteria in the case at bar is dubious because these criteria were developed in the context of cases seeking to distinguish rulemaking from the adjudicatory process. In the instant case, we are compelled to distinguish rulemaking from the purely investigatory process. The dubious value of the traditional indicia of rulemaking in this context is readily apparent when it is realized that many purely investigatory acts by an agency entail across-the-board orders affecting large classes of persons which are entirely prospective in effect.

This does not mean that the rulemaking and investigative functions are conceptually indistinct. An order directing the mere production of existing books and business records does not necessarily entail a "statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy." Administrative Procedure Act § 2(c), 5 U.S.C.A. § 551(4). Where, however, in conjunction with its investigatory functions, an agency promulgates far-reaching directives which effectively prescribe the manner in which business records are to be kept for reporting purposes and which affect a substantial number of business enterprises, the agency has gone beyond a mere order to produce books and business records. In such a case, the agency has also prescribed law and/or policy.[32]

While the foregoing distinction is couched in terms of polar extremes, for purposes of the instant case, a narrower conceptual differentiation is not required. In implementing the LB Program, the FTC has directed businesses subject thereto not only to produce for inspection books and business records, but to compile and tabulate business data according to a complex classification system. Much of the data is not now maintained in the ordinary course of business and its value, in terms of the objectives of the LB Program, is uncertain. The effects of the program are pervasive, imposing new and unexpected liabilities of no small magnitude, yet the classification methods utilized by the [1124] Program are relatively untested. Under the circumstances, it appears that the FTC has transcended its purely investigatory function.

Professor Davis has suggested that difficulties in classifying hybrid administrative functions should be resolved with due regard to the desirable or undesirable consequences which a given classification will produce. K. Davis, Administrative Law Treatise § 5.01, at 293 (1958). Given the probable impact of the LB Program on American industry, the fact that compliance with its accounting and reporting requirements will require no small expenditure of industry time and money, and the uncertain value of the accounting and reporting methods utilized, it would seem highly desirable to allow all affected parties to make known their constructive suggestions and views on improving the LB Program. Inasmuch as the rulemaking procedures established by the Administrative Procedure Act were designed to secure this salutary objective, it appears that implementation of the LB Program should be deemed an instance of agency rulemaking.

[32] That agency statements affecting business accounting practices may be the subject of "rulemaking" is made apparent by the APA: "[R]ule" means the whole or a part of an agency statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law or policy . . . and includes the approval or prescription for the future of accounting, or practices bearing [thereon]. 5 U.S.C.A. § 551(4) (emphasis supplied).

[19] Upon the present record and for reasons previously discussed, it does not appear that the rulemaking procedures of the APA were adhered to in the implementation of the LB Program. The government has suggested substantial compliance with the APA procedure, alluding to the fact that the Office of Management and Budget as well as the General Accounting Office have solicited comments from interested parties concerning the LB Program and that further opportunity for comment was afforded in the context of motions to quash directed at the FTC compliance orders.

Preliminary research discloses no cases which recognize the sufficiency of "substantial compliance" for purposes of Section 4 of the APA. In any event, the Court cannot at this point conclude that the procedures utilized by the government constitute "substantial compliance." While it is true that the OMB and the GAO conducted extensive inquiries into the feasibility of the LB Program and received written and oral comments from many quarters, the Court doubts that these procedures are an adequate substitute for the procedures established under the APA. First, the proposals before the OMB in August 1973 were not in final form; indeed, the OMB had no opportunity to receive comments on two subsequent revisions of the Program which incorporated substantial changes.[33] Second, while the GAO did comprehensively review the later LB proposals, that agency was statutorily authorized to evaluate the Program solely in terms of its burdensomeness and the duplicative nature of its reporting requirements; the GAO was not charged with a determination of the advisability or necessity of the Program itself.[34]

The fact that affected businesses were allowed to file motions to quash the FTC compliance orders is also unpersuasive. At the time the motions were filed, the Program was a fait accompli; there is little reason to believe that the FTC would afford the same plenary consideration to plaintiffs' arguments that it might have if the Program were yet at the incipient rulemaking stage.

---

[34] See 44 U.S.C.A. § 3512 (1975 Supp.).

For the foregoing reasons, the Court does not at this juncture feel that the procedures urged by the government constitute an adequate substitute for the rulemaking procedures established by the Administrative Procedure Act. Accordingly, with respect to this limited issue, the Court concludes plaintiffs have established a sufficient probability of [1125] success on the merits to warrant issuance of a preliminary injunction.

Order

It is ordered and adjudged that:

(1) Defendants, their agents, officers, servants, and employees, and all persons in active concert or participation with them are herewith enjoined and restrained during the pendency of this litigation and until further order of this Court from:

(a) Giving notice of default to plaintiffs for failure to file Form LB as required by the resolution of the Federal Trade Commission dated August 2, 1974, and its special orders entered pursuant thereto; and

(b) Enforcement of or causing to be enforced civil penalties and all other forms of judicial and administrative relief, including but not limited to mandamus, for plaintiffs' failure to file the aforesaid Form LB.

(2) Defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' complaint for want of jurisdiction is herewith denied.

JOHN BODNER, JR., et al. v. F.T.C., et al.*

Civ. A. No. 74-1189. F.T.C. File No. 99-187.

(United States District Court, District of Columbia, February 24, 1975)

On motion for summary judgment, court held that, under the Freedom of Information Act, certain portions of the staff report to the Commission on the trade regulation rule proceedings dealing with octane posting were not exempt from disclosure under exemption 5 of the Freedom of Information Act because they contained factual material which was severable from any analysis or opinion. Further, court held that the search and copy fees were reasonable and proper.

MEMORANDUM

This matter currently is before the court on defendants' motion for summary judgment and plaintiffs' opposition thereto. This action is brought pursuant to the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U. S. C. § 552, under which plaintiffs seek to compel Federal Trade Commission (FTC) disclosure of three documents which relate, in whole or in part, to the FTC's concern with environmental matters while enacting the trade regulation rule requiring posting of octane ratings on gasoline pumps. Defendants have claimed exemption from disclosure under 5 U. S. C. § 552(b)(5). Pursuant to this court's order, defendants have filed a detailed index regarding each document, Vaughn v. Rosen, 484 F.2d 820 (D. C. Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U. S. 977 (1974), and the court has examined the documents in camera.[1] Plaintiffs also contest the Commission's imposition of search and copying fees for documents the agency agrees to release. The court will consider first the exemption 5 issues as regards the three withheld documents and then will consider the fee question.

Document A(1) is a nine-page memorandum, prepared by the FTC General Counsel's Office, which discusses litigation strategies in National Petroleum Refiners Association v. FTC, Civil Action No. 1180-71 (D. D. C.) and whether the Commission should file an environmental impact statement in connection with the Commission's previous promulgation of the gasoline octane posting rule. Specifically, the memorandum, without advocating a firm position on various legal issues, discusses the alternatives open to the Commission and makes recommendations as to the advantages and disadvantages of each.[2]

Defendants, on order of the court, investigated FTC records to find what use was made of this document by the Commission. The agency files are not altogether clear, as evidenced by the affidavits and the index. It appears in all likelihood that, although the memorandum was intended to be used by the General Counsel's Office and by the

[1] With the exception noted in footnote 6, infra, the court finds that defendants have complied with Vaughn and have provided a detailed justification for application of the exemption to the specific documents in dispute. See Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. Renegotiation Bd., No. 73-2093 (D. C. Cir. October 8, 1974) (slip at 4).

[2] Further description and details regarding this document are found in the indexes and affidavits which have been filed by defendants.

Commission itself, neither the General Counsel nor the Commission actually used the document. This conclusion is shaken only by the fact that one former FTC staffer, Harold D. Rhynedance, Jr., believes the document may have been shown to the Commission chairman. It is without dispute, however, that the document never was approved by the General Counsel and that there is no record of the Commission ever having been forwarded the document.

Plaintiffs, relying heavily on the fact that the document may have been shown informally to one member of the Commission, argue that under American Mail Line Ltd. v. Gulick, 411 F.2d 696 (D. C. Cir. 1969), the document may have to be disclosed and that, at a minimum, a genuine issue of material fact exists concerning the use made of the document which bars summary judgment. Plaintiffs argue:

> [T]he Chairman of the Commission may have reviewed this document, in which case he would have undoubtedly relied upon it in making the decision not to issue an environmental impact statement and probably have conveyed the substance of the contents to the other Commissioners, thus creating a situation where this document constituted the sole basis for the Commission's decision.

Plaintiffs' Supplementary Memorandum in Response to Defendants' "Revised Index" and in Further Opposition to Defendants' Motion For Summary Judgment, at 5, filed January 23, 1975.

First, absent correctness of plaintiffs' arguments, document A(1) appears clearly to fall within the exemption of 5 U. S. C. § 552(b)(5). Document A(1) contains the legal analysis and recommendations of the FTC staff, information developed originally to assist the Commission in its decision-making process. The document specifically was designed to offer alternatives and analysis to the Commission so that the Commissioners could decide whether a decision had to be made and if so what decision to make. See Sterling Drug, Inc. v. FTC, 450 F.2d 698 (D. C. Cir. 1971); Soucie v. David, 448 F.2d 1067, 1077 (D. C. Cir. 1971). This type of internal memorandum is the sort of frank agency communication that exemption 5 seeks to protect.

There appears to be several answers to the contentions raised by plaintiffs concerning document A(1). First, although plaintiffs argue that factual issues remain which preclude summary judgment, the court concludes that there exists no genuine issue of material fact. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). Plaintiffs' theory, quoted earlier, regarding the possible use made of document A(1), is a matter of sheer speculation[3]

[3] For example, it appears doubtful but possible that the FTC chairman might have seen document A(1). From this plaintiffs argue he "undoubtedly relied upon it" and that he "probably conveyed the substance of its contents to the other Commissioners." This represents mere guesswork on plaintiffs' part, and still further guesswork to then conclude that the document was the sole basis for a decision. Further, to find what the FTC chairman may have discussed with other Commissioners clearly would constitute an unwarranted invasion of the Commission's decision-making process. Hence, even if discovery were reopened, the court would not permit discovery into these matters. The FTC has in good faith supplied all information reasonably available concerning use made of document A(1), and in the court's opinion has met its burden justifying the exemption. See 5 U. S. C. § 552(a)(3). Such information indicates overwhelmingly that the which, in light of the overwhelming evidence negating such theory, does not present a genuine issue of material fact.

Even assuming that plaintiffs are correct in their speculation—that the FTC chairman reviewed document A(1), relied upon it, and later conveyed the contents to the other Commissioners—plaintiffs would not be entitled to relief. There still would be no solid reason to believe that the Commission as a whole considered the document as the basis for its decision. See Grumman Aircraft Eng. Corp. v. Renegotiation Bd., 482 F.2d 710, 719-720 n. 29 (D. C. Cir. 1973), cert. granted, 417 U. S. 907 (1974). There is no evidence that the entire Commission saw or reviewed document A(1). At the very most other Commissioners received a summary of the contents from the chairman and thereafter decided not to issue an environmental impact statement. Under similar circumstances the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit stated:

> The staff memoranda submitted to the Commission prior to the Miles-S. O. S. decision undoubtedly contain ideas which affected that decision to some extent. However, our experience with the decision-making process leads us to believe that the material in these memoranda was probably filtered and refined by the Commission, with the result that its ultimate decision was something more than, or at least different from, the sum of its "parts." Consequently, we doubt that examination of the "parts" would give a very accurate picture of the decision.

Sterling Drug, Inc. v. FTC, supra at 706. Similarly, this court, at best, concludes that document A(1) constitutes an inaccurate picture of the agency's alleged decision in this matter. Where there is no evidence that the memorandum is adopted as policy and where there are dangers of misleading the public and embarrassing predecision communications between staff and decision-maker, the documents may properly be withheld under exemption 5. See id. at 706-08; Grumman Aircraft Eng. Corp. v. Renegotiation Bd., supra at 719 n. 29.[4] document was not "adopted" by the Commission. See generally Pacific Architects & Engineers, Inc. v. Renegotiation Bd., supra. In rejecting a similar claim the court in Sterling Drug, Inc. v. FTC, supra at 706, stated:

Finally, the court concludes that document A(1) contains no

"Here the Commission has not indicated publicly that staff memoranda contained the rationale for this decision, and we do not agree with Sterling's assertion that this must of necessity be the case." (footnote omitted). Further, there are no Commission memoranda which indicate that document A(1) contains a statement of Commission policy or interpretation. See id. n. 8. Under these circumstances, no further discovery is necessary.

[4] The court perceives what may be an underlying misperception on plaintiffs' part. In its octane rule the FTC cited environmental concerns as one reason justifying the rule. The FTC never issued an environmental impact statement and never stated publicly why it did not. Plaintiffs conclude that the Commission must have deliberated on this matter and have decided in secret not to issue such a statement. Plaintiffs then conclude that a statement of policy or interpretation exists under 5 U. S. C. § 552(a)(2)(B) and that such statement, presumably embodied in document A(1), must be made public. In Sterling Drug Inc. v. FTC, supra, the court stated at page 707:

"Agencies are required to issue opinions with many of their orders, but it is completely unreasonable to suppose that every agency order can be accompanied by an opinion. The probable effect of a decision requiring disclosure of the staff memoranda would thus be to inhibit 'a full and frank exchange of opinions' at least in that class of cases where opinions are not, and as a practical matter cannot be, issued." (footnote omitted). In the instant case the Commission may, in a sense, have issued an order by not filing an environmental impact statement. Such an order may even constitute Commission policy. However, there does not necessarily exist a statement embodying the reasons for the FTC decision. The court has concluded that document A(1) does not constitute such a statement which can be compelled under the Gulick rationale. The court also concludes that document A(1) does not reflect policy already made and severable factual material. "Factual information may be protected only if it is inextricably intertwined with policy-making processes." Soucie v. David, supra at 1077-78; see Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, 491 F.2d 63 (D. C. Cir. 1974). The largest part of this document consists purely of staff legal analysis presenting various alternatives to the Commission. From the bottom of page one to the top of page three the memorandum selectively summarizes parts of the Commission's previously published statement of basis and purpose. This selective summary then serves as a focus upon which later legal analysis is made. All of these facts are in the publicly disclosed statement of basis and purpose. See id. at 70-71. See also Washington Research Project v. H. E. W., No. 74-1027 (D. C. Cir. September 12, 1974) (Slip 18-22). Since this summary is selective in nature and becomes intertwined with the staff's legal analysis, the court finds that it is part of the deliberative process and hence should be exempt from disclosure. See Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra at 70-71.

Document A(2).

Document A(2) consists primarily of a staff report to the FTC which "summarizes the evidence presented during the Trade Regulation Rule Proceeding concerning the posting of octane ratings, analyzes this evidence, and makes recommendations concerning possible action by the Commission." Revised Index at 3.[5] There is also a transmission memorandum and seven appendices, all of which have been described in the indexes.[6] Great portions of this document do not pertain in any way to plaintiffs' request for "each and every item of material" relating to environmental matters. Those portions of course need not be disclosed since no request was made for them.[7] The court will not, at this time, announced. See Schwartz v. IRS, No. 74-1392, (D. C. Cir. Feb. 14, 1975). The court, of course, expresses no view concerning the issue of whether such an environmental impact statement should have been filed; such an issue properly would be the subject of a separate action.

[5] The court, after in camera inspection, finds this description accurate. While the report by nature must reflect the accumulated knowledge and expertise of a staff which worked extensively on the octane rule proceedings, the report itself does not reflect independent staff investigation but rather primarily is a staff summary of evidence presented during the octane rule proceedings. Of course, whether the staff's summary is accurate and unbiased is not a matter of concern to this court. See Montrose Chem. Corp. v. Train, supra at 71.

[6] The court notes one misleading, though probably inadvertent, indexing error. See Revised Index at 3. Subsection (f) of the report, labeled "Getting the Lead Out," consists of pages 81-82, not 81-92 as presently indexed. Pages 82-92 properly are labeled "Legal Aspects" and pertain solely to an analysis of the Commission's power to promulgate a trade regulation rule. While this omission does not appear serious, the court feels obliged to caution the Commission to take extreme care in complying with the disclosure requirements of the FOIA. Such errors cast doubt over the care with which an agency claim of exemption is made and further indicate the necessity of careful and detailed indexing. If a large number of documents were involved making thorough in camera review impossible, such errors might go unnoticed, possibly frustrating the successful functioning of the Act.

[7] The court is mindful, however, to construe plaintiffs' material request broadly and not to separate artificially environmental factors from non-environmental factors. Thus, the court is of the view that if any item within a subdivision of the report is within the document request and is disclosable (the subdivisions are enunciated on page 3 of the revised index as corrected by footnote 6 of this Memorandum), then the entire subdivision should be disclosed unless within an exemption.

deal with disclosure of the appendices.[8]

Both the subdivision labeled "Background," pages 1-9 and one-half of page 10, and the part labeled "Getting the Lead Out," pages 81-82, relate in varying degree to environmental matters and thus are within plaintiffs' document request. Regardless of whether the rest of document A(2) is exempt, the court finds that both these sections represent severable factual material which must be disclosed. Soucie v. David, supra at 1077-78; Montrose Chem. Corp. v. Train, supra at 67. Neither section represents the kind of summary of evidence which is necessarily a part of the deliberative process. See id. Rather, each section presents an objective, factual presentation whose disclosure would not in any way imperil the frank communications between Commission and staff.[9] Only where disclosure would be "injurious to the consultative functions of government," should material be exempted under exemption 5. See EPA v. Mink, 410 U. S. 73, 88-90 (1973). As regards these two sections the Commission, on whom the burden rests, 5 U. S. C. § 552(a)(3), has failed to sustain its action. See Soucie v. David, supra at 1078.

The only other references in document A(2) to environmental matters appear in subsections (b) and (c). These sections contain the staff's summaries of evidence in favor of the octane rule and in opposition to it.[10] As stated by defendants, this summary of evidence later became the substance of the Commission's statement of basis and purpose which was issued with the octane rule. The staff sought in this summary to present the arguments of those parties participating in the octane rule proceeding so that the Commission could better reach a decision on whether to issue the rule. As such this summary appears to fall squarely within the holding of Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra, that exemption 5 seeks to protect the deliberative process, not just deliberative materials. See 491 F.2d at 69.

> To probe the summaries of record evidence would be the same as probing the decision-making process itself. To require disclosure of the summaries would result in publication of the evaluation and analysis of the multitudinous facts made by the Administrator's aides and in turn studied by him in making his decision. Whether he weighed the correct factors, whether his judgmental scales were finely adjusted and delicately operated, disappointed litigants may not probe his deliberative process.

Id. at 68 (footnote omitted). Plaintiffs also assert that this summary "reflects policy already made and announced" and thus must be disclosed. See Grumman Aircraft Eng. Corp. v. Renegotiation Bd., supra at 719. After review of the index and the documents in camera the court can find no substantial basis for plaintiffs' contention and accordingly rejects it. If plaintiffs were given access to this summary of evidence, they would then know both what advice the commissioners received and how much of this advice they accepted. See id. at 70. Disclosure of such information is not warranted by the facts of this case. "[W]here an alternative source of the facts is available to the public, what the litigants may be seeking are not really facts, but evaluation of the facts or advice, which should not be subject to disclosure." Id. at 42. All factual materials concerning environmental matters which have been disclosed to the court have been or will be made available to plaintiffs. The staff's summary and analysis of this factual material need not be disclosed.[11]

[8] Defendants are willing to disclose those appendices dealing with environmental factors, subject to payment of search and copy fees. See Original Index at 2. The propriety of such fees is dealt with later in this Memorandum.

[9] The section labeled "Background" first outlines the procedures and events that occurred during the octane rule proceedings. Then, in largest part, it consists of a subsection which discusses what octane is, what it is not, and why it is important. Broad claims that disclosure of such information would impinge upon the deliberative process simply cannot sustain scrutiny. The section labeled "Getting the Lead Out" reports to the Commission on the problem of reducing lead in gasoline. It does not reflect the staff's or the Commission's administrative reasoning process.

[10] There are several references to non-record evidence concerning environmental matters in the staff report. See Revised Index at 5. The Commission is willing to make this factual material available. See Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra at 71.

Document A(3).

Document A(3) consists of a transmittal memorandum, to which are attached several items. The items include two draft versions of an addendum to the rule's statement of basis and purpose, and a copy of the proposed revised rule with a proposed revised statement of basis and purpose. See Revised Index. The addendum concerns R + M/2 method of octane measurement. The only references to environmental matters occur in the longer proposed addendum and in the proposed statement of basis and purpose. As defendants point out, the factual material relating to environmental matters either is contained in the public record or remains unaltered in the published version of the statement of basis and purpose. Hence, as relates to environmental factors which are the only things relevant in this case, there is no danger that the basis for the rule is based upon a secret record. See Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra at 70-71. See also footnote 11, supra.

Defendants in their revised index refer to the documents as draft versions of documents eventually issued by the Commission. Plaintiffs question such a characterization but the court, after in camera examination and review of the Indexes, concurs with defendants' description. The FTC in 1971 reopened the octane rule proceedings to consider the proper method of octane measurement. Later, the FTC issued a revised rule and statement of basis and purpose, incorporating in an addendum data received upon the reopening of the proceedings. One draft addendum was prepared by the Commission's Bureau of Consumer Protection. The second addendum was prepared by the General Counsel's Office with the assistance of the Consumer Protection Bureau. The Commission finally incorporated most of the latter addendum in a revised statement of basis and purpose and at the same time revised the trade regulation rule. As part of document A(3) there is a proposed revision of the trade regulation rule and of its statement of basis and purpose.

[11] Throughout this litigation, plaintiffs have emphasized their theory that defendants have utilized a secret record, consisting primarily of ex parte conferences, and thus entire documents should be revealed so that such "secret law" can be exposed. It is mainly on this basis that plaintiffs seek to distinguish Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra, where the court emphasized that the staff summaries contained only record evidence. However, Montrose was a case in which the rule-making was required to be "on the record" and accordingly had to adhere to those stricter provisions. See 7 U. S. C. § 135b(c); 5 U. S. C. §§ 553(c), 556, 557. The rule-making in the instant case proceeded under 5 U. S. C. § 553, which, as Judge Robinson pointed out in National Petroleum Refiners Association v. FTC, is much less formal. See Memorandum, National Petroleum, Refiners Ass'n v. FTC [1974-1 trade cases ¶ 75,119], Civil Action No. 1180-71 (D. D. C. filed June 17, 1974). Under these circumstances, the court finds Montrose to be even more compelling precedent and even if the summaries prepared by the staff included non-record information, the court would not necessarily compel agency disclosure. The agency has set forth the basis for its decision in its lengthy and detailed statement of basis and purpose. Under 5 U.S.C. § 553 the Commission has complied fully with the Administrative Procedure Act and the validity of the rule itself eventually will be decided upon that statement of reasons. Hence, the court finds plaintiffs' repeated references to ex parte conferences largely irrelevant in the context of this proceeding.

Such draft documents, prepared by the staff and designed to be used by the Commission in revising the octane rule, clearly constitute a part of the deliberative process that is designed to be protected by exemption 5. Cf. Memorandum Opinion at 4, Astro Communications Laboratory v. Renegotiation Bd., Civil Action No. 2403-70 (D. D. C. filed May 16, 1974). Such a draft version, subject to change upon review by the Commission, is not likely to reflect accurately the Commission's deliberations or final decision. Further, where as in this case, the agency subsequently has set forth its statement of basis and purpose for its decision, there is no reason to probe for the memoranda it has considered in reaching its final decision. See Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Train, supra at 70 n. 42.[12]

Search and Copy Fees

The parties finally contest defendants' imposition of $223.50 in search and copy fees for documents that defendants have all along been willing to disclose to plaintiffs. Original Index at 3. Of course, when an agency produces identifiable records under 5 U. S. C. § 552(a)(3), it may require the party requesting the documents to pay a reasonable fee.

On April 24, 1974, plaintiff Bodner requested the FTC to produce any materials relating to the environment and considered by the Commission in the octane rule proceedings. Exhibit D to Complaint. In this request "Commission" was defined as "the staff, all employees of the Commission and all other persons assisting directly or indirectly in the work of the Commission." Id. Shortly thereafter defendants began an extensive search of Commission files to locate material within plaintiffs' request. Affidavit of Charles A. Tobin, filed September 20, 1974. On July 30, 1974, the Commission notified plaintiffs that it had completed its search and that certain documents could be obtained upon payment of the fee. Exhibit J to Complaint. Plaintiffs object to the fee primarily on two grounds: first, that all the documents that were found should have been part of the public record of the octane rule proceedings and, second, that the search was poorly run and much more extensive than necessary. Even if plaintiffs are correct on the first point, defendants, given the broad definition of "Commission," and the fact that the documents sought were not precisely identified, were justified in the extensive search they undertook. Further, while perhaps the search could have proceeded more economically or in a more organized fashion, this appears mostly to be a matter of hindsight. Under all of the circumstances and considering the extensive search that was undertaken, the court finds the fees reasonable and proper.

[12] Where, as regards document A(3), the material in question constitutes draft versions of materials later published by the agency, the court questions whether there ever would be severable factual material subject to disclosure. It appears that any factual material in a draft document used by the agency clearly would be part of the deliberative process and protected from disclosure. See Montrose Chem. Corp. v. Train, supra. If that were not the case, the court would find that the only severable factual material relevant to plaintiffs' request is the Background section to the draft trade regulation rule's statement of basis and purpose. However, that section appeared unchanged in the subsequently published version and thus would not have to be ordered disclosed.

Conclusion

The court concludes that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on all issues except with respect to two subdivisions of document A(2). Those two subdivisions, discussed earlier in this Memorandum, are not exempt and should be disclosed to plaintiffs. Had plaintiffs made an appropriate motion, they would have been entitled to summary judgment as to those two subdivisions. Under the circumstances such a motion is not necessary. Robbins v. Kleindienst, 383 F. Supp. 239, 250 (D. D. C. 1974). An appropriate judgment accompanies this Memorandum.

AVNET, INC. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION*

No. 73-1399. F.T.C. Docket No. 8775.

(United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, February 28, 1975)

1. CORPORATION WAS NOT DENIED RIGHT TO DEVELOP EVIDENCE ON QUESTION WHERE F.T.C. ASSERTED, EARLY IN HEARING, THAT RELEVANT MARKET WAS LIMITED TO PRODUCTION LINE REBUILDERS, EXCLUDING CUSTOM REBUILDERS.

[71] In Federal Trade Commission hearing concerning possible antitrust violation in corporation's acquisition of two competing manufacturers of parts which were sold to rebuilders of automotive electrical units, where early in hearing Commission asserted that relevant market was limited to production line rebuilders and excluded custom rebuilders, corporation was not denied right to develop evidence on question, notwithstanding fact that complaint did not specify limitation of relevant market.

2. F.T.C. DID NOT ERR IN CONCLUDING THAT RELEVANT MARKET FOR MANUFACTURERS OF NEW PARTS WAS LIMITED TO SALES OF NEW PARTS: PRICES BETWEEN NEW PARTS AND RECONDITIONED USED PARTS VARIED BETWEEN 25% AND 50%.

Where prices for rebuilt or reconditioned used parts for automotive electrical units varied from 25% to 50% below the prices for comparable new parts, and there was no substantial interaction in price between the two lines, Federal Trade Commission did not err in concluding that relevant market for manufacturers of new parts was limited to sales of new parts for purpose of determining whether acquisition of two manufacturers of new parts by corporation violated antitrust laws and there was no substantial interaction in price between the two lines.

3. IN DETERMINING POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF ANTITRUST LAW, F.T.C. HAS INITIAL BURDEN OF EXPLAINING WHY PARTICULAR GROUP SHOULD NOT BE INCLUDED WITHIN RELEVANT MARKET.

Federal Trade Commission has initial burden of explaining why a particular group of buyers or sellers should not be included within relevant market in determining possible violation of antitrust law.

4. F.T.C. PROPERLY LIMITED RELEVANT MARKET TO PARTS SOLD TO PRODUCTION LINE REBUILDERS WHERE CUSTOM REBUILDERS OF AUTOMOTIVE ELECTRICAL UNITS WERE PRIMARILY RETAILERS OF SERVICE.

Where custom rebuilders of automotive electrical units were primarily retailers of services, while production line rebuilders were manufacturers of products which were sold largely to jobbers and retailers as well, in determining whether acquisition by corporation of two competing manufacturers of parts sold to rebuilders violated antitrust law, Federal Trade Commission properly limited relevant market for parts sold to production line rebuilders.

5. IN FASHIONING APPROPRIATE REMEDIES, DEFERENCE MUST BE ACCORDED TO F.T.C.

Deference must be accorded to Federal Trade Commission in fashioning appropriate remedies.

6. SINCE IT WAS ACQUISITION OF SECOND MANUFACTURER WHICH WAS HEAVILY ENGAGED IN MANUFACTURE OF PARTS SOLD TO REBUILDERS OF AUTOMOTIVE ELECTRICAL UNITS THAT RESULTED IN VIOLATION OF THE LAW, F.T.C. DID NOT ABUSE ITS DISCRETION BY REQUIRING DIVESTITURE OF THE SECOND MANUFACTURER RATHER THAN THE FIRST MANUFACTURER ACQUIRED.

Where it was acquisition of second manufacturer of parts which were sold to rebuilders of automotive electrical units which resulted in violation of antitrust law, and second manufacturer was more heavily engaged in manufacture of such parts, Federal Trade Commission order requiring divestiture of second manufacturer acquired rather than first manufacturer acquired was not abuse of discretion.

7. EVEN THOUGH COMPETITION BETWEEN USED/REBUILT PARTS AND NEW PARTS WAS NOT SUFFICIENTLY INTENSE TO REQUIRE TREATMENT AS PART OF RELEVANT MARKET IN ANTITRUST VIOLATION, F.T.C. DID NOT ERR IN REQUIRING COMMISSION APPROVAL OF ANY ACQUISITION OF SUPPLIERS OF USED OR REBUILT PARTS FOR 10 YEARS.

Where corporation had violated antitrust law in acquiring two competing manufacturers of units which were sold to rebuilders of automotive electrical units, Federal Trade Commission did not err in requiring Commission approval of any acquisition by corporation of supplier of used or rebuilt parts during subse[72]quent ten years, even though competition between used or rebuilt parts and new parts was not sufficiently intense to require former to be treated as part of relevant market for purposes of determining whether antitrust violation had occurred.

On petition to review, court held that (1) the Commission did not fail to give adequate notice of limitations to relevant market; (2) the Commission did not err by excluding sales to custom rebuilders in determining relevant market; (3) the Commission did not err in the exclusion of sales of used and rebuilt parts in determining relevant market; (4) decision to require divestiture of manufacturer most substantially engaged in production of parts and prior Commission approval of acquisition of a supplier of used or rebuilt parts during ten-year period was within Commission's discretion.

Affirmed; judgment of enforcement entered.

Before FAIRCHILD, Chief Judge, and PELL and STEVENS, Circuit Judges.

STEVENS, Circuit Judge.

The Commission held that the acquisition by Avnet of two competing manufacturers of parts which are sold to rebuilders of automotive electrical units violated § 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended.[1] Avnet argues that it did not have a fair opportunity to meet the Commission's prima facie case because it did not anticipate the Commission's narrow definition of the relevant product market, and, in any event, that the evidence is insufficient to satisfy the Commission's initial burden on the relevant market issue. We find no unfairness in the way the case was tried and have no difficulty in concluding that the evidence adequately supports the Commission's findings.

As a preface to our discussion of Avnet's principal contentions, we shall briefly summarize the Commission's description of the industry, review the history of the proceedings, and identify the evidence which, according to Avnet, it was unable to present.

I.

Among the automobile parts which may need to be replaced or repaired as a car ages are electrical units, such as generators, alternators, starters and voltage regulators. These "automotive electrical units," ("AEU's") are made by original equipment manufacturers ("OEM's") and by rebuilders. OEM's include the major automobile companies and other firms that produce equipment for installation on new vehicles. They sell replacement units to warehouse distributors ("WD's"), who in turn resell individual units, as well as components of such units, to retailers such as repair shops, service stations, garages and car dealers.

---

[1] The pertinent portion of Section 7 of the amended Clayton Act, 64 Stat. 1125 (1950), 15 U.S.C. § 18 (1970), provides:

"No corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly." The Commission's decision is reported at 82 F.T.C. 444 (1973).

The record in this case demonstrates that the prices at which WD's sell new AEU's are significantly higher than the prices at which comparable AEU's can be rebuilt and sold at a profit. A used unit may be dismantled, cleaned and reassembled with such substitute components as may be needed.[2] Such rebuilding may take place in repair shops where one unit at a time is put back in working order for an individual customer ("custom rebuilding"), or in a production-line operation where units are rebuilt in large quantities and then sold to jobbers for distribution to the retail trade ("production-line rebuilding"). There are about 150 or 200 production-line rebuilders in the entire country.[3]

The "rebuilders supply industry" includes the firms which sell new components to rebuilders of AEU's. Counsel for the Commission consistently contended that the industry is composed of only 16 or 17 principal manufacturers with aggregate annual sales of about $20 mil[73]lion.[4] The alleged violation resulted from the combination of IPM, the largest, and Valley Forge, the third largest, of these firms. Before the combination, IPM had sales of over $11 million and Valley

In addition, the Hearing Examiner and the Commission both noted that in 1964, Ford, Chrysler and General Motors had sales to authorized rebuilders which amounted to about 3% of the foregoing total.

Forge's were almost $2 million. Avnet acquired the assets of Valley Forge as of July 31, 1964, and those of IPM as of January 31, 1965. After the second acquisition, Avnet's sales represented about two-thirds of the total in the market as viewed by the Commission.

II.

Both the complaint, which issued on April 1, 1969, and the amended complaint of December 1, 1969,[5] alleged that 16 firms, of which IPM and Valley Forge were the largest and third largest, supplied virtually the total value of equipment and parts furnished to rebuilders.

The evidentiary hearing commenced on February 1, 1971. During the preceding 16 months, the parties conducted pretrial discovery, argued about the adequacy of Avnet's compliance with discovery orders, stipulated about certain facts and issues, and agreed that, in advance of trial, each would provide the other with a list of witnesses and copies of proposed exhibits.

From the outset Avnet disputed the Commission's position that the market was composed of 16 principal firms.[6] It attempted, in three different ways, to develop evidence that the 16 firms have so many competitors that their sales do not comprise a relevant market or submarket. First, Avnet requested the Hearing Examiner to issue subpoenas to the 14 competitors of IPM and Valley Forge calling for disclosure of their customer lists, and thereafter to subpoena all those customers to learn their sources of supply. The Hearing Examiner quite properly rejected this request[7] and directed Avnet, at least as an initial matter, to make its own inquiries of the customers of IPM and Valley Forge. Second, according to Avnet's counsel, Avnet did attempt to develop evidence by a study of its own records and by interviewing its customers; presumably the results of those efforts were later incorporated in Avnet's presentation of evidence at the trial. Third, well after the trial was under way, through conver[74]sations with its sales personnel and through an independent market research study, Avnet sought to prove that the volume of business handled by custom rebuilders was so enormous that, by inference, there must be such a significant total volume of sales by rebuilder suppliers that the statistics relating to the 16 firms identified by the Commission should be disregarded as essentially meaningless. The Hearing Examiner excluded the market study for procedural reasons.[8] [5] The amendment excluded from the relevant line of commerce (1) the supply of used (as opposed to new) parts for rebuilt AEU's, and (2) the sale of parts by OEM's to "authorized rebuilders." An "authorized rebuilder" is one, who, pursuant to specific agreement with an OEM, is authorized to rebuild that firm's units. Although Avnet challenged the latter exclusion, the Commission noted that it related to only about 3% of total industry sales.

[6] Avnet's answer denied the allegations in paragraph 15 of the complaint. Moreover, Avnet stipulated that one of the contested issues was: "Whether sixteen firms supplied virtually the total volume of equipment and new parts furnished to rebuilders in 1964?"

On the basis of the voluminous evidence in the record, the Hearing Examiner concluded that the acquisition violated § 7 of the Clayton Act and recommended an order requiring Avnet to divest IPM. He found that the relevant market included the sale of new components by rebuilder suppliers to rebuilders and that the contours of the market were fairly delineated by the sales of the 16 principal suppliers to 150 to 200 production-line rebuilders. In so finding, he resolved the "sharp disagreement between the parties over the meaning of the term 'rebuilder' as used in paragraph 1(b) of the complaint."[9] His market analysis and conclusion summarizing competitive impact of the acquisition were corroborated in large part by an opinion expressed by a Valley Forge executive in memoranda outlining the advantages to Avnet of the acquisition of IPM.

In a carefully prepared opinion by Chairman Kirkpatrick, the Commission approved the findings and order proposed by the Hearing Examiner. Commissioner Dennison dissented on the ground that complaint counsel had not met their burden of demonstrating the size and dimensions of the relevant line of commerce.

III.

The record contains a great deal of testimony by rebuilder suppliers and by production-line rebuilders. It is clear that the production-line rebuilders could not survive without an adequate source of supply of new parts. Because the prices charged by OEM's and WD's are so high, the production-line rebuilders must obtain such parts from rebuilder suppliers. The testimony indicates that they relied primarily on IPM, Valley Forge and two other suppliers for these parts.

Unlike production-line rebuilders, who operate at a manufacturing level and sell largely to jobbers, custom rebuilders operate at the retail level dealing directly with consumers. At that level, particularly since their charges cover their labor and specialized expertise, they can afford to purchase OEM parts from WD's. They may, of course, also purchase new, used, or rebuilt components from other sources, including rebuilder suppliers. We know that some of the rebuilder suppliers sell either nothing, or at most very little, to custom rebuilders,[10] and we also know that IPM makes some sales to custom rebuilders.[11] [75] But the record does not tell us what portion of the rebuilder suppliers' total sales, or even what portion of IPM's or Valley Forge's total sales, were to custom rebuilders rather than production-line rebuilders.

[8] The pretrial order required Avnet to list its exhibits by January 25, 1971. The Commission completed its case on February 25, 1971, and the trial was then recessed until May 6, 1971, to give Avnet time for additional discovery and preparation. On April 19, 1971, Avnet employed United States Testing Company, Inc. to conduct a survey, but made no disclosure of that fact until July 9, 1971, when it moved to amend its list of proposed exhibits. The Hearing Examiner denied the motion as untimely, emphasizing Avnet's past failure to act with appropriate diligence and candor in the preparation of the matter for trial.

[9] See findings 18-40, 82 F.T.C. at 402-407, where the Examiner substantially equates the terms "rebuilder" and "production-line rebuilders," on the one hand, and "repair shops" and "custom rebuilders," on the other, to exclude custom rebuilders from the demand side of the market.

Avnet contends that such information is of critical importance in appraising the Commission's definition of the relevant market, and that it was prevented from developing such evidence as well as any other evidence identifying the dimension of the business of supplying custom rebuilders throughout the country, by the Commission's failure to give it adequate notice that the Hearing Examiner, and ultimately the Commission, would decide that the term "rebuilders" includes only production-line operators and excludes custom rebuilders. As we understand Avnet's principal argument, which is phrased in terms of a "denial of administrative due process," if its counsel had understood the theory of complaint counsel's case they would have proved (a) that for the purposes of this case, any distinction between production-line rebuilders and custom rebuilders is invalid,[12] and (b) that the inclusion of sales to custom rebuilders would so enlarge the relevant market as to undermine completely the Commission's prima facie case. Specifically, Avnet contends that it would not have waited so long (1) to develop evidence from its own sales personnel describing the 3,300 customers of [10] The testimony of some representatives of the rebuilder suppliers made it quite clear that their sales to custom rebuilders were not significant. See, for example, the testimony of the witnesses Flynn (App. 591-592, 593-594), Kamber (App. 617), Green (App. 602), Winters (App. 663), and McCullough (App. 686).

[11] Since IPM has a list of 3,500 customers and since there are only 150 or 200 production-line rebuilders in the country, it is fair to infer that at least some of IPM's customers were custom rebuilders. Of course, the number of customers tells us little about their volume of purchases. There is a stipulation in the record describing IPM's sales to 49 [75] customers with individual annual purchases ranging from $23.25 to $5,165.44. These figures are to be contrasted with IPM's total sales of over $11 million. We have not found any evidence, or any offer of proof, by either party establishing the dollar value of sales by IPM or Valley Forge to production-line and custom rebuilders, respectively.

[12] In its brief at page 28 and footnote 22, Avnet states:

"First, because Avnet lacked adequate notice, it was unable to develop and present vital evidence to support its contention that sales to all the kinds of rebuilders reflected on IPM's list of 3,500 active customers should be included in the relevant market. If the Commission's Amended Complaint had charged that only sales to a definite class of 'production-line rebuilders' were to be included in the market, Avnet would have had the opportunity to survey its active customers to ascertain which among them fit the Commission's definition of production-line rebuilders, to ascertain its sales to such rebuilders, to elicit evidence regarding their other suppliers, to demonstrate that these rebuilders compete directly with other kinds of rebuilders, and to conduct those additional inquiries which would be reasonably expected to yield relevant evidence regarding the validity of the Commission's restrictive definition of the term 'rebuilder.'[22] No such discovery efforts were undertaken by Avnet—for the sole reason that it was not given fair notice by the Commission that such inquiries were either required or relevant.

> [22] Fragmentary evidence on many of these issues is contained in the record. Avnet maintains, for example, that the record demonstrates the existence of real competition for the ultimate consumer's dollar between custom rebuilt and production-line rebuilt electrical units. (see, e.g., RPF 215-22, App. Vol. IV, and the transcript references contained therein.) The point in the text, however, is that Avnet was denied any opportunity during the prehearing stages of this proceeding to develop the kind of comprehensive evidence necessary to demonstrate the invalidity of the arbitrary definition of rebuilder subsequently adopted by the Hearing Examiner and the Commission."

IPM who are not production-line rebuilders, and (2) to obtain a market study delineating the volume done by custom rebuilders.[13]

IV.

[76] [1] We find Avnet's "administrative due process" argument unpersuasive. It relies largely on the fact that both the amended complaint and a trade practice rule[14] promulgated by the Commission contain a functional definition of the term "rebuilder" which can be read to include custom rebuilding as well as production-line rebuilding, and on the further fact that the amended complaint described the demand side of the market as "highly fragmented," and referred to IPM's sales "to over 5,000 independent distributors and rebuilders."

Avnet had no reason to rely on the trade practice rule as significant in this proceeding. The rule relates to the manner in which rebuilt units must be labeled when they are sold. Since, by hypothesis, custom rebuilding does not involve the sale of any such unit but rather the reconstruction of the customer's property, the rule is, in terms, inapplicable to the issue here.

Avnet's reading of the complaint was, however, reasonable. The reference to "over 5,000" customers of IPM certainly implied that all of IPM's sales were intended to be treated as within the relevant market; since presumably some of those sales were to custom rebuilders, one might well infer that the market was intended to include all custom rebuilders. But even if Avnet's counsel did originally assume that complaint counsel intended to treat all sales to custom rebuilders as part of the relevant market, it soon became manifest that the critical question in the case was whether or not counsel was correct in using the list of 16 firms to outline a relevant market. Arguably, but by no means necessarily, the answer to that question would be affected by the definition of the term "rebuilder" and, more narrowly, by whether sales to custom rebuilders would be treated as relevant. For that reason, as the Examiner found, a "sharp dispute" between the parties developed over the proper definition of that term. The portions of the record which are before us do not indicate precisely when that dispute developed. We are not at all persuaded, however, that the dispute arose so late in the proceeding that Avnet was powerless to muster evidence or argument to meet complaint counsel's case.

[13] Avnet contends that its survey would have shown a market for new, rebuilt and used parts of more than $300 million and, if admitted, would have rebutted the Commission's evidence tending to prove a relevant market of only about $20 million. We have examined the study identified as Respondent's Exhibit 88 (Rejected); we find no offer of supplementary expert oral testimony. For at least three reasons, the rejected exhibit does not appear to us to be inconsistent with the Commission's analysis of the market. First, it apparently includes sales of rebuilt AEU's which include used and rebuilt, as well as new, components; second, it apparently includes sales of custom rebuilt units which include components purchased from WD's and, therefore, indirectly from OEM's; and third, its price analysis is directed to the retail market, whereas IPM, Valley Forge, and [76] their competitors were selling to companies engaged in the manufacturing business who sold largely to jobbers, who in turn would resell to retailers. We find nothing in the study shedding any light on the magnitude of sales at the level at which IPM and Valley Forge sold. We are inclined to attach greater significance to Avnet's failure to make a timely offer of a breakdown of its own sales to custom rebuilders and production-line rebuilders than to any extrapolation suggested by the rejected offer.

[14] The FTC rule provides that a product cannot be identified as "rebuilt" or "remanufactured" unless it has been > "dismantled and reconstructed as necessary, all of its internal and external parts cleaned and made free from rust and corrosion, all impaired, defective or substantially worn parts restored to a sound condition or replaced with new, rebuilt or unimpaired used parts, all missing parts replaced with new, rebuilt or unimpaired used parts, and such rewinding or machining and other operations performed as are necessary to put the industry product in sound working condition." 16 C.F.R. § 62.3(b) (1974) (footnotes omitted).

The rule also provides that units can be sold as "rebuilt" only after they have undergone this process and are labeled as rebuilt. Units which are not sold, or are not sold "to the trade," need not be labeled if it is "clearly understood by all purchasers . . . that the products, or parts thereof . . . have been used." 16 C.F.R. § 62.1(b)(1).

We note that Avnet's argument before the Hearing Examiner anticipated complaint counsel's position that only sales to production-line rebuilders were relevant.[15] We also find no discussion in Chairman Kirkpatrick's opinion for the Commission of any claim that Avnet was surprised by the definition of the term "rebuilder." The Commission did explain in detail its agreement with the Examiner's exclusion of custom rebuilding from the demand side of the market[16] and with his procedural and [77] evidentiary rulings.[17] But Chairman Kirkpatrick's opinion does not even mention the inadequate notice argument that Avent advances in this court.

Without further belaboring the point, we merely state that our review of the record convinces us that Avnet's counsel had sufficient understanding of the issues, and sufficient time to prepare Avnet's defense, to require rejection of the argument that they were denied administrative due process when the Hearing Examiner accepted complaint counsel's definition of the term "rebuilder." The test of fairness as stated in Cella v. United States, 208 F.2d 783, 789 (7th Cir. 1953), cert. denied, 347 U.S. 1016, 74 S.Ct. 864, 98 L.Ed. 1138, and L. G. Balfour Company v. F.T.C., 442 F.2d 1, 17-19 (7th Cir. 1971), was easily met.[18]

V.

We also find no merit in the argument that the Commission relieved complaint counsel of the burden of proving the size of the relevant market and thereby deprived Avnet of administrative due process. The Examiner did not purport to make any such ruling. On the contrary, he found that the census data, the industry witnesses' testimony, the sales data for the 16 principal rebuilder suppliers, and the corroborating expressions of opinion in memoranda prepared by the witness Fischer, an executive of Valley Forge, constituted sufficient evidence on which to predicate the conclusion that complaint counsel had met their burden of proof.[19]

[16] See 82 F.T.C. at 448 et seq. The Commission stated:

> "Throughout the proceeding below and on appeal, respondent has contended that [77] the term 'rebuilder' refers to all firms that engage in the physical operation of disassembling a unit, cleaning, testing, replacing or reconditioning defective or worn parts, and reassembling and testing the finished product." 82 F.T.C. at 449 (Emphasis added).

This statement provides a sufficient basis for distinguishing Rodale Press, Inc. v. F.T.C., 132 U.S.App.D.C. 317, 407 F.2d 1252, 1255-6 (1968), and Bendix Corporation v. F.T.C., 450 F.2d 534 (6th Cir. 1971), both of which involved a complete change in theory at the Commission level.

[18] In Cella we stated:

> "In an administrative proceeding it is only necessary that the one proceeded against be reasonably apprised of the issues in controversy, and any such notice is adequate in the absence of a showing that a party was misled."

In Balfour we stated:

> "As the Commission case against petitioners unfolded, there was a 'reasonable opportunity to know the claims of the opposing party and to meet them.' " 442 F.2d at 19.

VI.

At pages 42-57 of its brief, Avnet argues that the Commission erred on the merits by artificially limiting the relevant market in two respects: first, by excluding sales to customer rebuilders, and second, by excluding sales of used and rebuilt parts.

[2] The second exclusion was manifestly correct. The Commission found that prices for rebuilt or reconditioned used components varied from 25% to 50% below the prices for comparable new items.[20] Moreover, it noted the absence of any substantial interaction in price between the two lines. These factors are sufficient to support the finding that they should be placed in different submarkets. See Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S.Ct. 1502, 8 L.Ed.2d 510; United States v. Aluminum Company of America, 377 U.S. 271, 276, 84 S.Ct. 1283, 12 L.Ed.2d 314; cf. United States v. Aluminum Company of America, 148 F.2d 416, 425 (2d Cir. 1945).

[78] [3,4] We are also persuaded that the omission of sales to custom rebuilders was not error. The Commission, of course, has the initial burden of explaining why a particular group of buyers or sellers should not be included within the relevant market. In this case the Commission met that burden by proving that custom rebuilders and production-line rebuilders perform significantly different functions and operate at significantly different levels of distribution within the overall market for the repair or replacement of AEU's. The custom rebuilder is primarly a retailer of services; the production-line rebuilder is a manufacturer of products which are sold largely to jobbers, and presumably to retailers as well.[21] In our opinion, the clear

[19] In United States v. Connecticut National Bank, 418 U.S. 656, 94 S.Ct. 2788, 41 L.Ed.2d 1016 (1974), the Supreme Court characterized the quality of the government's burden of proving the contours of the relevant geographic market as its "role to come forward with evidence delineating the rough approximation of localized banking markets . . ." 418 U.S. at 669, 94 S.Ct. at 279. Presumably a similar "rough approximation" may be sufficient to make out a prima facie case on the relevant product market issue.

[20] Respondent is incorrect in its statement that the Commission ignored the fact that the commonly quoted "exchange price" for rebuilt parts includes a used core as part of the purchase price. Avnet's brief at page 55. See Commission opinion at 82 F.T.C. 457-458.

[21] As the Commission noted in its opinion: "The facts found by the judge demonstrate that production-line rebuilders sell a product, not a service, to entirely different classes of customers at different distribution levels using completely different pricing methods." 82 F.T.C. at 450.

functional difference between the two groups of rebuilders provides an adequate prima facie basis for placing them in different submarkets.[22]

It is, of course, entirely possible that the rebuilder suppliers may sell sufficient quantities of parts to custom rebuilders at prices comparable to those charged to production-line rebuilders to support the conclusion that such sales should be treated as part of the relevant market. If that be the fact, however, since the Commission satisfied its initial burden it was incumbent upon Avnet to prove that the custom rebuilders made purchases from competitors of IPM and Valley Forge in significant volume. That burden could not be discharged by evidence concerning purchases of used or rebuilt parts, or by evidence of purchases of OEM parts from WD's. The testimony of the industry witnesses indicated that the volume of purchases by custom rebuilders from the principal rebuilder suppliers was not significant.[23] It therefore seems improbable that detailed evidence concerning the volume of sales of new parts to custom rebuilders by rebuilder suppliers would be significant. But even assuming that it might be, Avnet did not make a timely, or a complete, offer of proof showing the amount of its own, or of any of its competitors', sales to custom rebuilders. Quite clearly, Avnet did not overcome the Commission's prima facie showing that purchases by custom rebuilders were not part of the relevant market.

The Commission's analysis of this aspect of the case is corroborated by statements made by a vice-president and director of Avnet in a pre-acquisition memorandum. That memorandum states, in part:

> [79] The acquisition of IPM would serve chiefly to remove our most major competitor from the scene. This would reduce to an overwhelming extent the price competition that is a major factor in the industry. In many cases severe competition has held profit margins on key items to a reduced level owing to the ability of two firms to offer substantially the same item at the same price. IPM has been very active in offering preferential discounts to large customers which Valley Forge has been obliged to meet. It is recognized by both Valley Forge and IPM that we must retain a reasonable share of the business from the larger users for they represent the primary target of any substantial tooling. We both recognize that large customers are necessary for our continued growth. This has produced a situation where the large customer has used his

[22] This conclusion is buttressed by the fact, as stated by the Commission, that "while production-line rebuilders could not operate without a supply of new parts from rebuilder suppliers, custom rebuilders buy their new parts primarily from OEM wholesale distributors at prices 20-40 percent higher than those charged by the rebuilder suppliers." 82 F.T.C. at 450. The Commission added the following footnote at this point in its opinion:

> [13] Although the judge in his initial decision made no finding as to the differential between the prices charged to rebuilders by wholesalers and those charged by rebuilder suppliers, the testimony cited by the judge demonstrates that WD prices to rebuilders were at least 20-40 percent higher than rebuilder supplier prices. For example, the President of Precision Field Coil noted that WD prices for General Motors' field coils were $4.41 while Precision sold to rebuilders at $2.76. (Tr. 538-39). One of the nation's largest rebuilders testified that IPM's prices were at least 20 percent cheaper than WD prices. (Tr. 843). The President of Valley Forge indicated that Valley Forge and IPM generally sold at a price 70 percent off OEM list price while jobbers sold at a 50 percent discount. (CX 37e). Thus, jobbers sold at prices over 60 percent greater than those of rebuilder suppliers."

Unquestionably the substantial price differentials make it appropriate to exclude the sales by OEM distributors to custom rebuilders from the market under study in this case. It necessarily follows, therefore, that it would have been inappropriate to include all sales to custom rebuilders in the relevant market.

> position to play off one against the other. In this situation Maremont has been the chief offender and has used their purchasing power in the most effective manner.

Quite plainly this comment supports the inference that competition for the patronage of the production-line rebuilders was of paramount importance to the rebuilder suppliers and tends to justify discounting the significance of their sales to custom rebuilders.

VII.

Finally, Avnet objects to the portions of the order which require (1) divestiture of IPM rather than Valley Forge, and (2) Commission approval of any acquisition by Avnet of a supplier of used or rebuilt parts during the next 10 years.

[5,6] Deference must be accorded to the Commission in fashioning the appropriate remedy. See Papercraft Corp. v. F.T.C., 472 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1973), and cases cited at 933 n. 17. Since it was the acquisition of IPM, rather than the earlier acquisition of Valley Forge, which violated the statute,[24] and since the record indicates that Avnet has caused Valley Forge to emphasize expansion in its ignition parts business rather than the rebuilders supply business, it was manifestly appropriate for the Commission to order divestiture of IPM.

[7] We are also persuaded that even though the competition between used or rebuilt parts and new parts is not sufficiently intense to require the former to be treated as part of the relevant market for purposes of determining whether a violation occurred, it was nevertheless permissible for the Commission to consider the significance of that competition, together with Avnet's past history of acquisitions, in defining the scope of Avnet's obligation to obtain Commission approval of future acquisitions. We are unwilling to say that this portion of the remedy does not have a "reasonable relation to the unlawful practices found to exist." Federal Trade Commission v. National Lead Co., 352 U.S. 419, 429, 77 S.Ct. 502, 1 L.Ed.2d 438.

Accordingly, we affirm and enter judgment enforcing the order of the Commission.

[24] Accordingly, the IPM assets have been "held . . . contrary to the provisions of [§ 7 of the Clayton Act]." See United States v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 420 U.S. 223, 95 S.Ct. 926, and cases cited therein.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. MANAGER, RETAIL CREDIT COMPANY, MIAMI BRANCH OFFICE*

No. 73-1844. F.T.C. File No. 99-131.

(United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, February 28, 1975)

1. INFORMATION BEARING ON AUTHORIZED AGENCY INQUIRIES IS WITHIN F.T.C.'S PLENARY POWER TO OBTAIN SUCH INFORMATION.

Federal Trade Commission has plenary power to secure information bearing on authorized agency inquiries.

2. AGENCY MAY TAKE STEPS TO INFORM ITSELF ABOUT PROBABLE VIOLATION OF LAW WHEN THE DUTY TO DO SO IS DELEGATED BY STATUTE TO THAT AGENCY.

When investigative and accusatory duties are delegated by statute to administrative body, it may take steps to inform itself as to whether there is probable violation of law.

3. GENERAL PROVISIONS ARE SUBORDINATE TO SPECIFIC STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Specific statutory provision prevails over a more general provision.

4. INTERPRETING STATUTE IN WAY WHICH RENDERS IT INEFFECTIVE IS PRESUMED AGAINST.

Presumption against interpreting a statute in a way which renders it ineffective is rudimentary law.

5. STATUTE SHOULD BE READ AND CONSTRUED AS A WHOLE.

Statute should be read and construed as a whole.

6. RESOLUTION OF AMBIGUITY NOT ITS CREATION, IS A PROPER FUNCTION OF LEGISLATIVE HISTORY.

Proper function of legislative history is to resolve ambiguity and not to create it.

7. WHERE LANGUAGE OF ENACTMENT IS CLEAR AND CONSTRUCTION DOES NOT LEAD TO ABSURD OR IMPRACTICABLE CONSEQUENCES, WORDS ARE TO BE TAKEN AS FINAL EXPRESSION OF INTENDED MEANING.

Where doubt exists and construction is permissible, reports of committees of Congress and statements by those in charge of measure and other like extraneous matter may be considered to aid in ascertaining true legislative intent, but where language of enactment is clear and construction according to its terms does not lead to absurd or impracticable consequences, words employed are to be taken as final expression of meaning intended.

8. FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT ENFORCEMENT IS MANDATED TO F.T.C.; THEREFORE, F.T.C. IS NOT COMPELLED TO OBTAIN COURT ORDER TO COMPEL DISCLOSURES FOR INVESTIGATIVE PURPOSES.

Federal Trade Commission charged with enforcement of Fair Credit Reporting Act is not compelled to obtain a court order or permission of affected consumers in order to compel disclosures of consumer credit reports from credit-reporting agency for purpose of Commission investigation, since Commission had special statutory power incident to its role as enforcer of the Act.

9. PARTIES NOT IN PURVIEW OF FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT ARE NOT BARRED FROM DISCLOSING INFORMATION TO F.T.C. BY STRICTURES OF THE ACT.

Since Federal Trade Commission could obtain consumer credit reports from credit-reporting agencies without regard to strictures of the Fair Credit Reporting Act, strictures of Act do not bar disclosure to Commission by customers of the credit-reporting agencies which are not parties within purview of Act.

10. F.T.C. IS PROHIBITED BY FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT FROM USING DISCLOSED INFORMATION FOR ANY PURPOSE OTHER THAN CARRYING OUT ITS ENFORCEMENT DUTIES UNDER THE ACT.

[989] It is implicit in statutory scheme of Fair Credit Reporting Act that the Federal Trade Commission in securing consumer reports from credit-reporting agencies for purpose of investigation is prohibited from using the information in those reports for any purpose other than carrying out its enforcement duties under the Act.

On appeal from district court judgment requiring F.T.C. to obtain court order to obtain disclosure of information under the Fair Credit Reporting Act, appellate court held that F.T.C. did not need to obtain court order compelling disclosures because of its role as enforcer of the Act.

The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) applied to the District Court for enforcement of an administrative subpoena duces tecum requiring the Retail Credit Company (Retail) to produce documentary evidence for a Commission investigation of the practices of certain consumer reporting agencies under the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA), 15 U.S.C. § 1681 et seq. Following a trial the District Court ruled that the FTC, like other Government agencies seeking consumer credit reports regulated by the FCRA, must obtain a court order or the permission of affected consumers in order to compel disclosure of the documents.[1] Because we conclude that the FTC has special statutory power incident to its role as enforcer of the FCRA, we reverse.

I

In 1970 Congress appended to the Consumer Credit Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1601 et seq., a number of provisions collectively known as the Fair Credit Reporting Act. Section 602 of the FCRA recognized that "[c]onsumer reporting agencies have assumed a vital role in assembling and evaluating consumer credit and other information on consumers" and affirmed the "need to insure that [such] agencies exercise their grave responsibilities with fairness, impartiality, and a respect for the consumer's right to privacy." The congressional prescription was a comprehensive series of restrictions on the disclosure and use of credit information assembled by consumer reporting agencies. Section 604 identifies three instances in which reporting agencies may furnish credit reports: (1) in response to an appropriate court order; (2) by permission of consumers whose credit ratings are documented in the reports sought; and (3) to a person with a legitimate business interest in the information.[2] Section 608 [990] allows disclosure of limited portions of the reports—essentially identifying information—to governmental agencies unable to qualify under any of the subsections of section 604.[3] The Act attaches special restrictions to the preparation and disclosure of investigative consumer reports[4] and requires that an agency apprise a consumer who makes an appropriate request of the nature and substance of information in his file, the sources of the data, and the identity of parties to whom it is released.[5]

Section 621 sets forth an elaborate scheme for administrative enforcement of the FCRA. Subsection (a) imposes upon the Federal Trade Commission the responsibility for enforcing compliance with the requirements of the FCRA with respect to the preponderance of consumer reporting agencies and affirms the Commission's right to use its customary procedural, investigative and enforcement powers.[6]

[2] § 604. Permissible purposes of consumer reports

A consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report under the following circumstances and no other:

(1) In response to the order of a court having jurisdiction to issue such an order.

(2) In accordance with the written instructions of the consumer to whom it relates.

(3) To a person which it has reason to believe—

(A) intends to use the information in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer on whom the information is to be furnished and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer; or

(B) intends to use the information for employment purposes; or

(C) intends to use the information in connection with the underwriting of insurance involving the consumer; or

[990] (D) intends to use the information in connection with a determination of the consumer's eligibility for a license or other benefit granted by a governmental instrumentality required by law to consider an applicant's financial responsibility or status; or

(E) otherwise has a legitimate business need for the information in connection with a business transaction involving the consumer.

Act § 604, 15 U.S.C. § 1681b.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 604, a consumer reporting agency may furnish identifying information respecting any consumer, limited to his name, address, former addresses, places of employment, or former places of employment, to a governmental agency.

(a) Compliance with the requirements imposed under this title shall be enforced under the Federal Trade Commission Act by the Federal Trade Commission with respect to consumer reporting agencies and all other persons subject thereto, except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this title is specifically committed to some other government agency under subsection (b) hereof. qualifications for insurance, including personal information on character, reputation, and life style. Specification 7 of the subpoena requested production of the complete files of all consumers who since January 1 had directed the Miami Branch Office to release information in their files. Specification 9 sought the complete files of all individuals investigated by four named credit investigators during certain periods of time. Retail complied with the entirety of the subpoena save specifications 7 and 9; in a letter dated May 8, 1972, the company explained that the disclosures requested in those paragraphs would violate both section 604 of the Fair Credit Reporting Act and the rights of privacy of those consumers whose reports the Commission was seeking.[9]

The FTC petitioned the District Court for an order compelling compliance with its subpoena and for a declaration, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2201 (1959), that section 621 of the FCRA permits voluntary compliance with Commission requests for the production of consumer reports. Retail Credit counterclaimed for a declaration that the Act forbids distribution of consumer reports unless the request is supported by court order or consumer authorization. Because the FTC managed to obtain some of Retail's consumer reports distributed to insurance companies after the initial pleadings were filed, Retail amended its counterclaim to include a request for a declaration that no person or organization could release its reports unless the requirements of section 604 were followed.

At trial Commission witnesses testified to the need for prompt access to consumer reports in investigations of reporting agencies' compliance with the FCRA. Retail responded that the language of the statute did not allow disclosure by administrative subpoena, that the procedures which the Act specified were adequate for the Commission's task, and that the privacy considerations which had prompted passage of the FCRA militated against any unauthorized or unnecessary disclosure. On April 23, 1973, the District Court entered an order denying the Commission's power to compel production of Retail's consumer reports by administrative subpoena. Instead the court treated the FTC petition as an application for a court order under section 604 of the FCRA and proceeded to grant the application, subject to Commission notification, by mail and publication, of the consumers whose reports were sought, in order to afford them an opportunity to refuse disclosure. Because the court denied the FTC direct access to Retail's consumer reports, it similarly disapproved the agency's efforts to secure the reports from third parties who had purchased them for legitimate business purposes, and forbad that line of attack in the future.

II

The Fair Credit Reporting Act speaks with apparent ambiguity of the FTC's power to obtain consumer reports from reporting agencies. Section 604 establishes a seemingly exclusive catalogue of the instances in which reports may be disclosed—"A consumer reporting agency [993] may furnish a consumer report under the following circumstances and no other"—and includes in the list disclosure by court order, with consumer permission, and for a legitimate business purpose. Section 608 also specifically authorizes disclosure of limited identifying information to Government agencies and thus creates no real exception to the general prohibition of section 604.

[1,2] On the other hand, section 621(a), the provision for administrative enforcement of the FCRA, grants the Commission "such procedural, investigative, and enforcement powers, including the power . . . to require . . . the production of documents, and the appearance of witnesses as though the applicable terms and conditions of the Federal Trade Commission Act were part of this title." (Emphasis added.) The inclusive language of the relevant portion of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 49, applicable to enforcement of the

FCRA mutatis mutandis, indicates that the investigative powers of the Commission are broad enough to include the subpoena of consumer reports:

> [F]or the purposes of this Act the Commission . . . shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against; and the commission shall have the power to require by subpoena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such documentary evidence relating to any matter under investigation. * * * (Emphasis added.)

The Commission's plenary power to secure information bearing on authorized agency inquiries is well established by judicial decision. United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 652-53, 70 S.Ct. 357, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950); Oklahoma Press Publishing Co. v. Walling, 327 U.S. 186, 199-201, 216-17, 66 S.Ct. 494, 90 L.Ed. 614 (1946); Adams v. FTC, 296 F.2d 861, 866 (8th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 369 U.S. 864, 82 S.Ct. 1029, 8 L.Ed.2d 83 (1962); FTC v. Green, 252 F.Supp. 153 (S.D.N.Y.1966). Cf. FTC v. Browning, 140 U.S.App.D.C. 292, 295 n. 7, 435 F.2d 96, 99 n. 7 (1970). Claims of secrecy of subpoenaed information have generally proved no barrier to discovery by the FTC. FTC v. Tuttle, 244 F.2d 605 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 354 U.S. 925, 77 S.Ct. 1379, 1 L.Ed.2d 1436 (1957); FTC v. Cooper, CCH 1962 Trade Cases, ¶ 70, 353 (S.D.N.Y.). As Justice Jackson remarked in Morton Salt, supra, interpreting the precise statute that is here incorporated by reference, "[w]hen investigative and accusatory duties are delegated by statute to an administrative body, it, too, may take steps to inform itself as to whether there is probable violation of the law." 338 U.S. at 643, 70 S.Ct. at 364. "The only power that is involved here is the power to get information from those who best can give it and who are most interested in not doing so." 338 U.S. at 642, 70 S.Ct. at 364.

To interpret correctly the powers which Congress conferred on the FTC we must resort to various tools of interpretation. The District Court employed two distinct analytic methods—legislative history and traditional canons of statutory construction—both of which led it to the determination that sections 604 and 608 define the limits of FTC power to obtain consumer credit reports. We find the latter method dispositive, and mention the legislative history of the FCRA only to demonstrate that it neither supports nor undermines our conclusion, but is in fact mute on the issue involved in this case.

[3] The principle that a specific statutory provision prevails over a more general provision is established beyond question. Clifford F.

MacEvoy Co. v. United States, 322 U.S. 102, 107, 64 S.Ct. 890, 88 L.Ed. 1163 (1944)[10]; D. Ginsberg & Sons [994] v. Popkin, 285 U.S. 204, 208, 52 S.Ct. 322, 76 L.Ed. 704 (1932); United States v. City of Chester, 144 F.2d 415, 421 (3d Cir. 1944). The District Court applied this rule and found that sections 604 and 608 deal more specifically with disclosure of consumer reports than section 621, a general statement of FTC powers and responsibilities. Because disclosure was identified as the pertinent subject, the Act's general statement of disclosure requirements, section 604, the most thorough treatment of the topic, was accorded priority. Of course a topic can always be isolated which is treated more precisely in one paragraph than in the next. But this controversy revolves around FTC power to compel production of reports in aid of its duty to enforce the Act, not around reporting agencies' responsibilities in voluntarily releasing data in their daily operations. The proposition can scarcely be stated in terms which do not answer the question this case presents, that section 621 deals more specifically with FTC authority to obtain consumer reports for enforcement purposes than do sections 604 and 608, which outline the general requirements of confidentiality imposed on reporting agencies vis-a-vis consumers and clients.

Section 608, "Disclosure to Governmental Agencies," specifically allows disclosure of "identifying information respecting any consumer . . . to a government agency." Clearly agencies in need of greater detail must pursue it according to the strictures of section 604, absent some other statutory basis for access to consumer reports. Retail reasoned, and the trial court ruled, that section 608 creates "no special exception . . . for the Federal Trade Commission."[11] This conclusion is predicated on the faulty premise that section 608 is the sole provision in the Act creating an exception from section 604 for governmental agencies. Section 608 confers additional power on agencies, but without restrictive language of the sort used in section 604. Section 621, like section 608, constitutes an exception to the general rule of section 604—in fact, it is the precise "special exception . . . for the Federal Trade Commission" which the trial court overlooked. To the general rule for governmental agencies, section 621 adds additional authority: in fulfilling its duty of administrative enforcement, the FTC shall have "the power . . . to require . . . the production of documents . . . as though the applicable terms and conditions of the Federal Trade Commission Act were part of this title." As noted, in the absence of a statutory directive to the contrary FTC power to subpoena documents is not circumscribed by claims of confidentiality. It is difficult to imagine a more specific grant of enforcement powers under the FCRA or a more explicit articulation of FTC authority to compel production of consumer reports than the language of section 621.

[10] However inclusive may be the general language of a statute, it "will not be held to apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same enactment. . . . Specific terms prevail over the general in the same or another statute which otherwise might be con[994]trolling." Ginsberg & Sons v. Popkin, 285 U.S. 204, 208 [52 S.Ct. 322, 323, 76 L.Ed. 704]. 322 U.S. 107, 64 S.Ct. at 894.

[4] Another canon of construction might be invoked to yield the same conclusion. The presumption against interpreting a statute in a way which renders it ineffective is hornbook law. General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Whisnant, 387 F.2d 774, 778 (5th Cir. 1968); Uptagrafft v. United States, 315 F.2d 200, 204 (4th Cir. 1963); Abbot v. Bralove, 85 U.S.App.D.C. 189, 190-91, 176 F.2d 64, 65-66 (1949). We perceive no way to read that part of section 621 which vests investigatory power in the FTC as subordinate to sections 604 and 608 without stripping the former provision of all significance. Such a construction would make all language in section 621 affirming Commission power to use its administrative subpoena to compel the production of relevant documents either redundant or an utter nullity.[12] In the face of [995] a perfectly plausible and consistent alternative construction of the statute, this position is untenable. See generally Jarecki v. G. D. Searle & Co., 367 U.S. 303, 307-08, 81 S.Ct. 1579, 6 L.Ed.2d 859 (1961); United States v. Menasche, 348 U.S. 528, 538-39, 75 S.Ct. 513, 99 L.Ed. 615 (1955); Abbot v. Bralove, supra; Ruiz v. Morton, 462 F.2d 818, 819-20 (9th Cir. 1972).

[5] The principle that a statute should be read and construed as a whole is also germane to this situation. See United States v. American Trucking Ass'ns, Inc., 310 U.S. 534, 542-43, 60 S.Ct. 1059, 84 L.Ed. 1345 (1940); Smither & Co. v. Coles, 100 U.S.App.D.C. 68, 70, 242 F.2d 220, 222, cert. denied, 354 U.S. 914, 77 S.Ct. 1299, 1 L.Ed.2d 1129 (1957). Had sections 604 and 608 not contained generalized statements on the disclosure and discoverability of consumer reports, the FTC would have enjoyed its customary enforcement powers, including the power to obtain documents by administrative subpoena, without any express declaration to that effect.[13] Because the broad language of sections 604 and 608 might call the FTC's investigatory powers into question,

[12] Under the construction advanced by Retail the statement in § 621 that "The Federal Trade Commission shall have . . . the . . . power . . . to require . . . the production of documents" is merely repetitive of the Commission's power to obtain reports under the three conditions set forth in [995] § 604, and to discover identifying information absent those circumstances under § 608. That portion of § 621 which authorizes the FTC to use its customary enforcement powers—notably its administrative subpoena—to enforce the FCRA becomes meaningless by this reading, for the Commission would be prohibited from issuing a subpoena without the prior judicial approval required by § 604. Such a construction would severely restrict the FTC in carrying out its statutory duty to enforce the Act in all its particulars.

[13] Section 621 provides in part that a violation of the FCRA shall constitute "an unfair or deceptive act or practice in commerce in violation of section 5(a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act and shall be subject to enforcement by the Federal Trade Commission under Section 5(b) thereof . . . ." This declaration of FTC jurisdiction over violations of the Act implies the availability of the Commission's statutory investigative powers in proceedings enforcing the FCRA. See generally Automatic Canteen Co. v. FTC, 346 U.S. 61, 79, 73 S.Ct. 1017, 1027, 97 L.Ed. 1454 (1953), acknowledging that the Commission had a "broad power of investigation and subpoena" under the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13, though in conferring upon the FTC authority to enforce that act Congress did not mention subpoena powers. FTC v. Tuttle, 244 F.2d 605 (2d Cir. 1957), similarly upholds the power of the FTC to issue subpoenas in proceedings under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18.

section 621 specifically authorizes the Commission by administrative subpoena to compel the production of documents in enforcement proceedings. The significance of this latter provision is highlighted when it is read in conjunction with sections 604 and 608; it is the specific exception to the more general statements limiting the disclosure of consumer reports which the District Court sought.

III

[6-8] The proper function of legislative history is to resolve ambiguity, not to create it. United States v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 278 U.S. 269, 278, 49 S.Ct. 133, 73 L.Ed. 322 (1929)[14]; Montgomery Charter Service, Inc. v. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Commission, 117 U.S.App.D.C. 34, 37, 325 F.2d 230, 233 (1963). When the FCRA is read as an integrated whole it does not speak ambiguously of the FTC's power to compel the production of consumer reports; on the contrary, the specific language of section 621 affirms that power. We examine the legislative history of the Act to demonstrate that it does not contra[996]dict our interpretation of provisions of the statute.

Retail argued, and the District Court ruled, that the Senate meant unequivocally to require that information disclosed to any governmental agency be limited to identifying data, unless the requirements of section 604 were met. The Senate Committee Report on S. 823, passed by the Senate on November 6, 1969, states:

> Section 608.—Disclosure to Governmental Agencies—
> The disclosure of information to governmental agencies is limited to identifying type information . . . unless the governmental agency has obtained a court order or is a bona fide creditor, insurer, employer, or licensor.[15]

We find the impact of this "unequivocal legislative history" mitigated substantially by the Senate Committee's equally concise explanation of the provision enacted as section 621. The Committee report states that to supplement judicial enforcement of the Act through civil actions brought by consumers,

> [c]ompliance would be further enforced by the Federal Trade Commission with respect to consumer reporting agencies and users of reports who are not regulated by another Federal agency. The FTC can use the cease and desist authorities and other procedural,

[14] Where doubts exist and construction is permissible, reports of the committees of Congress and statements by those in charge of the measure and other like extraneous matter may be taken into consideration to aid in the ascertainment of the true legislative intent. But where the language of an enactment is clear, and construction according to its terms does not lead to absurd or impracticable consequences, the words employed are to be taken as the final expression of the meaning intended. And in such cases legislative history may not be used to support a construction that adds to or takes from the significance of the words employed.

> investigative and enforcement powers which it has under the FTC Act to secure compliance.[16]

No more explicit affirmation of the availability of the full panoply of FTC investigative powers was necessary to indicate that the Commission's statutory role as guardian of the FCRA excepted it from the strictures of sections 604 and 608 in fulfilling that role. That the specific should prevail over the general is not merely a technical canon of statutory construction, but also, to borrow Justice Holmes' phrase, an axiom of experience.[17] Logic, experience and the law dictate that the item of legislative history which speaks most particularly of the FTC's power to require the production of documents in a given situation should be given the greatest weight.

During congressional deliberation of the FCRA other agencies whose statutory functions would be aided by access to the reports and whose use of the documents would be to the consumers' advantage requested the power to obtain consumer reports without securing a court order or consumer permission. Because Congress did not act upon these claims of need and benign purpose, Retail argues that the FTC should not be accorded a preferred position on the ground that prompt access to the reports is essential to enforcement of the Act and the protection of consumers' interests. But the legislative decision to ignore pleas for outright exemptions from sections 604 and 608 advanced by the Federal Reserve Board and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency are of negligible significance. Both agencies are given specific authority to enforce compliance with the FCRA in section 621(b) of the Act, according to the terms of their respective organic statutes. Those bodies appealed to Congress for new statutory authority, the power to obtain confidential reports by administrative subpoena; the FTC seeks only to maintain an investigative tool which has traditionally been part of its hegemony, and which is specifically incorporated into the FCRA by the language of section 621(a). Moreover, the significance of congressional inaction in these circumstances cannot be equated with the force of the explicit phrasing of section 621.

The legislative history of the Act, particularly the Senate Committee's broad affirmation of the FTC's investigative enforcement powers, is consistent with [997] specific language in section 621 outlining the Commission's unique role in supervising the conduct of reporting agencies. In that supervisory capacity the FTC is distinct from the general class of governmental agencies to which section 608 refers; its duty to enforce the FCRA creates a particular and continuous need for access to consumer reports, a need of a different order from that of any other governmental agency.

IV

The District Court also ruled that the limitations of section 604 governed the FTC's attempts to obtain consumer credit reports from Retail's customers—in particular, from certain insurance companies which on several occasions had furnished the Commission with the documents in the absence of an appropriate court order. That ruling was predicated on two conclusions: that the Commission could not pursue by indirection a course specifically forbidden by the FCRA; and implicitly, that the Act was intended to cover disclosure of confidential credit information by parties other than reporting agencies. Because we disagree with its premises, we must disapprove this ancillary holding as well.

By its terms section 604 regulates disclosure by "consumer reporting agencies" and no other parties. Passage of the FCRA was prompted by concern over the power of those agencies and the potential for abuse it presented, not the lesser risk of subsequent disclosures or distortions by the more fragmented group of customers of reporting agencies.[18] The sole manifestation of congressional attention to the latter problem is section 615, which imposes upon users of consumer reports the duty to disclose to individuals whose credit is impaired the identity of reporting agencies which compiled the damaging information, and which allows a consumer to discover the nature of data which adversely affects his credit standing regardless of whether it is disseminated by a reporting agency. A number of other consumer safeguards[19] help to create a substantial likelihood that a consumer will be aware that information potentially damaging to his credit standing is in circulation. Because at that point the consumer may discover and challenge the information, regulation of disclosure by users to third parties is a less essential aspect of the protection of the confidentiality of personal information used in the determination of credit standing.

[9] Since the Commission may obtain reports from reporting agencies without regard to sections 604 or 608 in enforcing the FCRA,

[18] Section 602 of the Act provides:

(2) An elaborate mechanism has been developed for investigating and evaluating the credit worthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, and general reputation of customers.

(3) Consumer reporting agencies have assumed a vital role in assembling and evaluating consumer credit and other information on consumers.

(4) There is a need to insure that consumer reporting agencies exercise their grave responsibilities with fairness, impartiality, and a respect for the consumer's right to privacy.

15 U.S.C. § 1681(a)(2)-(4).

[19] Section 607 imposes upon the agencies a duty to verify the identity of prospective users of reports and to ascertain that the reports will serve purposes permissible under the statute. Sections 609, 610 and 611 afford the consumer an opportunity to discover the nature, substance, and in some cases the sources of information in his file, and outline a procedure for reexamining data of disputed accuracy. Section 613 provides that consumers shall be apprised of the identity of recipients of any potentially damaging information which is of public record. As noted, each of these provisions is reinforced by the civil penalties established in sections 616 and 617.

a fortiori those provisions should not bar disclosure to the FTC by the customers of the agencies, parties not within the purview of the Act.

[10] Our determination that third parties may obtain consumer reports from customers of reporting agencies is founded on the language of the FCRA; it does not evidence disagreement with the congressional conclusion that unlim[998]ited disclosure of information bearing on personal financial affairs, lifestyle and character will do harm both to individuals involved and to the banking system. Though we rule that the FTC may obtain consumer reports by administrative subpoena in enforcing the Act, we find implicit in the statutory scheme of the FCRA the caveat that the Commission is prohibited from using information which it obtains under section 621 for any purpose other than carrying out its enforcement duties under the Act.[20]

This qualification imposes on the FTC a burden not shared by individuals or organizations who obtain consumer reports under section 604. But those users of reporting agencies' data have either made a showing sufficient to secure a court order compelling disclosure, or they have purchased the information to fulfill a presumably legitimate business need. As users of credit reports they are specifically made liable to the civil penalties imposed by sections 616 and 617 for failure to comply with the notification requirements of section 615. Certain natural forces may induce these users to keep credit reports confidential. For example, a potential employer or business associate whose reputation is essential to financial success will be chary of indiscriminate disclosures of personal material when to make those disclosures could harm his esteem and thus his competitive position in a given business community.

The FTC stands in an altogether different posture. Congress afforded it a means of quick access to consumer reports for a solitary and limited purpose: enforcement of the FCRA. The Commission's interest lies not in evaluating the details of consumers' financial positions or character analyses, but rather in protecting consumers from certain proscribed reporting practices. Because section 621 gives the FTC a specific and exclusive province of administrative enforcement, subsequent disclosure of data the Commission subpoenas cannot, in the ordinary case, serve the limited purpose for which the subpoena is authorized. Thus we conclude that the FTC, to the maximum extent consistent with its enforcement duties, must safeguard the confidentiality of any information in consumer reports it obtains by administrative subpoena under section 621 of the FCRA.

MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

Petitioner in each of the above cases has commenced an investigation to determine whether respondents as well as other unnamed corporations or individuals are acting in violation of 15 U.S.C. §45.

In accordance with applicable statutes and regulations issued pursuant thereto, the subpoenas duces tecum here in issue were issued by the Federal Trade Commission acting through an Assistant Director. A motion to quash the subpoenas was heard and denied by the Federal Trade Commission and thereafter respondents refused to comply with the subpoenas. The Federal Trade Commission is now here on its petition to enforce the subpoenas. Jurisdiction in this Court to hear the petitions to enforce lies under 15 U.S.C. §49.

The law provides that the Federal Trade Commission is empowered to use subpoenas to gain access to evidence and documents in control of corporations under investigation and it is well established that investigative subpoenas of this nature are properly issued. See United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632 (1949). 15 U.S.C. §49 is a proper vehicle by which an agency may compel compliance. See United States v. Litton Industries, 462 F.2d 14 (9th Cir. 1972); F.T.C. v. Scientific Living, Inc., 150 F.Supp. 495, aff'd 254 F.2d 598 (3rd Cir. 1958), cert. denied 355 U.S. 940 (1958).

The proceeding to enforce compliance is summary in nature and this Court's inquiry is limited to determining: (1) is the inquiry within the authority of the petitioning agency; (2) is the demand for information sufficiently definite; and (3) is the information sought reasonably relevant to the inquiry being made.

* Not otherwise reported. Appeal denied, April 25, 1975 (9 Cir. 1975); motion to dismiss granted, January 16, 1976 (9 Cir. 1976).

Respondents raise a variety of arguments to resist enforcement of the subpoenas. Respondents argue, among other things, that the first of the three Morton Salt criteria requires that we determine whether the Interstate Land Sales Full Disclosure Act, 15 U.S.C. §1701 and, in the case of Juniperwood, Arizona statutory law, have ousted petitioner of jurisdiction. That position is incorrect and the cases cited for it do not support it. It is a position similar to that taken in this Circuit in Crafts v. F.T.C., 244 F.2d 882 (9th Cir. 1957) and summarily reversed in F.T.C. v. Crafts, 355 U.S. 9 (1957). We are confined to an examination of the pleadings; a statement by the petitioner therein that there is reason to believe that the respondents and the subject matter of the investigation are covered by the statute authorizing the investigation is sufficient; and we may not take evidence on the question of coverage. See 1 Davis, Administrative Law Treatise, at p. 219 and Flothill Products, Inc. v. F.T.C., 278 F.2d 850 (9th Cir. 1960), cert. denied 364 U.S. 920 (1960). The allegations of the petitions here found are in our view sufficient in this regard. Issues of coverage raised by respondents should be first decided in an adjudicative proceeding, if one is brought by the Federal Trade Commission, with direct review by the Court of Appeals thereafter.

Respondents' argument that they have been denied due process by the refusal of the Federal Trade Commission to disclose a staff memorandum is also short on merit. See Genuine Parts Co. v. F.T.C., 445 F.2d 1382 and United States v. Litton, supra.

We accordingly find and conclude on the record before us that the subject inquiry is within the authority of the petitioning agency.

Our next inquiry is whether or not the demand for information contained in the subpoenas is sufficiently definite or, as here claimed, unduly burdensome and is reasonably relevant to the inquiry being made.

The burden is on respondents to show any failure of the demand in these regards, and in our view that burden has not been met. See F.T.C. v. Gibson, 460 F.2d 605 (5th Cir. 1972).

From the record we accordingly find and conclude that the subject subpoenas are not indefinite or oppressive and do seek information reasonably relevant to the inquiry being made.

The petition to enforce subpoenas in each case is granted and respondents in each case ordered to appear before a duly appointed examiner of the Federal Trade Commission at Room 1309, Federal Building, 11,000 Wilshire Boulevard, Los Angeles, California, at a date and time to be set and noticed by petitioner then and there to testify and produce documents in response to the subpoena duces tecum issued by the Federal Trade Commission on March 8, 1974.

Let respondents be here advised and put on notice that failure to comply with this Order is punishable as a contempt of this Court.

The Clerk of this Court shall serve a copy of this Memorandum and Order by United States mail on counsel of record for the parties.

UNITED STATES v. PAPERCRAFT CORPORATION*

Civ. A. No. 74-816 F.T.C. Docket 8779

(United States District Court, Western District of Pennsylvania, March 11, 1975)

1. DISTRICT COURT COULD RESERVE ISSUE OF APPROPRIATE RELIEF AND RENDER A PARTIAL SUMMARY JUDGMENT ON ISSUE OF CORPORATION'S LIABILITY IN F.T.C.'S INJUNCTIVE RELIEF AND CIVIL PENALTIES ACTION FOR VIOLATIONS OF A FINAL CORPORATE DIVESTITURE ORDER.

In action by Federal Trade Commission for injunctive relief and civil penalties for violations of final order requiring corporation to divest itself of subsidiary, district court could render partial summary judgment on issue of corporation's liability and reserve issue of appropriate relief.

2. IT IS PROPER FOR COURT TO APPLY LAW TO UNDISPUTED FACTS AND GIVE SUMMARY JUDGMENT WHERE THERE IS NO ISSUE OF MATERIAL FACT TO BE TRIED.

Where there is no issue of material fact to be tried, it is proper for court to apply law to undisputed facts and render summary judgment.

3. CORPORATION'S ARGUMENTS ALLEGING DIFFICULTY OR IMPOSSIBILITY OF DIVESTITURE WERE NO DEFENSE TO CIVIL PENALTIES AND INJUNCTIVE RELIEF ACTION FOR FAILURE TO COMPLY, WHERE F.T.C.'S DIVESTITURE ORDER HAD BEEN AFFIRMED AS MODIFIED BY COURT OF APPEALS AND HAD BECOME FINAL.

Where Federal Trade Commission order requiring corporation to divest itself of subsidiary had been affirmed as modified by Court of Appeals, and order had become final by operation of law, corporation's arguments as to alleged difficulty of impossibility of divestiture were not defense to action for injunctive relief and civil penalties for failure to comply.

4. IN DENYING REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF TIME TO COMPLY WITH DIVESTITURE ORDER, F.T.C. WAS NOT REQUIRED TO GIVE REASONS FOR DENIAL.

Federal Trade Commission was not required to give reasons for denial of corporation's request for extension of time to comply with final order requiring corporation to divest itself of subsidiary.

5. DENIAL OF EXTENSION OF TIME RESTED IN F.T.C.'S DISCRETION AND WAS NOT REVIEWABLE BY DISTRICT COURT.

Right to extension of time to comply with Federal Trade Commission's final order requiring corporation to divest itself of subsidiary rested in discretion of F.T.C. and was not reviewable by district court in proceeding brought by F.T.C. for injunction and civil penalties for violation of divestiture order.

EXTENSION OF TIME WOULD NOT BE TREATED AS MOTIONS TO REOPEN FOR PURPOSE OF COURT REVIEW.

Where corporation subject to final Federal Trade Commission order to divest itself of subsidiary filed two motions for extension of time, and did not formally petition to reopen proceedings, motions for extension of time would not be treated as petitions to reopen for purpose of district court review of Commission's denial of motions, notwithstanding reference in motion requesting that order be "modified to extend the time for divestiture."

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 393 F.Supp. 408.)

On motion for summary judgment, court held that claim of difficulty or impossibility of complying with divestiture order was not a defense where appellate court affirmed the order as modified; that F.T.C. was not required to give reasons for denial of request for extension of time to comply; and, since right to deny was at F.T.C. discretion, the action was not reviewable by court.

OPINION AND ORDER

[409] This is a proceeding for civil penalties instituted by the United States on behalf of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) for violations of a final order requiring Papercraft Corporation (Papercraft), to divest itself of CPS Industries, Inc. (CPS). This action was brought under § 16(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 56(b), pursuant to § 11(l) of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 21(l), and §§ 5(l) and (m) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 45(l) and 45(m).

On April 10, 1969, the Federal Trade Commission issued its Complaint against Papercraft challenging Papercraft's acquisition, on or about December 27, 1967 of CPS, as a violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 18. The proceeding resulted in a Commission order on June 30, 1971 requiring the divestiture. Upon review, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit on February 22, 1973 ordered modification in part the Commission's order, but affirmed the order of divestiture. Papercraft Corporation v. F.T.C., 472 F.2d 927 (7th Cir. 1973).

In accordance with the mandate of the Seventh Circuit, the Commission's modified order was issued on June 6, 1973, and was duly served on the Defendant on June 16, 1973. It read in pertinent part as follows:

> IT IS ORDERED that respondent, The Papercraft Corporation, a corporation, and its officers, directors, agents, representatives, employees, subsidiaries, affiliates, successors and assigns, within six (6) months from the date of service upon it of this Order, shall divest, absolutely and in good faith, subject to the approval of the Federal Trade > Commission, all assets, properties, rights and privileges, tangible and intangible, including, but not limited to, all plants, equipment, machinery, inventory, customer lists, trade names, trademarks and goodwill, acquired by The Papercraft Corporation as a result of its acquisition of CPS Industries, Inc., together with all additions and improvements thereto, of whatever description, made since the acquisition. [F.T.C. Docket No. 8779].

Neither party filed a petition for certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States and the Commission's order became final by operation of law on July 6, 1973, as provided in § 11(i) of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 21(i), and in § 5(i) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 45(i).

Notwithstanding the final order of the Commission to divest itself of CPS within six months of June 16, 1973, the date of service of the order, or by no later than December 16, 1973, the Defendant failed to comply and continued in its failure to divest itself of CPS, or to submit a proposed plan for divestiture of CPS to the Commission for its approval. The Complaint asked for a mandatory injunction directing compliance with the modified order and for judgment to be entered against the Defendant in the sum of $10,000 per day [410] for each day of continuing violation, together with costs.[1]

Papercraft filed an Answer admitting the failure to divest, and in a Counterclaim alleged that FTC acted in excess of its statutory authority in denying Papercraft the right to a hearing on a Request for an Extension of Time, and acted arbitrarily and capriciously in failing to properly review Papercraft's petitions for modification of the deadline provisions of the Order. Papercraft also filed a Motion to Join Additional Parties, i.e., the Federal Trade Commission and the individual members of the Commission as Counterclaim Defendants, allegedly in accordance with Rules 13 and 19 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. After briefing and argument, on December 15, 1974, this Court denied the defendant's Motion to Join Additional Parties finding that complete relief could be accorded the defendant on its Counterclaim in the instant proceedings, rendering unnecessary any further claim for relief against the Commission or its members. We held at that time: "While not necessary for the disposition of the Motion, it is noted that the Commission's denial of the Request for Extension has been considered to be a matter of the exercise of the discretion of the Commission and not the Court. United States v.

[1] Section 5(l) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 45(l) provides in pertinent part as follows:

"(l) Any . . . corporation who violates an order of the Commission after it has become final, and while such order is in effect, shall forfeit and pay to the United States a civil penalty of not more than $10,000 for each violation, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the Attorney General of the United States. Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure to obey or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission, each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense. In such actions, the United States district courts are empowered to grant mandatory injunctions and such other and further equitable relief as they deem appropriate in the enforcement of such final orders of the Commission."

Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F.Supp. 104, 117 (D.Minn.1972), aff'd., 493 F.2d 1259 (8th Cir. 1974), pet. for cert. pending in the U.S.Sup.Ct; United States v. Swingline, Inc., 371 F.Supp. 37, 45 (E.D.N.Y.1974)."

On November 15, 1974, the United States filed a Motion for Partial Summary Judgment, interlocutory in nature on the issue of whether or not defendant Papercraft was in violation of the Federal Trade Commission's order based on an affidavit of Charles A. Tobin, together with exhibits, reserving for later hearing the consideration of the appropriate penalty and other relief. In addition, the United States seeks to have summary judgment dismissing defendant Papercraft's Counterclaim. It was contended that the Counterclaim raised no issues of fact concerning Papercraft's violation of the order, and was thus not a defense in any way to the instant proceedings. The motions of the United States will be granted.

ADMINISTRATIVE HISTORY

This proceeding was initiated by the Federal Trade Commission on April 10, 1969 (In The Matter of The Papercraft Corporation, FTC Docket No. 8779), challenging, as violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 18, Papercraft's acquisition on or about December 27, 1967 of CPS Industries, Inc. Hearings were held and on June 30, 1971, the Commission issued an Order requiring Papercraft to divest itself of CPS. As noted, United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit entered a final Order on February 22, 1973, modifying in part the Commission's order by deleting Paragraph IX (which concerned Papercraft's post-divestiture relationship with CPS customers) and affirming and enforcing the order as modified.

The Commission then modified its order and issued the same on June 6, 1973 [411] in accordance with the mandate of the Seventh Circuit which was served upon Papercraft on June 16, 1973. The Commission's final Order has not been modified or set aside.

Papercraft twice filed requests for nine month extensions of time in which to divest CPS. The first request was filed December 3, 1973, and the Commission rejected this request by letter dated January 16, 1974. Papercraft's second request was filed March 4, 1974, and rejected by the Commission on March 29, 1974.

Papercraft has not presented to the Commission a plan for divestiture of CPS by sale or spin-off nor has it divested CPS. Thus, on August 6, 1974, the Commission, pursuant to Section 16 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, certified the facts in this proceeding to the Attorney General (Exhibit 1 to Tobin affidavit), and the Attorney General thereafter directed a suit be instituted seeking civil penalties for Papercraft's continuing failure to comply with the Commission's Order, and for enforcement.

Papercraft's Answer admits all of the above matters except that it asserts that the Commission's errors in the handling of its requests for extensions were such that they constitute a defense to the enforcement of the Order, and thus, Defendant rather obliquely challenges the Commission's certification to the Attorney General.

DISCUSSION

Under Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, it is provided in pertinent part:

> (a) For Claimant. "A party seeking to recover upon a claim . . . may, at any time after the expiration of 20 days from the commencement of the action . . . move with or without supporting affidavits for a summary judgment in his favor upon all or any part thereof.

[1] It is noted that the question of appropriate relief, which is a matter solely within the Court's discretion, need not interfere with the disposition of defendant's liability by the granting of partial judgment. United States v. Beatrice Foods Co., 344 F.Supp. 104, 118 (D.Minn.1972), aff'd., 493 F.2d 1259 (8th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 95 S.Ct. 1350, 43 L.Ed.2d 438. As stated in Rule 56(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure:

> . . . A summary judgment, interlocutory in character, may be rendered on the issue of liability alone although there is a genuine issue as to the amount of damages.

[2] Thus, where there is no issue of a material fact to be tried, it is proper for the court to apply the law to the undisputed facts and to render summary judgment. Securities and Exchange Commission v. Geyser Minerals Corp., 452 F.2d 876 (10th Cir. 1971); Dale Hilton, Inc. v. Triangle Publications, Inc., 27 F.R.D. 468 (S.D.N.Y.1961) and Securities and Exchange Commission v. Payne, 35 F.Supp. 873 (S.D.N.Y.1940). While we are aware, as stated by Judge Coleman in Abraham v. United States, 465 F.2d 881 at 883 (5th Cir., 1972) that "experience shows that summary judgments suffer a rather high rate of mortality," in this instance the affidavits indicate that there is no genuine issue for trial on the matter of liability. Ward v. United States, 471 F.2d 667 (3rd Cir. 1973).

THE ISSUE OF IMPOSSIBILITY

In its Answer, Papercraft sets forth that it has made a "good faith" effort to comply with the Commission's Order but, that compliance has been "impossible". Papercraft argues that if summary judgment is to be granted in this situation it will be denied the opportunity to defend by showing that it was impossible to comply within the time period set by the Commission: "In other words, Papercraft is solely at the mercy of the FTC and may offer no defenses in this Court except to the extent of requesting the Court to moderate the im[412]position of penalty." (Defendant's Brief, p. 3). Papercraft then submits that this is unfair, unreasonable and inconsistent with these applicable laws and the Constitution of the United States.

As to the Commission's denial of Papercraft's request for a hearing, Papercraft contends that this is a violation of Rule 3.72(b)(3) of the FTC Rules of Practice (¶¶ 38, 42 and 45 of the Counterclaim). Carefully looking at the defense of Papercraft, it does not allege that it is actually "impossible" for it to comply, but rather that "changed economic conditions" (Answer at ¶ 15) have made it "impossible" [for Papercraft] "to sell CPS for a reasonable or fair price in light of the value of its assets, its record of earnings during the past several years, the substantial improvement in its marketing practices by reasons of decisions taken under Papercraft management, and its prospects for the future." (Answer at ¶ 14). It must be noted at this point that the Commission's Order did not require that Papercraft's divestiture of CPS be by sale, for the Order specifically provided for divestiture as well by such non-sale methods as spin-off (Commission's Order at ¶¶ 1 and 3). However, it is a clearly established principle of law as set forth in a previous Beatrice Foods Order (United States v. Beatrice Foods Company, 52 F.R.D. 14, at p. 18 (D.Minn.1971)) that:

> . . . While good faith is not a defense to such an action, it is clearly relevant to the court's discretionary determination of the extent of civil penalties to be assessed under that provision. United States v. H. M. Prince Textiles, Inc., 262 F.Supp. 383, 388-389 (S.D.N.Y.1966); United States v. Vitasafe Corp., 212 F.Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y.1962), aff'd. 352 F.2d 62 (2nd Cir. 1965). . . .

[3] Thus, Defendant's arguments as to the alleged difficulty or impossibility of divestiture may have carried weight in the request to modify the Order; but, regardless of this fact, they are not a defense to the action here. The Order suggests nothing to indicate that Papercraft's divestiture was to be affected by the price it would receive, and its position, in being "forced" to sell, is not a defense. The Defendant's bargaining position may well have been weakened by virtue of the Order, but its position was the product of Defendant's earlier violations of the anti-trust laws. The Order itself is not under attack in this Court. United States v. Vitasafe Corporation, 212 F.Supp. 397 (S.D.N.Y. 1962) and United States Bio-Genics Corp. v. Christenberry, 173 F.Supp. 645 (S.D.N.Y.1959), aff'd., 278 F.2d 561 (2nd Cir. 1960).

What was said by Judge Lay in United States v. Beatrice Foods Company, supra, 493 F.2d at page 1272, is particularly applicable here:

> Finally, we note that the underlying statutory basis for an FTC cease and desist order is § 7 of the Clayton Act. Apropos to our discussion is the Supreme Court's discussion of that section in United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 328-331, 81 S.Ct. 1243, 1251-1253, 6 L.Ed.2d 318 (1961):
> It cannot be gainsaid that complete divestiture is peculiarly appropriate in cases of stock acquisitions which violate § 7. That statute is specific and "narrowly directed," . . . The very words of § 7 suggest that an undoing of the acquisition is a natural remedy. Divestiture or dissolution has traditionally been the remedy for Sherman Act violations > whose heart is intercorporate combination and control, and it is reasonable to think immediately of the same remedy when § 7 of the Clayton Act, which particularizes the Sherman Act standard of illegality, is involved. Of the very few litigated § 7 cases which have been reported, most decreed divestiture as a matter of course. Divestiture has been called the most important of antitrust remedies. It is simple, relatively easy to administer, and sure. It should always be in the fore[413]front of a court's mind when a violation of § 7 has been found. (Emphasis added). [Footnote omitted]

ALLEGED COMMISSION ERRORS IN HANDLING PAPERCRAFT'S REQUESTS FOR EXTENSIONS OF TIME

[4] Papercraft argues that the Commission's failure to "provid[e] an articulated reasoned basis" for its denial of Papercraft's request for extension of the divestiture deadline violated the Commission's Rules, the Administrative Procedure Act, and the Due Process Clause of the Constitution and was arbitrary, capricious, and punitive in nature (Answer ¶¶ 22 and 24).

The Defendant's arguments are primarily related to § 3.2 of the Commission's Rules of Practice. 16 CFR § 3.2, however, specifically excludes compliance proceedings from the requirements established for adjudicative proceedings, and the courts have consistently recognized that compliance procedures of the Federal Trade Commission are nonadjudicative in nature. Robertson v. FTC, 415 F.2d 49, 54 (4th Cir. 1969). In Robertson, Judge Butzner stated the following which is a clear guide to the instant situation (at pp. 51-52):

> Section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act [15 U.S.C. § 45(b)] grants the Commission adjudicative authority. This section and the Administrative Procedure Act [5 U.S.C. §§ 554(b) and 556] provide for the right to notice, hearing, the opportunity to present evidence and to conduct cross-examination. The Administrative Procedure Act [5 U.S.C. § 557] and the Commission's rules [16 C.F.R. § 3.54(b)] require the Commission's decisions to include findings of fact, conclusions of law, and the reasons that support them. If the Commission finds the law has been violated, the adjudicative proceedings culminate in an order to cease and desist from using unfair methods of competition. The requirements of procedural due process found in these statutes and rules apply not only to adjudication of fault, Morgan v. United States, 304 U.S. 1, 58 S.Ct. 999, 82 L.Ed. 1129 (1938), but also to formulation of remedies in cease and desist orders. Jacob Siegel Co. v. FTC, 327 U.S. 608, 66 S.Ct. 758, 90 L.Ed. 888 (1946).
> Section 6 of the Act [15 U.S.C. § 46] authorizes the Commission to require compliance reports to aid in enforcement of cease and desist orders. United States v. Morton Salt Co., 338 U.S. 632, 70 S.Ct. 357, 94 L.Ed. 401 (1950). The Commission's rules furnish a detailed guide for reporting compliance [16 C.F.R. § 3.61] and expressly provide that these proceedings are not adjudicative [16 C.F.R. § 3.2]. Neither the Federal Trade Commission Act nor the Commission's rules require formal hearings at the compliance stage. Moreover, the absence of such a requirement in the Federal Trade Commission Act makes the hearing provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act inapplicable to compliance proceedings. See LaRue v. Udall, 116 U.S.App.D.C. 396, 324 F.2d 428, 432 (1963), cert. denied, 376 U.S. 907, 84 S.Ct. 660, 11 L.Ed.2d 606 (1964). [Footnotes omitted]

The granting of extensions of time for compliance with Orders of the Commission is governed by § 4.3(b) of the Commission's Rules of Practice, which states in pertinent part (16 C.F.R. § 4.3(b)):

> (b) Extensions. . . . the Commission, for good cause shown, may extend any time limit prescribed by the rules in this chapter or by order of the Commission or an Administrative Law Judge . . .

The language of this section is discretionary and there is no requirement that the Commission give reasons for the denial of a request for an extension. United States v. Swingline, supra, 371 F.Supp. at p. 45.

[5] From the foregoing, it is obvious that one method for altering the time for compliance is through a request for extension of time. Such a request [414] is governed by § 4.3, and the Commission's response is "agency action . . . committed to agency discretion by law" under section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 701; and it is not reviewable except as permitted by the Act under section 10(e), 5 U.S.C. § 706. Therefore, the right to an extension of time to comply with the Order rests in the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission, and under the facts in this case, is not reviewable. See, United States v. Swingline, supra, at p. 45.

[6] The second method by which a Federal Trade Commission Compliance Order may be altered requires a formal petition to reopen the order pursuant to § 3.72 of the FTC's Rules which reads in part as follows (16 C.F.R. § 3.72(b)):

> (2) Whenever any person subject to a decision containing a rule or order which has become effective, or an order to cease and desist which has become final, is of the opinion that changed conditions of fact or law require that said rule or order be altered, modified, or set aside, or that the public interest so requires, such person may file with the Commission a petition requesting a reopening of the proceeding for that purpose. The petition shall state the changes desired, the grounds therefor, and shall include, when available, such supporting evidence and argument as will in the absence of a contest provide the basis for a Commission decision on the petition. Within thirty (30) days after service of such a petition, the Director of the appropriate bureau of the Commission shall file an answer.
> (3) Whenever an order to show cause or petition to reopen is not opposed, or if opposed but the pleadings do not raise issues of fact to be resolved, the Commission, in its discretion, may decide the matter on the order to show cause or petition and answer thereto, or it may serve upon the parties (in the case of proceedings instituted under § 3.13, such service may be by publication in the Federal Register) a notice of hearing, setting forth the date when the cause will be heard. In such a case, the hearing will be limited to the filing of briefs and may include oral argument when deemed necessary by the Commission. When the pleadings raise substantial factual issues, the Commission will direct such hearings as it deems appropriate, including hearings for the receipt of evidence by it or by an administrative law judge . . .

The Defendant here did not formally petition to reopen the proceedings and it can not now complain of the Commission's discretionary action denying its request.

Papercraft apparently recognized that § 4.3 decisions were not reviewable by this Court for it set forth in its Counterclaim that its requests were Rule 3.72 petitions to reopen this proceeding (Counterclaim ¶¶ 38 to 49). However, this contention is without merit.

It is noted that Defendant's first request for an extension of time was made by letter dated December 3, 1973, and there is no statement which could even arguably indicate that the request was intended to be a formal petition to reopen. The letter, dated January 16, 1974, from the Commission denying this request, clearly stated that the letter had been treated as a request for an extension of time.

Papercraft's second request (filed February 27, 1974) which was denied on March 29, 1974, was entitled a "Motion for Extension of Time" and began as follows:

> Papercraft Corporation ("Papercraft"), by its attorneys, respectfully requests an extension of time within which to complete the divestiture of CPS Industries, Inc. ("CPS") under Paragraph I of the Commission's Final Order.

The true intent of this document is indicated by the following statement (at p. 10 of the document):

> . . . In the circumstances, a denial of the request for extension of [415] time will not further the Commission's ultimate objective of restoring competition in the giftwrap market.

* * * * * * *

> An extension of time within which to complete divestiture is a matter addressed to the exercise of the Commission's sound discretion. . . .

In its February 27, 1974 request, Papercraft states (at p.2):

> It is respectfully requested that the Commission's Order be modified to extend the time for divestiture for a period of nine months from the date originally specified for compliance, or until September 15, 1974. (Thus, a 6-1/2 month extension from the date of this petition is requested). If the Commission believes it necessary, although we do not, Papercraft will not object to the imposition of a condition pursuant to which such extension would be revocable by the Commission following 21 days' notice to Papercraft if the Federal Trade Commission should find that Papercraft is not proceeding in good faith with divestiture efforts. . . . (Emphasis added).

And at Page 11 of the same request, Papercraft states:

> For these reasons, Papercraft respectfully requests that Paragraph I of the Commission's Final Order be modified to extend the time for divestiture for a period of nine months, until September 15, 1974. Although Papercraft considers it unnecessary, it will not object to the imposition of a condition upon such extension pursuant to which the extension would be revocable following 21 days' notice to Papercraft if the Federal Trade Commission should find that Papercraft is not proceeding in good faith with divestiture efforts. (Emphasis added).

Defendant Papercraft now apparently argues that these two passing references in its second submission to the Order being "modified to extend the time for divestiture", turns both of its requests into formal petitions to reopen pursuant to Rule 3.72.

From the above, it seems clear to the Court that the Defendant's two requests for extensions of time were just that and nothing more. They were treated as such by the Commission, and the Defendant was so informed. This discretionary action pursuant to Rule 4.3 is clearly not reviewable.

It is the conclusion of the Court that the Defendant in this action is in violation of the Final Order of the Federal Trade Commission, and the Plaintiff should be granted its request for partial summary judgment, interlocutory in nature on the issue of the Order violation. Further, since the Defendant's Counterclaim raises no issue of any material fact, the Plaintiff is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the Counterclaim.

An appropriate order will be entered.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. SIMEON MANAGEMENT CORPORATION, ET AL.*

Civ. A. No. C-74-2226 WHO. F.T.C. Docket No. 8996.

(United States District Court, Northern District of California, March 11, 1975)

1. TRADITIONAL EQUITY STANDARDS OF JUDICIAL REVIEW ARE NOT APPLIED BY COURT IN EVALUATING MOTION FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION UNDER F.T.C. ACT.

[697] In evaluating a motion for a preliminary injunction under the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Court does not apply the traditional equity standards of judicial review.

2. IN SEEKING RESTRAINT OF DISSEMINATION OF ADVERTISING, F.T.C. DOES NOT HAVE TO SHOW TRADITIONAL EQUITY OF IRREPARABLE HARM.

Federal Trade Commission, in seeking a preliminary injunction restraining the dissemination of advertisements, is excused from making traditional equity showing of irreparable injury.

3. DISTRICT COURT MUST LOOK TO FTC'S REASONABLE CAUSE THAT A VIOLATION OF FTC ACT HAS OCCURRED AS WELL AS WEIGHING FACTOR OF EQUITIES IN FAVOR OF GRANTING OR DENYING THE INJUNCTION.

Reasonable belief of a violation of Federal Trade Commission Act is enough to justify the Federal Trade Commission in seeking a preliminary injunction, but in evaluating the motion for preliminary injunction the district court must look to the Commission's reasonable cause to believe that a violation [698] has taken place, and must also as a separate factor weigh the equities in favor of granting or denying the injunction.

4. UNDER THE F.T.C. ACT, "FALSE ADVERTISEMENT" CAN REFER TO BOTH WHAT AN ADVERTISEMENT STATES AND WHAT IT FAILS TO STATE.

Under Federal Trade Commission Act, an advertisement may be a "false advertisement" both for the statements or representations it actually makes, and for the statements or representations it fails to make.

5. ADVERTISEMENTS WERE SUFFICIENTLY INVOLVED IN OR AFFECTING COMMERCE TO INVOKE JURISDICTION UNDER FTC ACT.

Even though respondents' California weight reduction clinics had never offered

*Reported in 391 F. Supp. 697 (1975), aff'd. 532 F. 2d 708, (9th Cir., 1976). For case before the Commission, see 87 F.T.C. 1184.

weight reduction treatments to out-of-state residents, even though the clinics were located at least four hours' drive from the state borders, and even though the method of weight reduction required daily clinic visits, respondents' advertisements, which were placed in newspapers, magazines, and on television with out-of-state circulation and broadcasting ranges, were sufficiently involved in or affecting commerce to invoke jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

6. DISSEMINATION OF FALSE ADVERTISING, NOT ACTUAL SALES FLOWING FROM THE PUBLICITY IS THE AIM OF THE F.T.C. ACT.

Federal Trade Commission Act is aimed at prohibiting dissemination of false advertising, not towards prohibiting the actual sales that may flow from the publicity.

7. DISSEMINATION OF ADVERTISING PUBLISHING A DRUG-BASED TREATMENT WAS ENOUGH TO MEET F.T.C. ACT REQUIREMENTS THAT ADVERTISEMENT WAS LIKELY TO INDUCE PURCHASE OF A DRUG.

Even though advertisements of operators of weight reduction clinics did not specifically mention that daily injections of an endocrine drug which were a crucial component in the treatment program, and even though the injections were administered by a physician or nurse and the drug was never directly placed in hands of the purchaser, dissemination of advertisements publishing this drug-based treatment was enough to meet requirement of Federal Trade Commission Act that the advertisement in or affecting commerce is likely to induce the purchase of a drug.

8. IN ORDER TO ASCERTAIN THE NET IMPRESSION WHICH THE ADVERTISEMENT WAS TO MAKE ON THE GENERAL PUBLIC, DISTRICT COURT WOULD ANALYZE THE AD IN ITS ENTIRETY.

District court, in ruling on Federal Trade Commission's application for a preliminary injunction restraining operators of weight reduction clinics from advertising their drug-based treatment, would analyze the advertisement of operators in their entirety in order to ascertain the net impression which the advertisement was likely to make upon the general public.

9. DIRECT CONTROL OF MEDICAL PRACTICE IS BEYOND THE POWER OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND HAS BEEN LEFT TO THE STATES.

Direct control of medical practice has been left to the states and is beyond the power of the federal government.

10. RESPONDENTS WERE NOT REQUIRED TO SEEK F.D.A. APPROVAL FOR USE OF ENDOCRINE DRUG IN TREATMENTS ADMINISTERED BY PHYSICIANS.

Whether or not endocrine drug was a "new drug," operators of weight reduction clinics were not required to seek FDA approval for use of the drug in treatments administered by licensed physicians.

11. REGULATION OF DRUG ADMINISTRATION BY PHYSICIANS IS BEYOND THE JURISDICTION OF F.D.A.

FDA does not have jurisdiction to regulate the administration of a drug by a physician.

12. PROPER SHOWING WAS NOT MADE TO WARRANT PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

Showing was insufficient to warrant preliminary injunction restraining operators of weight reduction clinics from advertising their obesity and weight control treatments as long as they used the drug human chorionic gonadotropin or any other drug in their treatment and as long as such drug or such other drug had not been approved by the FDA for use in weight reduction.

(Syllabus, with substituted captions, taken from 391 F.Supp. 697.)

On motion seeking preliminary injunction restraining operators of weight reduction clinics from advertising their treatments, court held that showing was insufficient to warrant injunction requested.

Motion denied.

ORRICK, District Judge.

[699] Sections 13(a) and (b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (the Act), 15 U.S.C. § 53(a) and (b),[1] provide that the Federal Trade Commission (the FTC) may seek a preliminary injunction restraining the dissemination of advertisements whenever the FTC has reason to believe (1) that a person, partnership, or corporation is disseminating false or misleading advertisements or is violating or about to violate any provision of law enforced by the FTC and (2) that it would be in the public interest to enjoin the dissemination of such advertisements pending the issuance of an administrative complaint by the FTC and until there is a final administrative or court ruling on the complaint.

[1] Statutory references to the Act are to the applicable sections of Title 15, United States Code. 15 U.S.C. § 53 provides:

"(a) Whenever the Commission has reason to believe—

(1) that any person, partnership, or corporation is engaged in, or is about to engage in, the dissemination or the causing of the dissemination of any advertisement in violation of section 52 of this title, and
